

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

And the PARLIAMENT having met accordingly, the Session was opened by Commission.

The HOUSE OF LORDS being met;

THE LORD CHANCELLOR acquainted the House,

"That it not being convenient for Her Majesty to be personally present here this day, She has been pleased to cause a Commission under the Great Seal to be prepared, in order to the holding of this Parliament."

Then Five of the LORDS COMMISSIONERS—namely, The LORD CHANCELLOR; The LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (The Duke of Richmond and Gordon); The LORD PRIVY SEAL (The Duke of Northumberland); The LORD STEWARD (Earl Beauchamp); and The LORD SKELMERSDALE—being in their Robes, and seated on a Form placed between the Throne and the Woolsack, commanded the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod to let the Commons know "The Lords Commissioners desire their immediate attendance in this House, to hear the Commission read."

And the COMMONS being at the Bar, with their Speaker:—The Commission was read by the Clerk:—Then

THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR delivered HER MAJESTY'S SPEECH to both Houses of Parliament, as follows:—

"My Lords, and Gentlemen,

"I REGRET that I have been obliged to call for your attendance at an unusual and, probably, to most of you, an inconvenient season.

"The hostility towards my Indian Government manifested by the Ameer of Afghanistan, and the manner in which he repulsed my friendly Mission, left me no alternative but to make a peremptory demand for redress.

"This demand having been disregarded, I have directed an expedition to be sent into his territory, and I have taken the earliest opportunity of calling you together, and making to you the communication required by Law.

"I have directed that Papers on the subject shall be laid before you.

"I receive from all foreign Powers assurances of their friendly feelings, and I have every reason to believe that the arrangements for the pacification of Europe, made by the Treaty of Berlin, will be successfully carried into effect.

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"The Estimates for the ensuing year are in course of preparation, and will in due time be submitted to you.

"My Lords, and Gentlemen,

"I propose that after full deliberation upon the matters which have led me to anticipate your usual time of meeting, and after a suitable recess, you should proceed to the consideration of various measures for the public benefit which will then be laid before you.

"I confidently commit to your wisdom the great interests of my Empire, and I pray that the blessing of Almighty God may attend your counsels."

Then the Commons withdrew.

House adjourned during pleasure.

NOTICE OF MOTION.

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: My Lords, I beg to give Notice that on Monday next I shall move—

“That Her Majesty, having directed a Military expedition of Her Forces charged upon Indian Revenues to be despatched against the Ameer of Afghanistan, this House consents that the Revenues of India shall be applied to defray the expenses of the Military operations which may be carried on beyond the external frontiers of Her Majesty's Indian possessions.”

THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HER MAJESTY'S MOST GRACIOUS SPEECH.

The QUEEN'S SPEECH reported by The LORD CHANCELLOR.

THE EARL OF RAVENSWORTH, in rising to move that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty in answer to Her Majesty's Most Gracious Speech, said: My Lords, on rising for the first time to address your Lordships I must claim your indulgence, I am afraid for some time, on two grounds—upon general grounds, my Lords, and upon special grounds; because, though I cannot allege entire inexperience in public business or in debate, having served a considerable apprenticeship in “another place,” I cannot disguise from myself that within this Chamber popular passion and prejudice have no influence. My Lords, to woo and to win the popular ear is not the ambition of many of your Lordships; but that fact does not render the task of addressing you for the first time any easier. It is, therefore, on general grounds that I claim your indulgence, and there are special grounds likewise upon which I shall claim it.

This is a special summons to Parliament, and it has met for a special purpose. The subject which you have to discuss is one of no ordinary importance; and in attempting to address your Lordships upon it I cannot but consider for a moment the circumstances that have occurred. I see before me statesmen of profound and lengthened experience; I see before me old and skilled diplomatists; I see Secretaries and ex-Secretaries and ex-Viceroy's of India; and I see, likewise, military men of the highest and most exalted rank, and profound in the science and the arts and strategy of war. To render my task more than ordinarily difficult, I feel that the atmosphere of the House of Lords, though essentially calm and judicial, is, at the same time, a critical one. My Lords, exactly 10 years ago an eminent Indian statesman wrote thus from Calcutta, as Viceroy, to the then Secretary of State for India. He said—

“No man can doubt that the approach of Russia towards the North-Western Frontier of India may involve us in great difficulties.”

My Lords, the Viceroy who wrote this was Sir John Lawrence, and the Secretary of State for India was the Duke of Argyll; and I venture, my Lords, to allude to these plain words, because I think they are fitting words to open the discussion of the subject which you are about to deal with. They were prophetic words then, my Lords, and they have come true now; they are the “key-note” of this debate.

Now, my Lords, I trust that in discussing this matter we shall not blink this question, because it is a question upon which we should not speak with bated breath; and I think—in fact, I firmly believe—that a plain outspoken Parliamentary debate upon the question of Central Asia will do more than anything else to effect that which every statesman and lover of his country ought to desire—namely, to bring about an understanding between Russia and England upon that question. I venture to think, my Lords, that plain speaking will do more to accomplish that end than the whispers of Cabinets, the words of Generals, or the wiles of diplomacy. My Lords, the Frontier policy—or rather the policy that should guide us with respect to the Frontier of our North-Western Provinces in India—is a question that has occupied and taxed the energies of our greatest statesmen, and for years almost has appeared to baffle their efforts at solution. I should like to remind your Lordships that there has existed for a long time two distinct schools of policy on that subject; and they are, if I may use the expression for the sake of argument, what I may term the backward school and the forward school of Indian politicians. To give some idea of the bent of mind of the backward school, I would draw your Lordships' attention to an event of some importance as far back as the year 1857, when an eminent Indian statesman proposed the abandonment of Peshawur and the cession of it and a portion of the neighbouring district to Dost Mahomed. I do not allude to that matter now by way of criticism, for that is unnecessary; but I may mention, in passing, that this rather remarkable proposal was stoutly combatted at the time by Sir Sidney Cotton, and that great and good man, Colonel Edwards, afterwards Sir Herbert Edwards, and the Viceroy of that day, Lord Canning, rejected the proposal. I allude to this as an indication of the length to which the disciples of the backward school have been, and may be now, prepared to go. My Lords, when doctors differ the patient suffers, and in this case the patient is the Indian Empire. I think he would be a bold statesman who would get up and attempt, looking at the intrigues and conspiracies, the insurrections, the mischief, and the danger that might result to our Indian Empire from delay, to recommend that we should wait until these two schools had settled their differences. I venture to think, my Lords, that the time for argument has passed—that the time for action has arrived.

Now, my Lords, to speak plainly. Her Majesty's Gracious Speech has informed us that we are at war in Afghanistan, and I venture to call your Lordships' attention to that little word "in," for I am rejoiced that we are not at war with Afghanistan—we are at war with the Ameer, but not with his subjects; and if we can trust the Manifesto which has been issued by the Government of India it is not a war of ambition—it is not a war of aggression, it is not a war of annexation—but it is a war for the support of the honour of the Crown, the dignity of the nation, and the safety of our Indian Empire. Now, my Lords, very serious accusations have been largely and liberally levelled at Her Majesty's Ministers for some time past. They have been accused of having entered into this war recklessly, hastily, and without justification, and even, my Lords, wickedly, for I have seen the word wickedly used, and by a noble Lord who I did not expect would use such an expression. My Lords, these are grave charges. They are more than charges—they are impeachments—and if they be just and true, I think it is time that the High Court of Parliament should ascertain, by careful examination, whether they are true or not. My Lords, I am here tonight charged with the duty of opening the case for the defence against these charges, and I must ask your Lordships' indulgence once again while I do so.

In the first place, allow me to refer to my own position for one moment. I can assure your Lordships, with all sincerity, that I would not have allowed myself to be placed in this prominent position if I did not entertain the firm conviction and belief that Her Majesty's Government were justified in the course that they have taken, and I go beyond that and say that there was no other course which in honour they could have pursued. Now, my Lords, in order to make good the position that I have ventured to take, I must begin by asking your Lordships' permission to review and give a brief history of the past position of affairs, and to make a short retrospect of our relations with Shere Ali. First of all, my Lords, it is my duty to remind you that so far back as 1855 a Treaty was concluded between the old East India Company and the father of the present Ameer, Dost Mahomed. It was short and simple, and in its terms it was a Treaty of friendship and amity. It was a Treaty that bound both signatories to respect the integrity of each other's territories; but it is to the third portion of that Treaty to which I particularly wish to refer. It bound the Ameer to be the friend of our friends and the enemy of our enemies; but there was no such obligation on our part, and it is clear that the Ameer always considered the Treaty as a one-sided instrument. Moreover, my Lords, Lord Canning himself has so described that Treaty, and it is important to bear that fact in mind. In 1856 an important engagement was entered into between the Government of India and the old Ameer, which had reference mainly to the war with Persia, then going on, and there were certain engagements as to a subsidy, which I shall have to allude to by-and-bye. In 1863 Dost Mahomed died, and the Ameer—Shere Ali—notified the event to our Government in a very proper and respectful manner. He informed the Indian Government of the death of his father; but it so happened from some reason or other, of which I am not aware, that for six months after that important communication was received no notice whatever was taken of it, and I think your Lordships will agree with me that that was a very unfortunate start to make with a man of the peculiar temper of the Ameer. If Shere Ali had been an angel on earth—and certainly I believe he is far from that—he must have felt very much annoyed at such a delay. Then broke out the civil war, in which at first Shere Ali was successful, his brothers, Mahomed Ufzul Khan, Azim Khan, and a son of Ufzul, Abdul Rahman Khan, being in arms against him. In 1865 he gained a very considerable victory over his elder brother and against his nephew, the son of Ufzul Khan; and that victory appears to have been gained in a very gallant manner, but not without a severe loss to the Ameer, because he lost his favourite son, who was shot in the battle by his own uncle. I do not allude to this as a great political event, but as a very great event in the life of the Ameer, and it appears, from the testimony of writers of the time, that it had a very great effect on the mind of the Ameer. It is even uncertain whether that effect has entirely disappeared at the present time. Moreover, my Lords, I might remind you that the sorrow which was caused by that event has been re-opened very lately by the death of Abdoolah Jan, the youngest and favourite son of Shere Ali. In 1864 the war went on. Soon after his brother gained so great an advantage over him that Shere Ali was almost forced into banishment, and he fled to Herat with a few followers. Then came a curious portion of the history of our relations with Afghanistan. Ufzul Khan ascended the Throne of Cabul, and Shere Ali remained in possession of Herat, and at that time the Viceroy of India wrote a letter to the actual Ameer, who had located himself at Cabul, while the other dethroned Ameer was at Herat. It began by saying—

“I am very sorry for the Ameer; he is a very old friend of mine, and I never had any occasion of quarrel against him. I am sorry for his degradation;”

but it goes on to say—

“I am delighted to congratulate you (Ufzul) on the victory you have gained, and I have no doubt that you will be my friend.”

There were at that time not one, but two Rulers of Afghanistan—one at Cabul and one at Herat—and the letter concluded by recognizing both. Now, that letter recognized a principle against which Shere Ali had a great objection, and that was, the recognition of a de facto Ruler. Shere Ali has always said—“If you recognize a de facto Ruler, the effect of it will be to encourage everyone who is opposed to me to rise up against me, and if he succeeds in getting upon the Throne, you will immediately recognize him.” What Shere Ali wanted was the adoption of another principle. He wanted the de jure principle, and he wanted us to recognize his absolute right to the Throne, and he said—“I not only want you to recognize my right to the Throne, but my son's right to the succession. I want him recognized as the heir to the Throne de jure.” Now, Ufzul having shortly afterwards died, then came Shere Ali's famous victory, in 1867, in Candahar, which led to his re-entering Cabul in 1868. After that I find a letter written by the Ameer to the Viceroy, and there appeared to be a curious strain of irony running through it. It was to this effect—“Here I am at last; thank God for it; but no thanks to you.” It is evidently in an ironical spirit that the Ameer wrote that letter. Now, I may remind your Lordships that the subsidy of six lacs of rupees which had been formerly given to the Ameer was allowed to go on, and there was also a valuable annual present of arms. I now come to a part of the narrative to which I refer with very great pain, and I am sure that your Lordships will share with me in the sorrow with which I mention the name of the Viceroy—my late dear and lamented Friend, Lord Mayo. He arranged matters with Shere Ali at a meeting at Umballa, and for some considerable time our relations with the Ameer became comparatively friendly—they were peaceable, at least, and so far they were satisfactory—and the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll), who I regret to see is not in his place, in an interesting letter which he has lately written, has paid a noble and graceful tribute to the late Lord Mayo, to the effect that the influence which we obtained at that time over the mind of Shere Ali was owing to his exertions, his manly presence, his genial, open-hearted countenance, and his transparent sincerity of character. My Lords, Non cuius homini contingit adire Corinthum; and while I mention that our relations with Shere Ali at that time became more satisfactory than at any other time, it is no disparagement to the noble Lord the late Viceroy (Lord Northbrook) to say that during his tenure of office he did not get on quite so well with the Ameer. I merely mention that as a fact. There is no doubt of the abilities of my noble Friend as an administrator under trying difficulties; but, at the same time, I feel bound to state the circumstances. Some very curious things came out upon the occasion of the Conference at Umballa. At that time we had an insight into the mind of the Ameer. He was very sore then upon one or two points. He was sore at the premature recognition of his brother Azim, and he made various observations upon the one-sided character of the Treaty of 1855; he wanted the succession recognized of the son whom he had chosen to succeed him. He did not get all that he wanted upon that occasion; but he obtained something. In point of fact he got a great deal, because Lord Mayo promised him that the British Government would view with displeasure any attempt to disturb the Ameer, and he presented him with two batteries of artillery, and a considerable stand of arms; and no doubt the Ameer and Lord Mayo left the Conference in a very good humour one with the other. The Ameer wrote a very striking letter afterwards, in which he said—

That was what the Ameer wanted; but it was what he never could get. There were many other matters discussed upon the occasion, and among them the presence of British officers in Afghanistan, and I think that there was very good reason at that time to hope that the Ameer would have consented to the presence of British officers at Herat, Candahar, and Balkh; but he certainly would not have consented to the presence of British Residents at Cabul, because he said it might embarrass him with his subjects: I do certainly think that he would have given his consent to the presence of Residents in the other towns that I have mentioned. Her Majesty's Government, however, at the time, did not altogether approve of what had been done at the Conference, and they insisted upon certain conditions being inserted—certain reservations and certain provisions being made.

I pass now from that point, and come down to the year 1873, and it is an important epoch in the history of our relations. We found the Ameer still friendly, but, at the same time, he was less attentive to our representations than he had shown himself before. Now, what had occurred in the interval? Very great events had occurred. What had been styled the bugbear of the Indian Government—namely, the Russian advance—had become a stern reality. The Russian troops had advanced through Central Asia; Russia had made her influence paramount at Samarcand and in Bokhara; she was now upon the Oxus, and Khiva had been annexed. That caused very great alarm, and the annexation of Khiva especially shook, I hope not for ever, the confidence of England in Russian promises. The Ameer was alarmed, and he wrote to us that he should be glad to have a Conference with the Viceroy. The Conference was held at Simla. Now, my Lords, I must call your attention for one moment to the circumstances in which the Ameer found himself placed, and I think the best way to do so is to refer to two telegrams that passed between the Viceroy and the Secretary of State. The Viceroy telegraphed on the 24th of July, 1873, to the Secretary of State for India, as follows:—

“Ameer of Cabul alarmed at Russian progress, dissatisfied with general assurance, and anxious to know definitely how far he may rely on our help if invaded. I propose assuring him that if he unreservedly accepts and acts on our advice in all external relations we will help him with money, arms, and troops, if necessary, to expel unprovoked invasion. We to be the judge of the necessity.”—[Ibid. p. 108.]

“Cabinet thinks you should inform Ameer that we do not at all share his alarm, and consider there is no cause for it: but you may assure him we shall maintain our settled policy in favour of Afghanistan, if he abides by our advice in external affairs.”—[Ibid.].

Now, there are two or three very important considerations with reference to those telegrams. The continuance of the subsidy was one of the topics of consideration between the Ameer and the Viceroy, and the record of the conversations is certainly very puzzling reading. In the first instance, we were to negotiate in the event of invasion; but if the negotiations failed, we were to take another course, and if hostilities broke out we undertook to give the Ameer material assistance. But if the granting of the subsidy was to continue, it was to continue not only upon the condition of the Ameer's conduct towards the British Government, but upon the manner in which he treated his own subjects. Now, the withdrawal of the subsidy on such a ground would be a very difficult and delicate operation. It appears to me that it would be a very difficult thing, indeed, to treat with a Sovereign when you have deprived yourselves of the opportunity of obtaining the information that is necessary to enable a proper opinion to be formed. We have no British officers in Afghanistan, and therefore no person on whom we can fairly rely for obtaining such information; and it was not the policy of the then Government to place Residents in the Frontier towns, so that we could ascertain from them what was going on in the country, and the general treatment by the Ameer of his subjects. There is another point which had reference to the continuance of the subsidy. The assistance of our troops was to depend upon the implicit acceptance by the Ameer of our advice in all the external relations of his country. Then what becomes of the independence of the Ameer, which was another stringent principle insisted on, if at that time we were to be absolute judges of his foreign policy? Now I go on, and I may mention, in passing, that a careful record of these conversations was kept and sent to the Ameer, accompanied by a letter from the Viceroy telling him that Her Majesty's Government was bound by their substance; and I can quite understand, having read the despatches, that the Ameer was puzzled when he read the Correspondence, and I can quite imagine that he should have said when he got up from the perusal of them — "I don't understand these Englishmen. I don't know what they mean to do or what they don't mean to do; but one thing seems clear, and that is that they are not friendly to me, and I will have nothing more to do with them." If he did not say that, that was the spirit in which he seems to have acted. Now, the next thing which I wish to allude to is the Conference which took place in 1877 at Peshawur. That was intended to be a friendly Conference, and Sir Lewis Pelly was empowered to make many important concessions. At that Conference a great deal was said on the part of the Ameer with reference to the necessity of recognising the succession of his younger son, on which he had set his mind; but, after all, the Conference was an abortive one. The Afghan Envoy was ill almost all the time the proceedings were going on, and he died before the Conference ought to have ended. But I think it is the true solution of the failure to say that it was too late; that the Ameer had made up his mind as to who should be his friend, and had made choice of Russia, and not of us. Then, or shortly after, confidential communications with Cabul took place from Tashkend. And long before these Papers were produced to us, we have the evidence of an independent witness upon the subject. That witness is M. Vambéry, the traveller, and he tells us that on the 13th of August of this year—which was the very day that the Treaty of Berlin was signed—a Russian Mission started from Tashkend, and a Russian General remained five weeks at Cabul, and was treated with every consideration, in fact received with open arms. Then it was that we resolved to send a friendly Mission to Cabul, and informed the Ameer of our intention, telling him that it was sent with a friendly object. We were, however, stopped and looked upon as intruders, and your Lordships will remember the reception it met with at the entrance of the Khyber Pass, and you will also remember the words that were addressed by the Afghan Sirdar to our Envoy — "If it were not for my personal friendship for you I should have fired upon you, and if you go farther I shall do so."

Now, my Lords, I have concluded this long, and I am afraid tedious, review of our relations with the Ameer, and I come to the inference that I wish to draw from that retrospect. The inference I draw is, I think, the true one, and I assure your Lordships that I have no wish to treat the subject in a narrow Party spirit; but I want to get at the truth, and the truth is simply this—that the Ameer never was a friend to England in our acceptation of the term, and we were never friends to the Ameer in his acceptation of the term. The cold and neutral tinted policy which we had too long pursued in India had no attraction for the Ameer; he wanted brighter colours and a warmer tone. He sought for them at Simla, but he found them in Turkestan.

My Lords, statesmen must, as school children must, submit to be judged by results. If a certain policy proves a failure we are not to be debarred from condemning it by such high-sounding terms as "benevolent neutrality," or "non-intervention," or "non-interference." My Lords, non-interference is an excellent rule in private life, so long as nobody shows a disposition to interfere with you; but if another man is interfering with your business you must interfere with him. Caution is a very desirable thing; but over-caution leads a man into quite as great straits, as rashness and over-caution is apt to be regarded by semi-civilized communities and Sovereigns as timidity. We all know, if we know anything of human nature, that nobody cares for a timid man. My Lords, I would ask, with the greatest possible respect, but, at the same time, with the greatest possible confidence, whether any noble Lord who sits on the opposite benches will get up and say that after the insult which was offered to our Envoy any English Cabinet could have stood motionless, and tamely submitted to that insult? Knowing that Russian influence was dominant in Afghanistan; feeling, as every English Cabinet must feel, that it was responsible for the honour of the Crown, the dignity of the nation, the tranquillity of the Frontier, and the tranquillity of a country numbering 200,000,000 of inhabitants within its Frontiers, will any noble Lord get up and say that an English Cabinet could, under such circumstances, have tamely submitted to that insult? If there is one man in this House so hardy and so bold as to say that, I would venture to tell him that he must settle his account with his countrymen—he must be responsible to them for such advice.

Now, my Lords, I have done, or nearly done. Since the outbreak of hostilities in Afghanistan our noble soldiers and our gallant and instructed officers have done what English soldiers have ever done—their duty. It is too early to speak of results. I am not going to attempt to foretell what will be the issue of the present war. The matter is in the hands of Providence, and we must abide the result with hope and confidence. It has been said that we have failed to make a friend of the Ameer, and, before quitting the subject, I would remark that he does not appear to have been able to make very good friends of his feudatory clans.

There is another paragraph in the Most Gracious Speech of Her Majesty upon which I wish to say one or two words. Her Majesty says—

"I have every reason to believe that the arrangements for the pacification of Europe, made by the Treaty of Berlin, will be successfully carried into effect."

That statement will, I think, be regarded by the country with great satisfaction, because it implies the sanctity of Treaties. I hope the time is far distant when the sanctity of Treaties will cease to be recognized. Treaties are, my Lords, the title deeds of Empires; they are the guarantees of the independence, liberty, and safety of smaller and weaker States; which in turn may be regarded as neutral zones, marked out by the negotiations of diplomatists and statesmen, and established as barriers against the encroachments of the greater and more powerful States. Of all countries, England is the last that ought lightly to regard Treaty obligations. I believe that in insisting on a firm adherence to the stipulations in the Articles of the Treaty of Berlin, England will receive the support of Europe. At any rate, England is bound to regard the obligations of Treaties even more than any other State that could be named, because it has always been our boast that an Englishman's word is his bond.

I wish to allude for a moment to one subject which is not mentioned in Her Majesty's most gracious Speech. Having been connected for many years with large mining, manufacturing, and agricultural districts, and with the commerce of the country, I wish to ask your Lordships' permission to express—as I do tial to bear in mind the occurrences which have recently taken place in Europe as well as in Asia.

I think it will be conceded on all sides that the task which Her Majesty's Government have had before them in carrying out the foreign policy of the country has been lately one of unexampled difficulty and danger; and that they have carried that policy out with honour to themselves and satisfaction to the country, I think has been sufficiently proved by the reception which the First Minister of the Crown and the Foreign Secretary received on their return from the Berlin Congress, and also by the overwhelming majority with which the other House of Parliament pronounced a decision in their favour. My Lords, the difficulties which they have had to encounter have proceeded, in a great measure, from the aggressive policy which has been pursued by Russia, and by the threatening attitude which that country has on more than one occasion assumed towards England, and also from the pledges and assurances which have been given by her, and which, like the proverbial pie-crust, seem to have been made only to be broken. My Lords, the astounding revelations of diplomatic unscrupulousness and intrigue which are contained in the volume which has just been issued upon affairs in Central Asia have shown that Her Majesty's Government have not without sufficient cause pursued the course they have done with regard to Afghanistan. But, my Lords, the difficulties which they have had to encounter have not only proceeded from without. They have also, in great measure, proceeded from within. I allude especially to the agitation which took place in this country before and during the late war. I think it cannot be doubted that those agitations had a most injurious effect, and that they made it exceedingly difficult for Her Majesty's Government to act with that decision and promptitude which they otherwise would have used. My Lords, these internal difficulties and agitations undoubtedly had a most injurious effect during the late war. They produced an effect upon Russia which made her imagine that she had nothing to do but to go on with her conquests, without taking into consideration the possibility of England's interference, and led her to pursue her victorious course up to the very walls of Constantinople.

Lord Inchiquin

But, nevertheless, all this time Her Majesty's Government were keeping a watchful eye upon the interests of this country. They were only waiting until the time arrived to intervene, and when it did arrive they interfered with so much effect that the Treaty of San Stefano, which completely abrogated Turkish power in Europe, was submitted to the assembled Powers of Europe at the Congress of Berlin, and the result was the conclusion of the Treaty of Berlin. By that Treaty, Turkey was re-established as an European Power; and I think it will be a source of immense gratification to everyone in this country to hear the announcement which Her Majesty has made in Her most gracious Speech, that she has every reason to believe that this Treaty will be faithfully carried out.

My Lords, while these affairs were going on in Europe, Russia was not idle in Asia. She had for years been pursuing a policy of interference, pressing on her arms in every quarter, and annexing first one country and then another; and, my Lords, at the very time that the Treaty of Berlin was signed she was intriguing with the Ameer of Afghanistan, in order that she might, in the event of war breaking out between her and England, send an army into his dominions for the purpose of making a descent on India. I would recommend those who read the Papers upon the Afghan Question to judge of the intentions of Russia. But, my Lords, I must draw your attention to one special incident recorded in the Central Asian Papers. I allude to the publication of the letters from General Kaufmann to the Ameer. The publication of those letters, following as they did the categorical denial of their existence, given first by Prince Gortchakoff, and subsequently by General Kaufmann himself, form a curious and interesting commentary on the repeated assurances given by Russian statesmen, and even by the Emperor himself, that Afghanistan lay outside the sphere of Russian action.

My Lords, I shall endeavour, as shortly and as briefly as I can, to touch on the subject of Afghanistan. It has been so fully dealt with by my noble Friend that I shall not attempt to go over the ground again; but, in the first place, I wish to say, that after carefully perusing the Papers which have been placed in our hands, it appears to me that the despatch of the Secretary of State for India is most fully justified upon examination of those Papers. It appears to me that no inference is drawn in that despatch which is not borne out by the Papers. The whole matter may, I think, be stated in two simple questions—first of all, have we been fair in our dealings with the Ameer throughout? and, secondly, are we justified now in declaring war against him? I think the first question must be answered in the negative, and the last in the affirmative. It appears to me that if instead of pursuing that course of masterly inactivity and timidity which marked our dealings with Afghanistan in the early part of the Ameer's reign, we had come boldly forward and told him that we would recognize him as the de jure as well as the de facto Ruler of Afghanistan, and if, guarding ourselves against interfering in his domestic affairs, we had promised to assist him in defending himself against foreign enemies, he would still have been our staunch ally. But it is a remarkable fact that Lord Mayo appears to have been the only Viceroy who really inspired confidence in Shere Ali. He certainly established an immense influence over him, and especially at the time of the Umballa Conference. But it is also remarkable that after the Umballa Conference a letter was written by the then Secretary of State for India (the Duke of Argyll) to Lord Mayo, disapproving in a certain measure of what he had done there. My Lords, the fact is that we have always been unwilling to take any risk upon ourselves. We have asked from the Ameer everything, and on our part we have been unwilling to grant anything in return. But the same error appears on our part in our dealings with the Ameer in 1873. That year was a very remarkable one, though I will not dwell on it on account of my noble Friend having so fully called attention to it; but I may say that there is no doubt that that year was the turning point in our negotiations with Shere Ali. He had become alarmed at the rapid advance of Russia in Central Asia, and at the taking of Khiva, and appealed to us for more explicit assurances of our protection; but the Viceroy, Lord Northbrook, was not authorised by the Home Government to give these promises. Again, after the Conference between the Viceroy and Shere Ali's Envoy at Simla the same difficulty arose. The Viceroy was not able, on account of the orders which he had received from England, to give Shere Ali those assurances which he sought. This was the state of affairs when the present Government came into Office; and the first thing which Lord Salisbury did was to write to Lord Northbrook, the then Viceroy, stating what scanty information was being received from Afghanistan, and suggesting that a British Agent should be established at Herat and Candahar. Now, my Lords, it will probably be in your recollection that Shere Ali had assented to this proposition before; but what was the answer which the Viceroy sent? He sent an answer saying that he and his Council considered that the policy which had been previously pursued was much better than that suggested by the Secretary of State. A short time after that the Secretary of State again writes, saying that if it was injudicious to send a British Agent, he suggested, under the circumstances, that the best thing to do was to send a British Mission. This, again, was declined by the Indian Government; and it was not until Lord Lytton came into office that a real attempt was made to establish a British Mission, and to find out whether Shere Ali was willing to give the necessary consent. And, my Lords, Lord Lytton, when he went out, was instructed to offer the assistance which Shere Ali had before appealed for in vain. But it was too late. The mischief had been done, and it was impossible to undo it. Things remained in this way until July and August of this very year, when a notice came to say that a Russian Mission was at that moment in Cabul; and the Viceroy telegraphed home to know whether the matter was to be treated as an Imperial question, or one which concerned the Indian Government. Having been told that it was to be dealt with in the latter capacity, he informed the Ameer that a British Mission would be sent immediately to Cabul, and with what result is well known to your Lordships. It was impossible for the Government to put up with such an open insult; and I have no hesitation in saying Her Majesty's Government had no other course open to them than that which they have taken. There may be people who will say "Perish India," and would rather sacrifice their own country than sacrifice their particular views as to our relations with the Ameer; but I believe the people who are of that way of thinking are very few: and I am sure that your Lordships and the bulk of the people of England will tolerate no interference with our Empire, but will sacrifice blood and treasure to maintain it, and will be prepared to say "England's friends are our friends, and England's enemies are our enemies." I beg to second the Address. [See p. 17.]

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, it has been my lot not unfrequently during the existence of the present Government, on the occasion of the opening of Parliament, to express the great pleasure I have felt at the ability with which the Address to Her Majesty in answer to Her Majesty's Most Gracious Speech have been moved and seconded in this House by young Peers. The noble Lord who has just seconded the Address (Lord Inchiquin) we have often had the pleasure of hearing before; and with regard to my noble Friend who moved it, he is an old soldier in debate whom we gladly welcome, though coming from another regiment. I hope that neither of my noble Friends, nor any of your Lordships, will think I am wanting in courtesy to those noble Lords, or that I do not consider the topics with which they have dealt of the greatest importance and gravity, if I do not follow them in detail in the statements they have made, and which I shall avoid doing for the reasons I shall shortly give. I observe, though I do not complain of it, that neither of the noble Lords has followed the usual practice of adverting to each of the points mentioned in the Speech from the Throne. With regard to home matters there is, indeed, very little to be said—for there are only two points in it. The first is the reference to the inevitable, and, I am afraid, the annually increasing Estimates; and there is also an announcement of certain anonymous Bills to be introduced into Parliament after a suitable Recess. I own that after the experience I have had of the announcement of Bills in Queen's Speeches in the last two years and the results, I am able to wait with indifference till February next to know the names of the new friends or the old friends with new faces, as the case may be. The noble Earl who moved the Address appeared to me to hit a very serious blot, which had struck me on reading the Queen's Speech. We all know the warm and active sympathy which Her Majesty evinces when any calamity happens to any class, or even to individuals, among her subjects; and I do think it is somewhat strange that Her Majesty's Ministers should entirely omit to insert a single word of sympathy on the part of Her Majesty with the great distress which indubitably exists among the trading, the manufacturing, and the agricultural classes of this country. The noble Earl spoke with great feeling, as becomes his great knowledge of this subject; and I am happy to agree with him in the hopes of improvement which he expressed as to the future. No doubt the depression has arisen mainly from causes with which Her Majesty's Government have nothing to do. First, there was the inflation of a few years ago, against the dangers of which the Leader of the late Government so eloquently warned the public. Then there was the commercial disturbance caused by the Russo-Turkish War. I do not know how far it can be said that Her Majesty's Government had nothing to do with that, for the Prime Minister told us last year that if the Government had taken a course they did not take that war might have been prevented, while others think there was a different course which might have had the same effect. Her Majesty's Government have nothing to do with bad harvests, nor with the folly of the enormous loans to insolvent States, enabling them for a short period to buy the produce of our labour. My firm belief at this moment is that these causes are diminished, if not removed, and that the one thing wanted is confidence. With confidence there would be a return of gradually increasing prosperity; but how far Her Majesty's Government, by their acts, are contributing to restore that confidence it is not for me to say. It is quite clear that a Government which describes every diplomatic move as a diplomatic triumph; which announces—with perfect truth—that this country is able from year to year to sustain the strains of war without being exhausted; which startles the country with great responsibilities for which it is utterly unprepared, even if it follows a policy that may be wise—may be popular—it does not contribute to bring about the sort of confidence which is essential to the prosperity of trade and manufactures. I do not complain of the Speech being short; but there are some very singular omissions to which I must allude. While a most serious war is raging in our dominion of South Africa, and we are despatching troops thither, it does seem to me that in a communication from Her Majesty to Her Parliament there should be some reference to the state of affairs in that important Colony. There is, indeed, an allusion to the Treaty of Berlin—a very satisfactory allusion it is; and I am ready to admit with great pleasure that if Her Majesty's Government, in concert with the other European Powers, have, by judicious diplomatic measures, contributed in any degree to induce Russia and Turkey to execute all their engagements under that Treaty, not excluding any, they will have done a very great and important work. I am very glad, indeed, Her Majesty's Government are able to inform us that they think those two countries will execute the Treaty, and that it will work satisfactorily, though of this I require more information to be convinced. But there is another matter which affects this country much more vitally than the Treaty of Berlin, and that is the Anglo-Turkish Convention; we are not quite sure how that is being carried out. That came upon us all with a surprise. As the result of that Convention we found ourselves in possession of Cyprus, and loaded with immense responsibilities—the government of Asia Minor and the Protectorate of Turkey. My Lords, we who dared last year to criticize the value of Cyprus were stigmatized as unpatriotic. I admit that many people thought that it was a great success at the moment and for a particular purpose. I am told—though I do not know whether it is true—that a great Continental statesman, who has constantly recommended annexation to this country, when he heard of it said—“It will succeed; it will be popular in England; they will call it progress, but it is acquisition.” My Lords, we have heard a great deal of Russian aggression of late; but I find in these Papers a Governor General declaring of India that we fear no aggression and desire no acquisition; and the late Foreign Secretary (the Earl of Derby) said that the strength of this country consisted in this—that we feared nobody and wanted nothing. It appeared to me to be a proud and true assertion. I am afraid that these former truths can hardly now be maintained. I rather gather that the acquisition of Cyprus, even apart from the mode in which it was made, is not now considered of such high value by those who made it as it was at first. I judge this from the different manner in which they defend it. One Minister states that it is to be considered a model school of good government for the Turks. I very much doubt whether many Pashas will be sent to Cyprus to study our administration more than they have been sent to Malta, to England, or to the Ionian Islands. The Prime Minister has spoken of Cyprus as “a place of arms;” but before it becomes so I am afraid many improvements will have to be carried out and much expense incurred. It is, indeed, a little out of the way; but by the time it is fortified, harbours provided, and the pestilential climate rendered salubrious, I trust it may turn out to be of some use. But then it seems there is some further consolation in store for us. A right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of Gloucester) has spoken of our possession of Cyprus as a providential dispensation that would promote the spread of the Christian religion. Nobody would be more delighted than I should be if such an object could be attained; but I confess I do not quite understand how that brilliant and gallant soldier Sir Garnet Wolseley, administering Mahomedan law in that Island, will promote in any very sensible degree the advancement of the Christian religion. I hope the Government will succeed in their endeavours to introduce better government into Asia Minor; but I am disappointed that they did not think it worth while to mention the subject in the Royal Speech.

I now, my Lords, come to the subject to which both the noble Earl and the noble Lord so properly devoted their attention. No doubt your Lordships have a perfectly Constitutional right to move an Amendment to the Address in answer to the Speech from the Throne; but, my Lords, it is a right which for the last 20 years has not been exercised. It is a right the exercise of which statesmen have always deemed it well to avoid if possible, it being desirable, out of respect to the Sovereign, that in our Address to the Throne we should be as unanimous as possible. An Amendment is all the more unnecessary when an Address does not commit the House, and we have simply to thank Her Majesty for the information we have received. There is another reason, my Lords, why I think an Amendment on this occasion is almost impossible, with due regard for the convenience of Peers. Parliament has been summoned very suddenly; but the Papers bearing upon the causes of that summons have been delivered to us only a very few days ago, and we have had no time to study them in detail. I think the House will expect some explanation why the Central Asia Papers, which were promised before the close of last Session, have been withheld from your Lordships and the country till the beginning of this week. With regard to the Afghan Papers, they consist of so large a mass that some considerable time must be required to master them—I venture to say that the great majority of your Lordships here present have not had the time requisite to master their details. I therefore at once wish to state that it is not my intention to move any Amendment to the Address; but I beg it to be clearly understood that I think there are matters of the very greatest importance with which we have to deal, and that it will be impossible for this House not fully to discuss the whole subject, and to express an opinion upon it. Speaking of what has been achieved in the field, I must say it is to me a source of very great pleasure to hear of the brilliant dash and courage of our troops which have led them on to success. Whatever may be the cause, or in whatever part of the world, our troops never fail, whether on land or sea; and the fact of their success will enable us, so far as the Opposition is concerned, all the more thoroughly to discuss and debate the policy of the Government, which the noble Lord who seconded the Address stated turned on two points—first, whether the conduct of the English Government had been just to the Ameer; and, secondly, whether the war itself was just. I agree with him in thinking the first question must be answered in the negative, and I should have thought that the two questions were somewhat connected. This, my Lords, is the great question which has called Parliament together. I had no great anxiety about the meeting of Parliament. I felt perfectly certain it would be called together. Not that it makes any great difference to Parliament whether it meets now or in February, so far as it may exercise any influence after the mischief has been done—after a war has already commenced. Once you cut the jugular vein, it does not much matter whether you send for the surgeon at once or a week afterwards. There are great Constitutional questions connected with it. No one denies the absolute Prerogative of the Crown to declare war and make peace; but there are questions connected with every Prerogative of the Crown, with regard to the discretion and the extent to which it is used; and it is perfectly clear to me, that if year after year you take the country and Parliament perfectly by surprise and throw on them the responsibility of measures, without the means of forming a judgment having been afforded, you do weaken the foundations on which the principle of Prerogative rests, and you may do a great deal of mischief thereby. I do not wish to enter into the Constitutional question—it rather belongs to the whole merits of the case, on which I do not wish to dwell to-night. But there is this peculiarity in the case—there has been a great change of policy on this most important matter. During the last three years, not only has Parliament not been taken into confidence on the subject, but Parliament has actually been led to take a wrong view of what was the policy of the Cabinet. During that period had Parliament any reason to suppose that the policy of the Government with regard to Afghanistan was different from that of all the Secretaries of State, and of all Governors General from the time of Lord Dalhousie to the time when the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) took the Seals of the India Office? It is not my habit to trouble your Lordships by reading long extracts from Blue Books; but I must trouble your Lordships with a few. In the first place, what were the general principles held by the Conservative Party upon this subject nine years ago, when they were in power? Sir Stafford

Northcote, when at the India Office, said in the House of Commons, on the 9th of July, 1869—

“Looking at it from an Indian point of view, this debate had been eminently satisfactory, both in the opinions that had been expressed and the opinions that had not been expressed. There had been no advocacy of a policy of annexation, of a policy of extending the British dominions, or of a policy of advancing in order to meet Russia midway between our Frontier and hers. The general feeling evidently was in favour of the policy of keeping within our own Frontiers—of developing the internal defences, extending the existing railways, and improving the harbour of Kurrachee, rather than attempting to go into the country of Afghanistan. In addition to the other reasons which might be stated against such a proceeding as the latter, there was the danger of creating suspicion in the minds of the natives. He believed the hon. Member for Gravesend had given expression to the feelings of Englishmen of all parties, when he said that we ought to keep free from the imbroglio of Afghan policy. There was a general feeling that we ought not to repeat the mistakes we made in 1840; that we ought to keep ourselves entirely free from entangling alliances. What we should do was to maintain friendly relations with the natives on our borders, to desire the existence of a good Government in Afghanistan. It was a misapprehension to suppose that we wanted to erect Cabul into a bulwark against Russia.”—[3 Hansard, cxcvii. 1578-9.]

No doubt Sir Stafford Northcote fairly represented the opinions of the Government on that occasion. I will not quote the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby), speaking in behalf of the noble Marquess in 1874, but he certainly gave no indication of any change of policy. But in 1877 there arose considerable disquietude on this subject among those conversant with India, and on June 11 of that year the noble Marquess said—

“I can assure the noble Lord that any danger of a Russian inroad on the Frontier of British India is not quite so far advanced as he seems to imagine. The nearest point on the Caspian at which supplies could be gathered by Russia is over a thousand miles from our Indian Frontier. The consideration of the danger to which the noble Lord refers may possibly interest a future generation of statesmen; but that calamity is not of such imminence as to render necessary the Motion by which the noble Lord seeks to avert it. I will not dwell longer on the geographical circumstances, except to protest against the statement of the noble Lord that the Empire of British India knows no bounds. My Lords, the bounds of that Empire are very minutely marked out, especially on the North-Western side. Whatever the Empire of Russia may be, there is no doubt whatever as to what the Frontier of British India is. It is perfectly well known. I cannot help thinking that in discussions of this kind a great deal of misapprehension arises from the popular use of maps on a small scale. As with such maps you are able to put a thumb on India and a finger on Russia, some persons at once think that the political situation is alarming, and that India must be looked to. If the noble Lord would use a larger map—say one on the scale of the Ordnance Map of England—he would find that the distance between Russia and British India is not to be measured by the finger and thumb, but by a rule. There are between them deserts and mountainous chains measured by thousands of miles, and these are serious obstacles to any advance by Russia, however well planned such an advance might be.”—[3 Hansard, ccxxxiv. 1564-5.]

Do such sentiments appear to be those of a Minister who was making a great change in the Indian policy, out of fear of Russia? Not very long after that the Duke of Argyll put a Question to the noble Marquess. I may say, in passing, that the Duke of Argyll greatly regrets that an important question like this, in which he takes so much interest, should be discussed when he is unable from ill-health to be present. Lord Salisbury answered—

“With respect to the information asked for by the noble Duke, I can hardly give him much positive knowledge; but I think I can give him some negative information. He has derived from the sources open to him the following statement, as I understood him:—that we had tried to force an Envoy upon the Ameer at Cabul; that we had selected for that purpose Sir Lewis Pelly, whose vigour of mind and action might possibly inspire apprehension in the Councils of a Native Prince; that we had supported this demand by a large assemblage of troops on the North-Western Frontier; and that we were preparing boats upon the Indus. Now, we have not tried to force an Envoy upon the Ameer at Cabul; we have not suggested Sir Lewis Pelly as an Envoy to Cabul; the troops were assembled on the North-Western Frontier without the slightest reference to any such demand; and with regard to the boats on the Indus, I never heard of them until to-day.”—[Ibid. 1835.]

With regard to sending Envoys, the noble Marquess stated that he referred to Candahar and Herat, and not to Cabul; but in the Papers it is distinctly shown that it was announced to the Ameer that it was intended to send Sir Lewis Pelly to Cabul. The Papers say nothing about the massing of troops on the Frontier, and I do not know from the Papers what was the reason for which they were sent. Then the noble Marquess continued—

posed towards us than hitherto, or that his feelings are in any way more embittered towards the British Government."—[Ibid.]

My Lords, I shall listen with great anxiety to the explanation of the noble Marquess; but I must ask, after all that had happened, how was it possible to say that our relations with the Ameer had undergone no material change, and that the feelings of the Ameer were not more embittered towards the British Government? Well, my Lords, a despatch from Lord Lytton was sent on the 20th of February, 1876; the next Paper to it is the answer, on the 10th of May—not the 10th of May, 1876, but the 10th of May, 1877. Now, I really want to know what passed all this time. Are we really to believe that during these 14 months, when such important transactions were going on, not a single communication passed between the Secretary of State and the Viceroy of India? That seems almost impossible; but if there were a number of such despatches, I presume that they will be produced. Or are we to understand that the system of Correspondence known as "private and personal communications," and which, when attempted in the Foreign Office, exploded in the Warner policecase, was adopted during that period? As I said before, I shall listen with anxiety to the explanation of the noble Marquess, how it was that during all that time there were no communications between the two Governments? But, however long that despatch of Lord Lytton was in coming, it must have been in the hands of the noble Marquess a week or a fortnight before the day when he gave the reply to which I have referred; and how, then, was it possible to say that there was no change in the position when at the time we had broken off all diplomatic relations with the Ameer, and we gave him to understand that he was not to entertain any hope of help against Russia? The noble Marquess having given this explanation, what happened? The noble Lord (Lord Lawrence), a former Governor General of India, whom I have always found the most courteous of men, did not acquiesce. He said that—

"So far as Central Asia was concerned, there was nothing to be desired beyond the statement of the noble Marquess to the House, coupled with that made 'elsewhere' on the previous Monday; but, with regard to our policy on the North-West Frontier and our relations with Cabul, he feared that something more had occurred than had yet been heard of. It seemed unlikely that all the doubts, forebodings, and suggestions which had appeared in the Indian papers should have so little basis as contended for in the explanations of the noble Marquess. It was clear from the Indian papers, and he included those which supported the action of the Indian Government, that something of very considerable importance had occurred to cause agitation on the North-West Frontier of India."—[Ibid. 1836.]

What did my noble Friend (the Earl of Northbrook) say? He said—

"It is with great satisfaction, therefore, that I have heard the assurance of the noble Marquess that the policy I have referred to Her Majesty's Government will continue to pursue. I am satisfied that he has given us that assurance in perfect good faith, and that we may trust him to resist any attempt to put it aside."—[Ibid. 1843.]

I may add, with regard to this point, that it was through the advice of my noble Friend (the Earl of Northbrook), and through his influence upon us, that we entirely gave up the idea of taking Parliamentary action on this subject.

Now, I come to another question, to which I have been invited by the noble Lord who seconded the Address—I do not pretend, however, that I should not have referred to it even if the noble Lord had not done so. The noble Lord says that, in the despatch of the 18th of November, the Secretary of State for India gave a perfectly correct statement of all that had happened. Now, my Lords, I must say that a certain portion of the despatch of the noble Viscount (Viscount Cranbrook) conveyed the most erroneous impression possible of what had occurred. When a subject interests the public they resort to every device to get easy information upon it; they fly to the newspapers, to abstracts, digests, &c. to get at the matter without great labour. Very few men are gluttons of Blue Books. Now, I do not blame the noble Viscount in the slightest degree for writing and publishing the despatch—I think he was perfectly right in taking an opportunity of stating his own case. But in producing such a statement, which he knew would be read by hundreds of thousands who would never dream of reading two pages of a Blue Book, surely it was incumbent on him to use special care and accuracy in respect of everything? I do not undervalue the difficulty of making a précis of such a multitude of Papers, and this is very able, very clear, and very interesting; but what did the noble Viscount do? He gave a short historical sketch of what had happened with regard to this question in previous stages and under different Governors General. I am not aware that any fault can be found with that part of the despatch. My noble Friend behind me (Lord Lawrence) will correct me if I am wrong; but I think the description of his policy was perfectly fair and accurate. But when the noble Viscount came to deal with the policy of the late Government the case was very different. The ninth paragraph of the despatch contains the part to which I refer, and I will read it to your Lordships. Paragraph 9 says—

“Finding that the object of the Ameer was to ascertain definitely how far he might rely on the help of the British Government if his territories were threatened by Russia, Lord Northbrook's Government was prepared to assure him that, under certain conditions, the Government of India would assist him to repel unprovoked aggression. But Her Majesty's Government at home did not share His Highness's apprehension, and the Viceroy ultimately informed the Ameer that the discussion of the question would be best postponed to a more convenient season.”—[Afghanistan, No. 1, p. 262.]

Now, I venture to appeal to your Lordships—and I found my appeal on what has appeared in the public Press and on the comments generally made—and to these I must add the reproaches addressed to me by political Friends—I put it to your Lordships whether that paragraph was not likely to lead to the erroneous impression that Lord Northbrook desired to make an engagement somewhat similar to that which the Ameer desired, but before doing so he referred home for permission; that he got instructions, which were opposed to his proposal; that, therefore, he did not give the assurances which he wished to give, and that he postponed the discussion to a more convenient season? I appeal to your Lordships, whether Liberal or Conservative, who have read the despatch, whether that description is correct? But the truth is exactly the reverse. My noble Friend did not propose to give what the Ameer desired; but he wrote home for permission to give an assurance which he thought sufficient. Those instructions were not of a dissenting character to withhold any assurances which he desired to give, but of an assenting character to the assurances which he desired to give; and those assurances he accordingly gave. He did not postpone anything owing to instructions, but spontaneously, in consequence of the Envoy not being ready to negotiate on one point. I state the case as it is, leaving it to the noble Viscount to make an explanation. There is one point with which I think the noble Viscount has not dealt sufficiently, and that is the result of the interview between Sir Lewis Pelly and the Ameer's Representative in 1876. The result of this interview is described in these words—

“Although the Ameer had been informed in writing, both of the concessions which the British Government was ready to grant to him and the conditions attached to them, and although, at the same time, it was signified to him that it would be of no avail for him to send his Envoy to Peshawur unless His Highness were prepared to agree to those conditions as the bases of the proposed Treaty, it became apparent in the course of the Conference that the Minister had received no specific authority to accept them. As, moreover, the language and conduct of Shere Ali, which had so long been dubious, became openly inimical, you judiciously took advantage of the sudden death of His Highness's Envoy to discontinue negotiations, the bases of which had been practically rejected.”—[Ibid. p. 264.]

This does not, however, convey all that may be found in the other Papers. There is an extract from a cipher telegram, dated the 30th of March, 1877, from the Viceroy at Calcutta to Sir Lewis Pelly at Peshawur. The Viceroy says—

“Close Conference immediately, on ground that basis on which we agreed to negotiate has not been acknowledged by Ameer; that, Mir Akhor not being authorized to negotiate on that basis, nor you on any other, Conference is terminated ipso facto; and that you will leave Peshawur on a stated day. The date of it you will fix yourself, but it should be as early as conveniently possible, in order to show we are in earnest and avoid further entanglement. Let your language to Mir Akhor be most friendly. If, in the meanwhile, new Envoys or messengers arrive to continue negotiation you will tell them that your powers are terminated. On closing Conference, write to Ameer friendly letter notifying the fact. I entirely approve your letter to Ameer.”—[Ibid. p. 222.]

Now, my Lords, what is the description given by Lord Lytton himself in his long and able despatch of the 10th of May? His Lordship says—

"Apparently the Ameer, whose object was still to gain time, was much surprised and embarrassed by this step. At the moment when Sir Lewis Pelly was closing the Conference, His Highness was sending to the Mir Akhor instructions to prolong it by every means in his power; a fresh Envoy was already on the way from Cabul to Peshawur; and it was reported that this Envoy had authority to accept eventually all the conditions of the British Government. The Viceroy was aware of these facts when he instructed our Envoy to close the Conference. But it appeared to his Excellency that liabilities which the British Government might properly have contracted on behalf of the present Ameer of Cabul, if that Prince had shown any eagerness to deserve and reciprocate its friendship, could not be advantageously, or even safely, accepted in face of the situation revealed by Sir Lewis Pelly's energetic investigations. Under these circumstances, the prolongation of the Peshawur Conference could only lead to embarrassments and entanglements best avoided by the timely termination of it."—[Ibid. pp. 170-71.]

I think that is a most important fact, and I am not arguing now whether Lord Lytton was right or wrong—I am not arguing the merits of the case in the slightest degree; but I do think that the description in the despatch of November 18 does not fully set forth these important facts. And here I wish to give noble Lords a caution as to the epithets used by the noble Viscount in describing the conduct of Lord Lytton. Lord Lytton has gained all his experience in life in diplomatic circles, and has had no experience of administrative business either in Parliamentary, official, or commercial life; but I must say he sometimes seems to do business in a rather peculiar manner. Now, there is one very curious Paper. I have known all the Viceroys of India for a very long time, and I cannot imagine one of them—Lord Dalhousie, Lord Canning, Lord Elgin, Lord Mayo, or the noble Earl and Baron now in the House—sitting down, as Lord Lytton appears to have done, with a shorthand writer at his back, making a magniloquent speech, interspersed with metaphors of a more or less Oriental character, to his own Envoy, and desiring that Envoy to deliver faithfully that speech, which had taken half or three quarters of an hour in delivery, to the Ameer when he returned to him. The special qualities on which the noble Viscount complimented Lord Lytton are his discretion, consideration, and the conciliation with which he treated the Ameer. Now just let us look at this. As regards his discretion, let us take a few sentences. We find Lord Lytton saying—

"The moment we cease to regard Afghanistan as a friendly and firmly allied State, what is there to prevent us from providing for the security of our Frontier by an understanding with Russia, which might have the effect of wiping Afghanistan out of the map altogether? If the Ameer does not desire to come to a speedy understanding with us, Russia does; and she desires it at his expense."—[Ibid. p. 183.]

Now, I am perfectly ignorant as to whether there is a foundation or not for that declaration of Lord Lytton. I do not know whether the noble Viscount opposite thought it necessary to enter into negotiations with Count Schouvaloff in regard to the partition of Afghanistan. But if it is true, what do you think of Lord Lytton, who was selected from diplomacy of all professions, making such a declaration as this to the Ameer? The Viceroy tells the Ameer that Russia has negotiated with us. Is not that the greatest inducement you can offer to the Ameer to place himself also in communication with Russia? I must, therefore, caution your Lordships against believing in the absolute discretion of Lord Lytton. Then Lord Lytton is praised for the moderation of his monitions to the Ameer. Well—it appears that—

"The Viceroy then said that, if the Ameer remained our friend, this military power could be spread round him as a ring of iron, and, if he became our enemy, it could break him as a reed."—[Ibid.]

A very pleasant alternative indeed! Placing the Ameer in such a position as this reminds me of the alternative suggested by the historic mottoes of the Colonna and Orsini families, one of which I unworthily possess—"You can break, but you cannot bend me," the other being—"You can bend me, but you cannot break me." I do not see how this can be described as great consideration. Then it is said Lord Lytton is so conciliatory. Well, in a subsequent sentence we find Lord Lytton, speaking of the Ameer, saying—

"This is the man who pretends to hold the balance between England and Russia independent of either! His position is rather that of an earthen pipkin between two iron pots."—[Ibid.]

That is not the language of conciliation. There is an omission in the Papers to which I wish to call the attention of the noble Viscount. I refer to the omission of four very important letters, as to which the noble Viscount will no doubt give an explanation, as it was stated that their terms were unusually harsh and had produced a most pernicious effect. The noble Viscount says he never received them. But it is an extraordinary thing that he did not remark the omission of such important documents, which caused the Ameer to describe them as making it impossible for him to accept the proposal. Then, again, I think we should have had the Report of our Envoy the Nawab Gholam Hussein Khan, on his return to Simla, which does not appear in the Papers. My Lords, I said just now that I could not go into the merits of the question, though I think the noble Lords opposite were quite right in doing so. As it is our intention, when the noble Viscount (Viscount Halifax) brings forward his Resolution, to raise the question, I think it is more becoming on the present occasion to abstain. One reproach is frequently addressed to those who belong to the Opposition. We were placed in a very difficult position last year; and one of the complaints made against us was—"You attack the Government, but you do not state your own policy." Now, I entirely deny that anybody has a right to demand—and it would be easy to quote Sir Robert Peel or the present Prime Minister on this subject—an explanation of our policy. I, therefore, deny that I can be called upon to state exactly what I should have done after each false step that has been taken. It often happens in private life that a man comes to you and says—"I have got into a difficulty; what am I to do now?" The answer is—"If you had come to me only a week ago, I think I could have given you very fair advice; but after what you have written and done and said, it is impossible for me to do more than tell you what I think is the least of two evils." If your Lordships would think it worth while to know generally what my policy is, I can state it in a very few words. My policy with regard to the North-Western Frontier of India is the same as that which has been the policy of all the greatest authorities and the most experienced men in India up to the time when the noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Salisbury) took the Seals of the India Office. That is enough to say as to our general policy. If you say all that is passed—we have changed all that, and we are now in a very different position—I can only say at this moment that my policy—and I think I should have the concurrence of my Friends in this—would be that, however strong our opinion may be of the injustice of the conduct of the Government towards the Ameer; however disastrous and unnecessary may have been the bringing about of this war; however much we are convinced that you have effectually played into the hands of our great rival in the East, yet at this moment, the emergency having been created, I would use every effort to induce your Lordships—who, I am sure, need no such persuasion—to co-operate in the strongest manner with the other House of Parliament in making the most ample provision for the sake of the brave and gallant troops with whom we sympathize so entirely. I would go further, and I would press on the Government the consideration whether they really have taken all the precautions that are required—because we could not be certain of the success they would meet with—whether they have sent them sufficient reinforcements, with all the requisites which should be furnished to them. I would also urge the Government to be perfectly frank and open with Parliament, and to tell us the amount of money they require, and the manner in which it is to be raised. I would especially advise them to guard against fallacious Estimates, such as those which were at first produced, and afterwards doubled or nearly trebled, in the case of the Abyssinian War. I would have them explain how far they would leave saddled on the people of India, and how far on the people of this country, the cost of a war which they themselves declare not to be an Indian, but an Imperial one.

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: My Lords, I am deeply indebted to the noble Earl (Earl Granville) for giving me an opportunity, which I might not otherwise have had, of saying what I wish to say in reference to this despatch of the 18th of November. I take upon myself the whole and entire responsibility of that despatch, and I neither apologize for nor retract a single sentence of it. The noble Earl has adopted a different tone from that which has been held out-of-doors. I sat with hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite to me in the other House of Parliament for 20 years, and on no occasion have I known my conduct to be impugned for honesty and integrity. But now, one of those right hon. Gentlemen, in the coarsest invective, has charged me with falsehood, and another has, with more poisonous insinuations, held me up as guilty of that offence. If I have committed the offence which they allege in publishing that despatch—if in writing that despatch I have wantonly or deliberately prejudiced the public mind against a former Ministry without truth and without reason, and with the knowledge that it was false—then I would admit the justice of all the attacks which have been made upon me. But, my Lords, the question is, not whether I have arrived at a right or a wrong conclusion, but whether I took such fair and reasonable means as I was bound to do in arriving at the conclusions stated in that despatch—whether I put down that which would fairly arise in one's mind from an examination of the Papers before me? And in a few moments I think I can prove to your Lordships that what I said in Paragraph 9 is true. I do not deny that what the noble Earl affirms may be the true reading; but I do say that to an outsider reading these Papers the conclusion which I came to is the only legitimate and fair conclusion at which an honest and impartial mind can arrive. That is a fair and open statement, and I propose to vindicate myself upon it. Why did I publish that despatch? For this reason. I am not going now to discuss the question of policy. One noble Lord, an ex-Viceroy of India, has gone about the country spreading his opinions in respect of this matter in letters and speeches, and a noble Earl, another ex-Governor General, has lately spoken upon it at a meeting at Winchester. I make no complaint of that. A right hon. Gentleman, a Member of the other House and a man of the greatest possible influence, has also made a speech, in which he declared the state of things which existed when his Ministry was in Office. Every sort of imputation and insinuation have been directed against the conduct of Her Majesty's Government; and I thought it was only fair that a simple and true historical statement of the case should be given to the public. In preparing that document I sought to conceal nothing on the part of my own Government, and I said nothing offensive—or nothing that was intended to be offensive—against the Government of my Predecessors. I only desired to give a simple, plain, and honest statement, and one which would be justified by the Papers, the production of which was to follow it in a very few days. And when people impute to you that you are a knave, they might at least give you the credit for not being a fool also; for one would hardly give in the margin of a despatch that was false the references to the Papers which would so soon convict it of falsehood. That is an imputation, therefore, which corrects itself. With respect to what has taken place in this House, I have no complaint to make. The noble Earl (the Earl of Northbrook), in a letter addressed to the newspapers, says that I have come to an incorrect conclusion. An incorrect conclusion is one thing; a wilfully false representation is quite another. The noble Earl had a right to speak, and was, I suppose, speaking, of his own policy, and his interpretation of his instructions. All I attempted to do, in my despatch, was to present the version which I thought the Papers would justify. What I wrote had reference to events in 1873, when he was Viceroy; and, first, I would call attention to a despatch which he sent home on the 27th June, 1873. That despatch he sent home with a view of calling the attention, as he said (paragraph 18), of the Government of Russia to what he thought was our policy in Afghanistan. That part of the case has not been spoken of, but it is most material to my view of the case. That paragraph was to this effect—

“Although we have abstained from entering into any Treaty engagement to support the Ameer by British troops, in the event of Afghanistan being attacked from without, yet the complete independence of Afghanistan is so important to the interests of British India that the Government of India could not look upon an attack upon Afghanistan with indifference. So long as the Ameer continues, as he has hitherto done, to act in accordance with our advice in his relations with his neighbours, he would naturally look for material assistance from us; and circumstances might occur under which we should consider it incumbent upon us to recommend Her Majesty's Government to render him such assistance.”—[Afghanistan, No. 1, p. 107.]

Lord Northbrook wished his despatch, with that passage, to be communicated to Russia; and he says—“I propose to inform Cabul Envoy of sense of this paragraph.” That was his proposition—that when the Cabul Envoy came to Simla he would inform him of the intentions of the Government. That despatch was sent home by the Viceroy to the Secretary of State in London, and he got an answer from the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll), whose absence I deplore, because he has written a letter to which I would much rather refer in his presence than in his absence. It is a great disadvantage to me that I am not face to face with him, for he would, I am sure, argue the point fairly. The Secretary of State telegraphed to the Viceroy thus—

“Your telegram of the 27th June. I do not object to the general sense of the paragraph, which you quote as a communication to Russia from the Foreign Office, but great caution is necessary in assuring Ameer of material assistance which may raise undue and unfounded expectation. He already shows symptoms of claiming more than we may wish to give.”—[Ibid. p. 108.]

That was sent on the 1st of July, 1873. Now, what happened? That despatch was sent to the Foreign Office with the view of being communicated to the Russian Government. Was it communicated to the Russian Government? The Duke of Argyll said he did not object to that; but that he did object to statements being made on the subject to the Ameer's Envoy without great caution. In estimating what the opinion of Her Majesty's Government was as to what was to be communicated to the Ameer, it is material that we should see what the Foreign Office said on the subject—because that would indicate what their intentions were about the material assistance which was to be given to the Ameer. Well, the noble Earl the Foreign Secretary (Earl Granville), writing on the 25th of August, 1873, said—

“I am to request that you will state to the Duke of Argyll that Lord Granville would not think it desirable to communicate with the Russian Government, as suggested by the Indian Government, a copy of the former despatch (June 30, 1873), and so convey to it indirectly an intimation that any aggression by it on Afghanistan would be resisted by Great Britain with force of arms.”—[Central Asia, No. 1, p. 206.]

And the noble Earl added that this had reference to present propriety in not indicating a desire to modify our policy with regard to Central Asia, and with respect to Afghanistan in particular. But when I am judging of what the Government of that day meant and intended to do, I must look to the whole of their proceedings. That was in August, after the telegram was received. Thus the Government, which, according to the noble Earl, had sanctioned conditional and material assistance being given to the Ameer, now said that it would not communicate to the Russian Government a copy of the former despatch (of June 30, 1873), and so convey to it indirectly an intimation that any aggression by it on Afghanistan would be resisted by Great Britain by force of arms. If the noble Earl means to put it that he would not submit that communication to Russia, on the ground that Russia would take it as an intimation of an offensive character, all that I can say is that Russia had been informed again and again that we could not view these things with indifference—in fact, the noble Earl the Foreign Secretary had already told the Government of that country that we could not view the question of an advance on Merv with indifference. My view of the transaction was that, in August, 1873, the Government had not come to any determination as to the circumstances in which they could give material assistance in men, arms, and money to the Ameer of Afghanistan. Now, my Lords, I will go a little further. What is the telegram of the noble Duke, which, it is said, has been misrepresented in this despatch? The telegram from the Viceroy to the noble Duke is dated July 24, 1873, and it is to this effect—

“Ameer of Cabul alarmed at Russian progress, dissatisfied with general assurance, and anxious to know definitely how far he may rely on our help if invaded. I propose assuring him that if he unreservedly accepts and acts on our advice in all external relations we will help him with money, arms, and troops, if necessary, to expel unprovoked invasion. We to be the judge of the necessity. Answer by telegraph quickly.”—[Afghanistan, No. 1, p. 108.]

The Viceroy of India either knew the “settled policy” of his Government at home at the time or he did not. If he knew that it was the settled policy of his Government to give material assistance to the Ameer on certain conditions, why did he send this telegram to the noble Duke asking for a speedy answer? He had received one answer, telling him he must exercise great discretion in the matter—he had had a conversation with the Envoy, and had said that it was probable that, under certain circumstances, assistance would be given.

Now to that telegram, asking for further assurances and for help in money and arms, what was the answer? The reply of the noble Duke was this—

"Cabinet thinks you should inform Ameer that we do not at all share his alarm, and consider there is no cause for it; but you may assure him we shall maintain our settled policy in favour of Afghanistan, if he abides by our advice in external affairs."—[Ibid.]

"Our settled policy in favour of Afghanistan!" Where is it to be found? I cannot find it. The noble Earl (Earl Granville) has complained that during a certain period of late date no despatches appear to have passed between the Home and the Indian Governments; but I think your Lordships will view with astonishment the fact that during the whole of the time that the Duke of Argyll was Secretary of State for India, and the noble Earl (the Earl of Northbrook) was Viceroy, not a single despatch on this subject sent by the noble Duke to the noble Earl the Viceroy can be found, and that the only indication of the policy of the Duke of Argyll on the matter is to be found in the telegram now before us. That, my Lords, is something startling—and yet the noble Duke is amazed and indignant that I should have misrepresented him. The only other document in which the noble Duke refers to Afghanistan is his letter to Lord Mayo, and that merely deals with questions connected with the internal affairs of that country, without in any way touching upon its external relations with other nations. There is certainly no despatch from the noble Duke which indicates any "settled policy" with regard to furnishing material assistance in men, arms, and money to the Ameer. There is no despatch—and it is a remarkable thing that though there is this despatch of the Viceroy, of June 13, there is no despatch of the noble Duke acknowledging it. Going a little further, let us see what really did pass between the noble Earl and the Envoy of the Ameer. In page 112 of the Papers it will be found that the Viceroy observed—

"That if in the event of any aggression from without, British influence were invoked and failed by negotiation to effect a satisfactory settlement, it was probable that the British Government would in that case afford the Ruler of Afghanistan material assistance in repelling an invader. Such assistance would, of course, be conditional on the Ameer following the advice of the British Government, and having himself abstained from aggression."—[Ibid. 112.]

Viscount Cranbrook

That was the statement in the first conversation, which was subsequent to the first telegram. Then we come to the second conversation, which occurred after the receipt of the noble Duke's telegram. It appears from the Papers—

"That his Excellency proceeded to say that Lord Mayo had assured the Ameer that any representation he might make would 'always be treated with consideration and respect,' and his Excellency was quite prepared to maintain the policy of Lord Lawrence and Lord Mayo, and to entertain in a similar spirit the request now proffered."—[Ibid. 113.]

Now, Lord Mayo had never done anything with regard to the external affairs of the country, and Lord Lawrence had, so far as I know, given no promise with regard to material assistance to the Ameer. Then there is the further point as to what the noble Earl said to the Envoy. On page 114, in reply to the Envoy, who was pressing for definite promises of assistance, it appears that—

"His Excellency the Viceroy replied that the British Government did not share the Ameer's apprehensions, but that as already mentioned in the previous conversation, it would be the duty of the Ameer, in case of any actual or threatened aggression, to refer the question to the British Government, who would endeavour by negotiation and by every means in their power to settle the matter and avert hostilities. It was not intended, by insisting on such previous reference to the British Government, to restrict or interfere with the power of the Ameer as an independent Ruler to take such steps as might be necessary to repel any aggression on his territories, but such reference was a preliminary and essential condition of the British Government assisting him. In such event, should those endeavours of the British Government to bring about an amicable settlement prove fruitless, the British Government are prepared to assure the Ameer that they will afford him assistance in the shape of arms and money, and will also in case of necessity aid him with troops. The British Government holds itself perfectly free to decide as to the occasion when such assistance should be rendered, and also as to its nature and extent: moreover, the assistance will be conditional upon the Ameer himself abstaining from aggression, and on his unreserved acceptance of the advice of the British Government in regard to his external relations."—[Ibid. 114.]

Well, my Lords, if it seemed probable to the Ameer in the former conversation that he was to get the assistance of the British Government, I think that when he heard all the guarding and cautioning that were laid down in the second conversation he would have considered it very problematical whether he was to get any assistance at all. It will be observed that there is not a word in that second conversation about our "settled policy." I can only say that I think the inference I have drawn from the language of the noble Lord a perfectly just one. On the 6th of September, 1873, he writes to the Ameer—

"I have had some conversation with your Envoy on the subject of the policy which the British Government would pursue in the event of an attack on your Highness's territories. A copy of the record of these conversations is attached to this letter. But the question is in my opinion one of such importance that the discussion of it should be postponed to a more suitable opportunity."—[Ibid. 816.]

Thus nothing was done except in the way of conversation—nothing definitely settled. Nothing is said in that letter about promises or assurances; and, therefore, nothing having been done, nothing settled, nothing complete, I consider that the inference which I drew was a just and legitimate one, and that I fairly expressed it in the ninth paragraph of the despatch. The Government said in a telegram that they did not agree with the alarms of the Viceroy about the Ameer. If they had, the telegram would have been direct in its answer, instead of being general terms, such as "your proposals approved" would have been used; and this view of the telegram is supported by the letter of the Viceroy, who said that he would give no assurances, and that the whole question would be postponed for future consideration. I do not pretend to be infallible; I may be mistaken: but I consider that the view which I took was a perfectly legitimate view. There was a statement made by the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) in the debate which took place in June, 1877, and I gather from what he then said, as I gathered from these Papers, that he was in favour of a policy of masterly inactivity; that they were desirous of being on friendly terms with the Ameer; but that they should not bind themselves by any obligations to him beyond being generally friendly, and giving him assistance in arms and money in order to consolidate his strength. The noble Duke said—

"The policy of the last three Viceroys of India towards that country had been one of watchfulness and friendly support. We do not wish to tangle ourselves in any permanent arrangements towards that Sovereign."—[3 Hansard, ccxxxiv. 1831.]

I look to the Papers, and the deduction

I draw from them is, I think, a fair and just conclusion, and is borne out by that observation of the noble Duke. My only object in this discussion has been to vindicate myself from the charge of unfairness. I can say most sincerely that when I was told that paragraph 9 had been found fault with, I searched in every direction to see what the ground of complaint was; and it was not till I read some of the violent speeches made that I at all imagined what it was I was supposed to have mis-stated. I have given you my reasons for coming to the conclusion I did; and I say most distinctly that if I had to re-write that paragraph with the same Papers before me, I should re-write it in the terms I originally adopted. I have already said that I accept the noble Earl's statement of the understanding which he put upon the noble Duke's telegram. With regard to the Commissioner's letters to which allusion has been made, I have only to say that they were not letters addressed to the Ameer personally, but to Gholam Hussein and the Mustaufi, and that they have now been placed on the Table with certain other Papers. It is complained that Parliament has never been informed of these things; but I would point out that none of these Papers relating to Afghanistan previous to 1874—and they were very important—were put before Parliament by our Predecessors. Nothing was said about them. That, however, is a question of policy, and I do not mean to go into it. The Viceroy's speeches form another subject into which I need not now enter. They were delivered at a time when I was not Secretary of State for India; and my present object, as I have already said, is only to vindicate myself, not to go into questions of policy. I think it will be an evil day for this country if one Party begins to make personal charges against the Gentlemen sitting opposite them; and it will not tend to the friendly intercourse which I have had with those who have been opposed to me. In becoming a Member of a Government succeeding another, I cannot call to mind that in one instance—though I may have differed from the policy of my Predecessors—I have ever imputed to them anything wilfully wrong in their action. In the present case I contend that I have full justification for the language I have used, and upon that point I have given evidence which, from my point of view, appears conclusive. If I have arrived at an incorrect conclusion with regard to the policy of the noble Lord opposite, I maintain that it was a fair and reasonable conclusion, and one which might have been taken by any one conscientiously studying the question.

EARL GREY, who rose with Lord Northbrook and was very imperfectly heard, was understood to say that he was sorry to interfere with his noble Friend, who was no doubt anxious to vindicate his own conduct as Viceroy of India; but he thought there was a question of far higher national importance than that as to the comparative merits and faults of different Ministries and Governors General of India, which could best be discussed on this occasion, and to which it was high time to come. The question to which he adverted was whether Ministers, in omitting to advise Her Majesty to consult Parliament when they considered it necessary to order preparations to be made for entering upon hostilities with the Ameer, had acted as they ought to have done? The question seemed to him one of such importance that it was his intention to raise it formally by an Amendment on the Address. The noble Earl (Earl Granville) had said that to move an Amendment on the Address was an inconvenient course; but with that he (Earl Grey) was not disposed to agree. There were questions which could only properly be brought under discussion by an Amendment on the Address. The old Parliamentary practice of moving Amendments on the Address was a right and proper practice; and it was invariably followed in the best periods of our Parliamentary history, and it ought not to be abandoned. At the same time, he agreed that the whole question of the justice and policy of this war might, perhaps, be best discussed on the Motion of which the noble Viscount the Secretary of State for India had given Notice, and he would not, therefore, enter into it at present. The question to which he wished to call their Lordships' attention was this—Was it right that this country should be involved in a terrible war—for it was a terrible war they had now in hand—without an opportunity having been afforded to Parliament of expressing an opinion upon its justice or expediency? He was quite aware that it was the Prerogative of the Crown to declare war; and he was strongly of opinion that that power was properly placed in the hands of the Sovereign. He believed that detriment to the national interest would result if a large discretionary power was not intrusted to the Executive Government. At the same time, although it was the Prerogative of the Crown to declare war, it had, formerly at least, been held to be equally the duty of the Ministers of the Crown not to exercise that great Prerogative without giving Parliament the earliest information on the subject, and without calling for the opinion of Parliament and asking its approval of the course they had decided to take. He could point out many instances in which that rule had been acted upon; indeed, he could not recollect any instance in the best times of our Parliamentary history when a different course had been followed. The practice—as he believed the invariable practice—had been that when the servants of the Crown found that a necessity for war was about to arise they advised the Sovereign, by formal Message, to announce that to Parliament, and to ask for its support. Thus, when the great Revolutionary War broke out, Mr. Pitt did not wait for the commencement of hostilities in order to communicate with Parliament. On the contrary, on the 23rd of January, 1793, a Message from the Crown was sent to the House of Commons in reference to the relations between England and France, and recommending Parliament that provision might be made for an augmentation of the Forces; and it was not until a fortnight after that war had actually begun that Mr. Pitt brought down another Message saying that war had been declared by France against England. In like manner, after the Peace of Amiens, when the relations between this country and France were again embarrassed, a Message was brought down on the 8th of March stating that danger of war rendered desirable an increase of the Forces, and it was not until the 16th of May that a further announcement was made. Those two instances would prove to their Lordships that when this country was involved in danger of war, the announcement to Parliament was not deferred until the war had begun; but when the danger became serious, it was at once made known to Parliament, and the support of Parliament requested. And the advantage of that practice was also illustrated by two cases in which no war actually followed after Messages from the Crown to announce its probability, and in which the sending of those Messages contributed much to avert the threatened danger. In 1790 great indignation was excited in this country by the seizure by Spain of two British ships in Nootka Sound, and on the 5th of May Parliament was informed by a Message from the Crown that no satisfaction had been made or offered by Spain for this outrage, and

"His Majesty has judged it indispensably necessary to give orders for making such preparations as may put it in His Majesty's power to act with vigour."—[Parl. History, vol. 28, p. 766.]

This appeal was promptly and unanimously answered; and the Spanish Government, influenced probably by the determination of the country and the Legislature to support its Government, gave way, and war was avoided. In the following year the British Government was disposed to interfere between Russia and Turkey, in order to obtain better terms than Russia was inclined to grant, and a Message was sent to Parliament asking for a grant of money to increase our Naval Force to enforce our mediation. But that proposal was met with strong opposition in Parliament and the country. The Government carried the Vote it had proposed, and Resolutions which were moved against its intended measures were rejected, but by majorities so small, in comparison with those that Mr. Pitt was usually supported by, that, although the Naval Force was for a short time augmented, it was speedily reduced, and it was not used in the manner the Government originally intended, and the policy of the Government was very considerably modified, so much so, that when the subject was referred to in the following Session Lord Hawkesbury said it had been clear that the opinion of the country had been against war with Russia, and Ministers were not ashamed of deferring to it. These two cases showed completely the great importance of Parliament being informed in due time of what was intended. In the one case, the support of Parliament induced Spain to give way, and to abandon an untenable position; and in the other, such a manifestation of opinion was produced that so powerful a Minister as Mr. Pitt thought it proper and necessary to yield to the opinion of the country; so that in both instances the practice of making a timely communication to Parliament had been the means of saving the nation from the calamity of war. Nothing could more clearly support the principle for which he contended—that Parliament ought not to be committed to a war without timely information, so that it might judge of the necessity and justice of the war. He maintained that when war was imminent the announcement to Parliament should not be deferred until hostilities had actually commenced; but that, when danger became so serious as to make warlike preparations necessary, it should be made known, and the support of the Legislature invited. Parliament ought not to be led into a war without timely information, so that, if its judgment should be against hostilities, it might have an opportunity of interfering; and he felt so strongly on this subject—believing the old Constitutional principle for which he contended to be so important, and holding that the departure from it, in the present instance, had been accompanied with so much injury to the country—that it was his intention now to move, as he did in a similar case in 1857, an Amendment to the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. His Amendment was to insert after the first paragraph the following words:—

("We beg humbly to express to your Majesty our sorrow that the great calamity should have occurred of a war with the Ameer of Afghanistan, and we feel it to be our duty very respectfully to express to your Majesty our regret that as soon as your Majesty's servants were satisfied that war had become so probable as to impose upon them the necessity of ordering costly preparations for it to be commenced, they did not advise your Majesty to summon Parliament to meet with the least possible delay, in order that due provision might be made for the expense to be incurred, and that an opportunity might be offered to Parliament, before the war was begun, of considering the grounds on which it was to be undertaken, and of forming a judgment as to its justice and necessity.")

terms; at the same time, it might be of service in upholding what he believed to be a great Constitutional principle. He asserted the right of Parliament to be consulted upon a matter of this kind, and especially to express an opinion upon the objects of a war. He agreed that they must now postpone a discussion of the policy and justice of the war; but though he could not then state his reasons for so doing, he would not shrink from taking this earliest opportunity of expressing his strong opinion that the war in which they were now engaged was flagrantly unjust, and as impolitic as it was unjust—so impolitic that even if its success were complete the consequences might be only less disastrous and injurious to the country than defeat. For what would happen—what would be the result of success? It must, however successful it might prove, cause an expense which, in the present state of the finances, both of England and of India, would be most inconvenient; and, at the same time, it would have the effect of totally alienating Afghanistan from us, and making its population our bitter enemies, driving them to throw themselves into the arms of that very great Power of whom we were so much afraid—Russia. That was not his own opinion only; it was the opinion entertained and publicly expressed by men of far greater knowledge, whose opinions and judgment were entitled to far greater weight than his own. It was the opinion entertained by a very large number of people in this country; and though you might prove it to be wrong, he maintained that before we were involved in a war of this kind Parliament ought to have had an opportunity of discussing the question. Nor would it have been difficult to afford Parliament that opportunity. It appeared, from the Papers before the House, that as early as the end of September, or the beginning of October, measures for collecting troops and other measures of a preparatory nature were actually in progress. This, therefore, was the time when, according to the practice of former times and the conduct pursued by Governments in earlier periods, what was going on ought to have been made known to Parliament, and Parliament ought to have been enabled to pronounce its judgment. If every Cabinet, no matter of what Party it might be composed, were to be entitled, without the slightest previous warning or intimation, to enter on a war which might extend indefinitely, as this war might extend, from hostilities with the Ameer to hostilities with Russia, then there was virtually an end of anything like a free Constitution. In regard to the present war, Parliament and the country had been kept entirely in the dark; and not only that, but they had been expressly assured that there was no change of policy on the part of Her Majesty's Government which was likely to involve us in such a war. So late as 1877 a positive assurance was given by the noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Salisbury) that there was no such change intended; although it was now perfectly clear from the Papers on the Table that already a great change had actually taken place. Whereas formerly the Ameer of Afghanistan had been assured that he would not be pressed to receive a British Agent, that course was ultimately pressed upon him in such a manner as to lead to the war now going on. Looking at the practice of former times and Governments, he maintained that the course adopted by Her Majesty's Ministers in the present instance was a fatal departure from that practice, and that the country ought not to have been involved in an unjust and impolitic war in a secret and clandestine manner; but that proper notice ought to have been given of what was taking place, so that Parliament might have had an opportunity of discussing the matter. Entertaining that feeling so strongly, he felt it his duty to submit his Amendment, as expressing his strong disapproval of, and protest against, the course which had been adopted by Her Majesty's Government.

Amendment moved, to insert after the first paragraph—

(" We beg humbly to express to your Majesty our sorrow that the great calamity should have occurred of a war with the Ameer of Afghanistan, and we feel it to be our duty very respectfully to express to your Majesty our regret that as soon as your Majesty's servants were satisfied that war had become so probable as to impose upon them the necessity of ordering costly preparations for it to be commenced, they did not advise your Majesty to summon Parliament to meet with the least possible delay, in order that due provision might be made for the expense to be incurred, and that an opportunity might be offered to Parliament, before the war was begun,

of considering the grounds on which it was to be undertaken, and of forming a judgment as to its justice and necessity.")—(The Earl Grey.)

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET: My Lords, I cannot approve the noble Earl's Amendment. It appears to me that the propositions laid down in that Amendment interfere with the Prerogative of the Crown and diminish the responsibility of Ministers. The noble Earl has mentioned several precedents. He quoted the case of 1793; but in that case we did not declare war. The war was declared on the opposite side of the Channel: that precedent, therefore, was inapplicable. In the case of the Abyssinian War there was a debate in the House of Commons, and on that occasion Mr. Gladstone stated that it was the right course—that it was the duty of Ministers to take the responsibility of declaring war upon themselves, coming to Parliament afterwards. I shall not go into the personal question to-night. It would take some time; but surely nobody can suppose that the noble Lord the Secretary of State for India would intentionally mis-state the case. He has tried to do what, no doubt, is very difficult—to draw up a précis of the opinion of the opposite party—and he only failed where all historians have failed. Going into details, it would not be difficult to show that every history is untrue in some respects; and, for my own part, I do not know any history that is perfectly true. But I come to the more serious question—the question of this war. I cannot agree with the speech of my noble Friend below me (Earl Grey). He says it is an unjust war—not only an unjust, but an impolitic war—a war which, whatever its result, you will be worse off at the end of than you are now; but, on the other hand, the noble Earl (Earl Granville) said he would go on with it, and although it was contrary to justice and to policy, and likely to be profitless, nevertheless, he would urge the country to give every assistance to carry it through. There seems to me, my Lords, a very serious contradiction there. If I thought a war both unjust and impolitic, I would do what I could to prevent it. As to Russian aggression, I remember in 1873 my noble Friend, representing Mr. Gladstone's Government, stated that Russia coming to Khiva was to be looked upon with great concern, not only on account of England, but on account of India. But surely if Russia reached Cabul, there would be still more danger. And what did the late and the present Government say? Both the former and the present Government had agreed that Russia could not be allowed to have a preponderating influence in Afghanistan. Will you, my Lords, allow it? If you will, then say so. There was a neutral zone; but that is gone. What, then, are you asked to do? You must make some other provision. I confess, my Lords, much as I regret it, this war appears to me to be unavoidable. I do not see how the Government could take any other course than that they have taken. I say so with deep feeling, because I well remember the disasters and the deplorable mismanagement that occurred in 1838. My Lords, then we were united; now, I am sorry to say, there has been formed what is called "an Afghan Committee," who are anxious to encourage the Ameer and the enemies of the Queen. I think it a misfortune that any such Committee should have been formed; and I deeply deplore that a noble Lord who has been Governor General, and who is peculiarly acquainted with that country (Lord Lawrence), should have thought fit, no doubt conscientiously, to put himself at the head of that Committee. I regret it, because that noble Lord was an ornament to India, and is an ornament to your Lordships' House. In speaking thus I do not mean to pledge myself that all the measures taken from 1873 to the present time were judicious in all respects. Far from it. But the great question of all is, What are we to do? I, for one, give my cordial assent to the policy of the Government, because I do not see what else they could do. It is not speeches that are wanted, but action; and I hope that vigorous action on their part will bring the war to a successful issue.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, after the small personal details to which we have had to listen this evening, your Lordships must have listened with pleasure to the courageous and patriotic speech which we have just heard. I wish it may produce the same effect upon others who share the general political opinions of the Speaker, but who have not been able to imitate his patriotism. But, my Lords, that speech makes me the more regret that I am compelled, on personal grounds, to pursue another course. I deeply feel the wretchedness of the small personal details which I am obliged, out of deference to others, to bring before your Lordships, but I have no other alternative. I have often noticed the singular skill of the Leader of the Opposition and noble Lords on the other side. Perhaps some might have thought that when the fallacies employed were being exposed by my noble Friend (Viscount Cranbrook) the noble Earl opposite would have felt discomfited; but I traced no sense of discomfiture upon his countenance. He is too well satisfied with the result of the stratagem to which recourse has been had. The noble Earl's policy is to draw aside the attention of the country from the broad issues before it, and, if possible, to conceal the fact that his favourite, his most attached, political Friends have been taking the side of the enemies of their country. That is a matter upon which the traditions of the Party to which he belongs naturally make him sensitive. The noble Earl has shown singular judgment and astuteness at this, perhaps the most important, political juncture which this country has witnessed in this generation, in turning your debates almost entirely upon questions of small personal attack. I admit, however, that though the imputations which he had to make were not of a very pleasant nature, he put them in words to which no exception can be taken. I do not wish to detain your Lordships on this personal matter; but the accusation which the noble Earl made against me was substantially this—that being questioned by the Duke of Argyll I misled the House as to the real state of the case. The noble Earl quoted my words in justification of that charge. He began by saying that my words would indicate what the nature of the Duke of Argyll's Question had been. I regret that he did not quote the actual Question of the Duke of Argyll. When a legal opinion is produced, it is usual to give the question on which the legal opinion was founded. When the dictum of a Judge is quoted it is a matter of ordinary practice to ask what was the precise nature of the case to which the dictum refers. Words taken by themselves are often misleading, instead of giving information. As I understand the charge of the noble Earl, it is that at a time when I knew that Sir Lewis Pelly had been commissioned to go to Cabul I denied that any Envoy had been sent to Cabul at all. Now, my Lords, it is necessary to read the Question of the Duke of Argyll to which I replied. What he said is spread over a speech of considerable length—I will not read many passages, but I will select some of them. They go to show that what the Duke of Argyll was asked was as to whether it was true that I had forced on the Ameer of Cabul a Resident at his Court. The Duke of Argyll said—

“No doubt it would be very convenient to have a Resident at Cabul, if you could get a man for the place, and that he was received with cordiality; but it was notorious for a long time past that the present Ameer had set his face against having such an officer in his Court. . . . Rumour said that the Government of India had determined upon a change of policy, and had resolved to insist on the Ameer having a resident British Envoy at his Court.”—
[3 Hansard, ccxxxiv. 1830.]

Well, my Lords, the noble Earl said, parenthetically in the course of his remarks, that I should not attempt to explain the statement by observing that what we had deliberately attempted to do was to attempt to induce the Ameer to receive resident Envoys at other places besides Cabul. I dare say when the noble Earl made that observation, he thought it was unimportant whether the Ameer received an Envoy at Cabul or Herat. But the difference is essential. Her Majesty's Government had been impressed with the opinion that to ask the Ameer to receive an Envoy at Cabul would be not only idle, but unwise, because of the turbulent and revengeful character of the population, which would render the residence of the Envoy dangerous. Moreover, there is no doubt that a Resident at Cabul would have such powers of interfering in the internal government of Afghanistan, and of overshadowing the dignity of the Prince himself, that such a proposal would have very naturally raised objections in the mind of the Ameer—objections which it was the desire of Her Majesty's Government to avoid raising. We did not want to interfere in the internal government of Afghanistan or to overshadow the authority of the Ameer. What we wanted was to have officers on the Frontier, who might see something of what was going on within them and beyond them. I need hardly explain to the House why we should wish to know what was going on in Afghanistan. It is sufficient to say that the year before Khiva had been occupied—without going further I am sure the House will understand why we desired to know what was going on in Turkestan and in the Ameer's territories, without having any intention whatever of interfering in the internal government of Afghanistan or overshadowing the Ameer in his own Court. I dwell upon this point to show that the difference between asking for an Agent at Herat and at Cabul is immense. It was a distinction upon which the Ameer insisted all along. We have a curious account in Lord Lytton's letters in 1877, derived from officers who saw the Ameer at Umballa. A considerable number of them represented that they knew from personal knowledge that while the Ameer was willing to admit an Agent at Herat, or on his Frontiers, he would not admit one at Cabul. We were exceedingly careful to avoid making this particular demand to which the Ameer was certain to object. My first instructions to Lord Northbrook were, that he should take measures for obtaining the assent of the Ameer to the establishment of a British Envoy at Herat; but I did not suggest any similar step with regard to Cabul. Lord Lytton, when he came to propose the terms on which the negotiations should be conducted, was careful to make a similar distinction. He says, in Article 5 of the Treaty, he proposed that for the protection of the Afghan Frontier British Agents should reside at Herat, and at such other places as might be agreed upon by the contracting Powers; but further on the Treaty says, that unless and until it is otherwise agreed, a Native Agent only should reside at Cabul. With this understanding I think your Lordships will see that my reply to the Duke of Argyll was absolutely correct. I had first to inform him that I could not give him any positive knowledge. The circumstances at the time were difficult and critical in the extreme. Russia was in arms; great irritation prevailed; no one knew whether the war would not spread much further than its original area; and whatever the policy of Her Majesty's Government might be, and whatever duties it might be called upon to perform, this, at least, was our duty—not to bias in any way the policy of the country, nor to add to its difficulties and dangers by any imprudent language of our own. It was, therefore, our duty not to say much of that which I say now, and which is said in the Papers before the House. Consequently, I told the Duke of Argyll that I could not give him much positive information, but that I could give him some negative information. The negative information was this—that we had not tried to force an Envoy on the Ameer at Cabul, and that we had not suggested Sir Lewis Pelly as an Envoy at Cabul. Now, I want to know why the noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville) insinuates that I said anything contrary to the most perfect truth in the reply I made to the Duke of Argyll. The noble Earl who sits on the cross-benches (Earl Grey) talked of my having stated that there had been no change of policy as regards Afghanistan. I must charitably suppose that the noble Earl spoke without having taken the trouble to read the speech to which he referred. There is no such statement in that speech. The noble Earl remarked that I said that our relations with the Ameer had undergone no material change since last year, and that the Ameer's feelings towards the British Government were not more embittered than they had been. Now, if I had said that his feelings were not more embittered towards us than they had been when Lord Mayo met him at Umballa, there might be a considerable doubt as to the accuracy of that statement. His feelings are undoubtedly a matter of some mystery; but I have little doubt that they have gone on deteriorating progressively against us from the time when Sir John Lawrence came to the unfortunate resolution not to take what has been called the honest double-dealing policy with regard to the candidates for the Throne of Afghanistan. I have no doubt they became worse and worse. There was a slight improvement, however, during the Viceroyalty of Lord Mayo; but during the Viceroyalty of Lord Northbrook there were several circumstances which caused them to become worse and worse. There was that unfortunate arbitration at Seistan, with which the Ameer was profoundly dissatisfied; and which only added one to the list of those arbitrations which have not precisely produced that perfect good feeling which the devisers of the system hoped for. Then there was an act which reflects great credit on Lord Northbrook, who was then Viceroy, but which much displeased the Ameer. That was Lord Northbrook's interposition to save the son of the Ameer, Yakoob Khan, from suffering the worst results of one of the most atrocious acts of perfidy which even an Afghan Ruler ever committed. What I desired to express, and what was a distinct and a true answer to all the questions of the Duke of Argyll, was, that the policy which led to the Conference of Peshawur had not made any unfavourable difference in the dispositions of the Ameer—his feelings were already as hostile to us as they could well be. I can only go to the official documents. The noble Earl says—what is perfectly true—that I received the despatch of Lord Lytton about a week before I made that answer in the House. Well, what are we take as proof of the Ameer's relations towards us? I will first take the Ameer's own account. I find this in Lord Lytton's despatch—

"So completely had the whole movement collapsed before we closed the Conference at Peshawur, that the first step taken by the Ameer, immediately after that event, was to send messengers to the authorities and population of Candahar, informing them that the jihad project was abandoned, requesting them to do all in their power to allay the religious excitement he had till then been endeavouring to arouse, and adding that his relations with the British Government were eminently satisfactory."—[Afghanistan, No. 1, p. 171.]

With that statement in my hands, I could not say in this House that our relations with the Ameer were unsatisfactory. Lord Lytton, in the meanwhile, said—

"We see no reason to anticipate any act of aggression on the part of the present Ameer;"

and he added—

"Our relations with him are still such as we commonly maintain with the Chiefs of neighbouring and friendly countries."—[Ibid.]

That is exactly the position which it was the ambition of Lord Lawrence, and, subsequently, of Lord Northbrook, to maintain. What was my own official estimate some three months later of the state of things? I said we had been engaged in negotiations, the object of which was not to maintain our relations with the Ameer unchanged, but to make them more friendly than they had been. He refused our advances, and when I spoke in the House I knew that those advances had been refused. My statement, therefore, was in all its parts strictly in accordance with the facts. We have now before us not the original Address, but an Amendment to it; and the noble Earl has based his Amendment on statements implying that the Prerogative of the Crown has been used to encroach on the privileges of Parliament. It is saying, in a more distinct form, what was again and again intimated by the noble Earl who opened on that side, and what has been stated by Mr. Gladstone at Greenwich. It is the charge included in that curious phrase "personal government," of which we have heard so much of late. I always believed—and every one else believed—that when this phrase was constantly reiterated it meant some return to the days of Charles I., and some overthrow of the Constitution established in 1688. But now it appears from Mr. Gladstone that he never meant that. He says the phrase is awkward perhaps, but it is one to which they are well accustomed, and that it applies, not to Her Majesty, but to Her Majesty's Ministers. Well, personal government of some kind you must have. Somebody must do the work of government. If it is not done by the responsible Ministers, it must be done by the permanent officials; or, if not done by the latter, it must be done by the Chief Clerks—and if not by the Chief Clerks by the Assistant Clerks. I suppose that what the noble Earl who has moved this Amendment really referred to is the idea that it is the duty of the Crown, before it exercises the Prerogative of making peace or war, to consult Parliament. Great efforts have been made to persuade the country that we have done something essentially un-Constitutional in what we have done in this respect. The assertion has been repeated again and again without proof, till—as such assertions get to be accepted by sheer repetition—there are some people who believe it. I think there are some people who believe that in concluding the Anglo-Turkish Convention without the knowledge of Parliament we did something without precedent. But some ingenious person in the House of Commons, to try the matter, moved for a Return of all the Treaties which were laid on the Table of the House before they were ratified, and not one could be produced. The truth is, that some of the most important and most recent engagements in our history have been concluded by the Ministers of the Crown without any reference to, or knowledge of, Parliament. I will only state two, and they will be sufficient. Few more important things have been done in our generation than the sacrifice of that right of search for which our forefathers fought. I do not say whether it was right or wrong; I only say that few more important things have been done. Yet that was done—the Declaration of Paris was accepted and signed—without any intimation to Parliament of what was going to be done; and so complete was the absence of any official form about it, that I believe that now no records can be discovered of the instructions given for signing it or of the object with which it was concluded. Again, take the Tripartite Treaty of 1856, which bound us to fight for every inch of Turkish soil if we were challenged to do so either by France or Austria. It was a Treaty most large in its engagements, and most precise in its language. That is in the same condition. No intimation was given to Parliament before it was signed, and you find no record of the motives which induced the Ministers to conclude it. In fact, you will hardly find any Treaty of an important political character which was not concluded under similar conditions as far as the ignorance of Parliament was concerned. Well, the case is the same with regard to declarations of war. I have in my hand a long list of successive declarations of war since 1815, and I am unable to discover that any considerable number of them—I doubt whether any of them except the Crimean War—was communicated to Parliament before it was undertaken. Allow me to give three or four recent precedents to the House—I mean precedents within the lifetime of Lord Palmerston, who was not a Tory, and who was a very considerable authority on Constitutional practice. The Afghan War was declared by Lord Auckland in October, 1838, with the consent and the full authority of the Home Government; and the first time it was communicated to Parliament was in the Queen's Speech on the 5th of February, 1839. Then there is the war in Syria—a very considerable and important operation. On the 15th of July, 1840, while Parliament was still sitting, the Government concluded a Treaty with the other three Powers, to the exclusion of France, without either consulting Parliament beforehand or informing them of it afterwards. The result of that Treaty was the military operations in the Levant which took place in the winter, and Parliament was not called together until January, 1841, when the whole thing was over. Take, again, the case of the Persian War—a case as nearly on all fours with the present one as can be. Persia, like Afghanistan, is an Oriental country, and about equal to it in power, and the interests that were concerned were in the same manner partly European and partly Asiatic. But the Persian War was determined on by the Government at home during the Recess of 1856-7; the assembling of Parliament was not hastened in the least degree, and Parliament was informed of the war for the first time in 1857. I think the noble Earl on the cross benches (Earl Grey) protested against it then as he does now, and there were protests of the same kind made in the other House; and what was Lord Palmerston's reply? He said that in the case of an expedition against Persia—a remote country, and one not likely to entail on us any considerable efforts—considering that in the ordinary course Parliament would speedily assemble, to call it specially together under those circumstances would only be a burlesque on our Constitutional forms.

EARL GREY was understood to say, that Lord Palmerston admitted the principle that Parliament ought to be informed as soon as possible when war was to be made; but contended that the Persian War had been one of so little importance that to summon Parliament specially at an inconvenient season on account of its occurrence would have been a burlesque.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: It is perfectly true that he said that whenever this country becomes involved with one of the great Powers of Europe or with the United States of America—not before, but when we become so involved—it is the duty of the Government to call Parliament together and ask it for the means of carrying the struggle on. But in the case of a collision with such a Power as Afghanistan—a remote country, and one which is not likely to entail upon us any considerable efforts—it would be, according to Lord Palmerston's words, only a burlesque of Constitutional forms to call Parliament together when it was commenced. Therefore, the criticism of Lord Palmerston—if he were here—would be, not that we have exaggerated the Prerogative of the Crown or disparaged the privileges of Parliament, but that in our excessive tenderness for Parliament, and to avoid the slightest appearance of treating it with disrespect, we are actually burlesquing Constitutional forms. There is another case—that of the Abyssinian War. On July 25, 1867, the then Foreign Secretary declared to Parliament that the Government had not decided on sending an expeditionary force. In the following August an expeditionary force against King Theodore was decided on; but the fact was not communicated to Parliament until the Prorogation, when there was no opportunity of debate; and the intention of going to war was never communicated to Parliament until the war was entirely over. The Expedition left Bombay in September, and the fact was not officially communicated to Parliament until the Queen's Speech of the 19th November. I am not here to deny that you will find on these occasions men of the type of the noble Earl on the cross benches (Earl Grey) who then raised objections. It is very probable that that was so; but what I say is, that in all those instances, whatever the objections were, be they small or large, they did not represent the dominant feeling of Parliament; that Parliament is in the last resort the supreme determiner of its own privileges; and that Parliament has always admitted precisely that use of the Prerogative—or rather a much more extensive use than that which we have had recourse to on the present occasion. There is only one other remark that I will venture to make. It is on a matter of a personal character, in reply to some observations which have been made on the personal characteristics of Lord Lytton. I heard with regret the observations made by the noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville). I admit that it is the Prerogative and the duty of Parliament to scrutinize and, if necessary, condemn the action of the servants of the Crown. On the other hand, every generous mind will feel that men in situations of extreme responsibility, and who have the greatest difficulties to contend with, ought not at the same time to have the painful feeling that they are being treated ungenerously. If the noble Earl had been content merely to condemn the measures which have been taken by Lord Lytton, of course the answer was ready—those measures were either before or afterwards approved by his official superiors, and on them the whole Parliamentary responsibility must fall. But when the noble Earl goes so far as to ridicule him because, as the noble Earl puts it, he made a speech in the presence of his own Envoy, and employed a shorthand writer to take it down—or, as I should rather put it, he followed the usual course after such an interview and corrected the Memorandum of what had been said during its progress—I think the noble Earl trespasses beyond the line which ought to be observed in criticising absent public servants. I can only say that on our part we cannot accept, in the slightest degree, the shadow of the censure which has proceeded from the noble Earl. We have the greatest cause to be indebted to Lord Lytton for the devotion with which he has given himself to the great task that he has undertaken, and for the high qualities that he has displayed. I do not know what Lord Lytton's precise nationality is; but he has combined the imagination of a poet with the shrewdness of a Scotchman. He has a singular combination of qualities. The remarkable eloquence which he shows in all his speeches and despatches might give you the impression that he was a man whose gifts were purely those of imagination, if you had not followed him through the details of his official career and been enabled to satisfy yourself that in industry, caution, and sound, hard discretion he has not been exceeded by any Viceroy who has preceded him.

THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK: My Lords, I rise to address your Lordships on this occasion because it appears to me that I am called upon to give evidence on two points, on both of which I am obliged to give it against Her Majesty's Government. The noble Viscount opposite (Viscount Cranbrook), in answering the speech of my noble Friend behind me, gave, as far as I could follow him, a very able account of my actions and of the motives that actuated me in dealing with the Ameer when I was Viceroy of India. It appears to me, however, with all due deference to the noble Viscount, that I am the only person who can state to your Lordships and to the country exactly what I did when I was Governor General of India. The question at issue between us is a very simple one. I have never made any charge against the noble Viscount of having endeavoured wilfully to misrepresent my conduct in this matter; but I am bound to say that the words used by the noble Viscount in his despatch of the 18th of November last, give the people of this country an entirely inaccurate impression of what really happened at the time. That inaccurate impression has not only been expressed in the daily organs of the Press, but it has also been expressed to-night by the noble Lord the Seconder of the Address. In paragraphs 8 and 9 of the noble Viscount's despatch, he says that—

"Shere Ali, actuated by his fears on this score, sent a special Envoy to Simla in the summer of that year (1873), charged with the duty of expressing them to the Government of India."

And in paragraph 9, he says—

"Finding that the object of the Ameer was to ascertain definitely how far he might rely on the help of the British Government if his territories were threatened by Russia, Lord Northbrook's Government was prepared to assure him that, under certain conditions, the Government of India would assist him to repel unprovoked aggression. But Her Majesty's Government at home did not share his Highness's apprehension, and the Viceroy ultimately informed the Ameer that the discussion of the question would be best postponed to a more convenient season." — [Afghanistan, No. 1, p. 262.]

No person who reads those paragraphs could come to any other conclusion than that I wished to give certain assurances to the Ameer which I was prevented from giving by the Home Government, and that I was therefore compelled to tell the Ameer that the discussion of the matter had better be postponed to a future time; and from another paragraph of the noble Viscount's despatch it has been naturally inferred that Her Majesty's present Government in 1876 gave assurances to the Ameer which Her Majesty's late Government in 1873 had refused to give him. As regards the first part of the question, I am, as I said before, the only person who can give evidence with respect to it. The fact is, that having asked to be allowed to give to the Ameer certain assurances, and having received a reply by telegraph from the Home Government in answer to my inquiry, I felt that their telegram justified me in giving the Ameer the precise assurances I desired to give him, and which I actually did give him through his Prime Minister, an authenticated copy of those assurances being forwarded to him personally. So far, therefore, from the despatch of the noble Viscount giving an accurate impression of what occurred, it gives an impression totally at variance with the facts of the case. As the noble Viscount has gone into this question at such length, and as the Duke of Argyll is unable to be in his place to-night to explain his own conduct, I asked him to allow me to make use of any private letters relating to this subject which might have passed between us; and, with his permission, I will read to the House a paragraph from a private letter I wrote to him two days after I received his telegram permitting me to give the assurance I desired to give to the Ameer, and before I had the interview with his Prime Minister. The words I used in the letter I wrote to the Duke of Argyll were these—"Your telegram of the 26th will enable me to give him sufficiently distinct assurances." This letter, therefore, entirely bears out my impression of what occurred at that time. While I entirely acquit the noble Viscount of any deliberate intention to misrepresent the matter, I cannot help thinking that it is extremely unfortunate that he did not take more pains to master the facts of the case. If he had taken common pains to do so, he would never have allowed the paragraphs in his despatch to which I have referred to stand. The noble Viscount would have found my view of the case supported by the despatch of the noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Salisbury), of the 28th of February, 1876, who, in page 158 of the Papers, in referring to this question, says—

"In the year 1873, Lord Northbrook gave to the Envoy of the Ameer the personal assurance that, in the event of any aggression upon the territories of His Highness which the British Government had failed to avert by negotiation, that Government would be prepared 'to assure the Ameer that they will afford him assistance in the shape of arms and money, and will also, in case of necessity, assist him with troops.'"

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: Go on. Read the next paragraph.

THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK: I will do so if the noble Viscount wishes me to do so. The despatch goes on—

"The terms of this declaration, however, although sufficient to justify reproaches on the part of Shere Ali if, in the contingency to which it referred, he should be left unsupported by the British Government, were unfortunately too ambiguous to secure confidence or inspire gratitude on the part of His Highness. The Ameer, in fact, appears to have remained under a resentful impression that his Envoy had been trifled with, and his attitude towards the Government of India has ever since been characterized by ambiguity and reserve."

That is an argument to which I will advert immediately. At present I am dealing merely with the facts of the case; and I think that if the noble Viscount had consulted these Papers carefully he never would have introduced these paragraphs into his despatch. If anyone will read the 12th paragraph of Lord Lytton's despatch of the 10th of May, 1877, in page 162, it will be seen that the account of the noble Viscount does not accurately state the case. There is also the statement in the Conferences between the Prime Minister of the Ameer and Sir Lewis Pelly, which gives a completely accurate account of the transactions of 1873. The Prime Minister says that the assurances at his first interview were not sufficient, but that afterwards further assurances were given; and if the noble Viscount desires any further evidence, there is the language of Lord Lytton in his letter of the 15th of March, 1877, to the Prime Minister, in which the assurances I had given in 1873 were withdrawn; all notice of which has been omitted by the noble Viscount. Therefore, I say that even from the Papers themselves the noble Viscount ought to have formed a more accurate judgment of the transaction, and have avoided writing a paragraph which has led to such misapprehension on the part of the public. But that is not all. The noble Viscount has now upon his Council three distinguished statesmen who were Members of my Council in 1873, or afterwards — Sir Henry Norman, Sir Barron Ellis, and Sir William Muir—all of whom were cognizant of these transactions; and yet will it be believed that the noble Viscount has not taken the common precaution of asking them whether he was right in his facts before publishing those paragraphs, and that the first thing that they knew about his despatch was seeing it in the newspapers? If he had taken that precaution, the noble Viscount would not have found himself in the difficult position in which he is now placed. Exception has also been taken by the noble Earl behind me (Earl Granville) to the 16th paragraph of the despatch, which refers to the close of the Sir Lewis Pelly's negotiations, and I cannot look upon the explanation of the noble Viscount as to the accuracy of that paragraph as satisfactory. In the 18th paragraph, moreover, the noble Viscount describes the position of the Government after the close of the negotiations as one of "vigilant reserve." The real position was that on the 15th of March, 1877, the Viceroy had informed the Ameer that all the assurances of protection he had received from Lord Lawrence, Lord Mayo, and myself, were repudiated, and that the only engagement by which the British Government were bound was the Treaty of 1855, under which no assurance of protection was given him. I do not think anyone would draw any such inference as this from the account given in the despatch of these transactions. Giving the noble Viscount every credit for a desire not to misrepresent the facts of the case in his despatch, I must say that anyone who reads his conclusions and then carefully examines the Papers will be very much surprised. There is another point in the noble Viscount's speech to which I must allude, although it is one on which I have no personal knowledge. The noble Viscount in his despatch leaves it to be inferred that Her Majesty's present Government have given to the Ameer, or rather offered to the Ameer, the assurances which His Highness required from me and which I was not able to give him. The noble Viscount spoke in a condemnatory sense of the safeguards and cautions attached to the assurances offered to Shere Ali in 1873.

The Earl of Northbrook

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: I must deny having expressed the sentiment which the noble Earl imputes to me.

THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK: Then, I wish the noble Viscount would not use language which is liable to misconstruction. His words about "vague" assurances certainly seemed to imply that those assurances were not of a kind which ought to have been given at the time. Now, I wish to point out to your Lordships that the offers made to the Ameer by Her Majesty's present Government were guarded far more strictly than those of the Government of 1873. These Papers contain the draft Treaty which Sir Lewis Pelly was authorised to conclude with the Ameer. My assurances to the Ameer in 1873 were that the British Government, under certain circumstances, would afford him assistance in the shape of arms and money and also, in case of necessity, assist him with troops. The safeguards were these—that he should abstain from aggression and should unreservedly accept the advice of the British Government in regard to his external relations. Now, turning to the draft Treaty which Sir Lewis Pelly was authorized to conclude with the Ameer, which is given at page 190 of the Papers, what do I find? There is an assurance of protection, no doubt, in the second Article; but it is qualified in the third and fourth Articles in precisely the same way as the assurance of protection offered to the Ameer by the Government of 1873. The qualification is that His Highness should "refrain from all provocation of aggression on or interference with the States and territories beyond his present Frontier," and that "he should conduct his relations with Foreign States in harmony with the policy of the British Government." It appears that the Viceroy was not quite satisfied with these conditions; and on looking to the aide mémoire "for subsidiary secret and explanatory agreement," at page 191, you will find that it was understood, in regard to Article 2, that the Ameer should "bind himself to abstain from discussion of political, international, or State matters with any Foreign Government," communicating unreservedly to the British Government all communications on such subjects received by him. I wish to show that if there is any distinction between the terms offered to the Ameer by the Viceroy under instructions from the Home Government, and the terms which were proposed in 1873, the terms proposed by Her Majesty's present Government were more strict than those offered in 1873. I have thought it right to mention this, because there is great misapprehension on the subject. It has been said in several of the newspapers, and notably by The Pall Mall Gazette, that the conduct of the late Government towards Shere Ali was the whole cause of the present war. Shere Ali, said The Pall Mall Gazette, wanted to throw himself into the arms of England, and made a proposal which Lord Northbrook was willing to accept, but which Mr. Gladstone's Government declined; and out of that proposal has grown the Afghan War. Knowing the truth of this matter, as I do, I cannot, in common fairness and justice to the Government under which I was then serving, refrain from explaining what the real facts of the case are; and I venture to say I should have taken the same course if these circumstances had occurred when the Party opposite was in Office, and while I was serving under the Earl of Beaconsfield. I think the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) has very much underrated the importance of the observations of the noble Earl beside me (Earl Granville) upon the debate which occurred in this House on the 15th of June last year. I do not think anything which amounts to concealing from your Lordships facts which are known by Ministers can be considered to be a "small personal question, unworthy of discussion." It so happened that I took very great interest in the debate in question, and the account which the noble Marquess has given of it is not one which I feel disposed to accept. My noble Friend (the Duke of Argyll) certainly did put some Questions on particular points to the noble Marquess; but he did not confine his speech to that. If he had done so, I might have accepted the explanation now given by the noble Marquess. My noble Friend discussed the policy pursued by successive Viceroys towards Afghanistan, remarking that the views of the last three Viceroys were that we should maintain an amicable and watchful attitude towards the Ameer, without entangling ourselves in permanent engagements. There can be only one interpretation of what occurred. The Duke of Argyll wished to receive, not only an answer to a particular Question, but a general assurance from the noble Marquess that he had not departed from the line of policy indicated. I remember hearing the noble Marquess state that affairs maintained a peaceful aspect, and that there was "no reason for any apprehension of any change of policy or disturbance in our Indian Empire." But the noble Marquess, in now quoting that passage, omitted to quote the words "in our Indian Empire." I assert on my own authority, having been personally in the House and having listened with the greatest care to what fell from the noble Marquess, that I believed and accepted those words to mean that there had been no material change in our relations with Afghanistan. That is not all, because I addressed your Lordships, and I gave the noble Marquess an opportunity, of which he might have taken advantage, of explaining the misconception under which I laboured, and of stating to your Lordships precisely the state of affairs as they existed at that time. As the matter is important, I must trouble your Lordships with the few words I used on that occasion. I said—

"The policy we have pursued with regard to the Ameer has been to show him that we desired to assist him with our advice whenever he requires it, and not to press upon him the presence of British officers in his territories, unless he really desires that they should go there, and will give them a welcome."

I said—

"That if that policy is deliberately adhered to now, as it has been for many years. . . . whatever suspicions may be entertained by the Ameer . . . will disappear, and that the Ameer will soon see that his suspicions have no foundation, and will look upon us . . . as his best friends, and as those to whom, in certain circumstances, he will have to apply for assistance."

I added—

"It is with great satisfaction, therefore, that I have heard the assurance of the noble Marquess that the policy I have referred to Her Majesty's Government will continue to pursue."
—[3 Hansard, ccxxxiv. 1843.]

I therefore stated in the presence of your Lordships the interpretation I put on the words of the noble Marquess; and I further said—

"I am satisfied that he has given us that assurance in perfect good faith, and that we may trust him to resist any attempt to put it aside."

If it had not have been for that assurance, as I understood it, most undoubtedly I should have brought the question before your Lordships. I will not say what the effect of the debate might have been; but, at any rate, before the war had been entered into, this House and the country would have known what the policy of the Government was, and would have been able to express an opinion as to whether that policy was right or wrong, and whether we were to drift into the war in which we are now engaged. As I have said before, this is not simply a personal question. In dealing with distant countries great confidence must be placed in Her Majesty's Government, and great discretion must be used by those who differ from them. On such questions a Minister is required to be more careful than in dealing even with European questions. I have said what the assurances given were, and I have now to state what were the circumstances at the time they were given. So far from Her Majesty's Government not having desired to enter into any definitive Treaty engagement, an endeavour had been made to negotiate a Treaty with the Ameer; and so far from there having been no change in our relations with the Ameer, on the 15th of March, 1877, the assurances that had been given to the Ameer—of protection in the event of attack or of internal disturbance—by Lord Lawrence, Lord Mayo, and myself, had been withdrawn under the instructions of the British Government, any expectation of support from us had been repudiated, and he had been told that we were under no engagement except that of the Treaty of 1855, under which there was no obligation on our part except to refrain from interference, and to leave the Ameer entirely to himself. I was perfectly astounded by the condition of things revealed by the despatch addressed to the noble Marquess by the Viceroy on the 10th of May, 1877, which must have been in the hands of the noble Marquess at the time he gave the assurances in the House of Lords in June, 1877, of which I have spoken. It is with deep regret I am obliged to say this: it would not be right, the Question having been put, and the answer having been given, if I did not give my deliberate testimony that the statement then made by the noble Marquess gave me a completely incorrect impression of what the real facts of the case were. I am not going now to enter into the general policy of the war; but I must say I do not think the noble Duke behind me (the Duke of Somerset) was quite fair in his remarks about the noble Lord a late Governor General (Lord Lawrence) for having joined the Afghan Committee. If my noble Friend had done such a thing in the sense of supporting the Afghans against the British Government, no language would be too strong to be used in the circumstances. But as matters stand, I am surprised at the noble Duke's condemnation of my noble Friend. He has an opinion that the war is right. Very good; but my noble Friend thinks it is unjust and impolitic—an opinion in which I myself am very much disposed to concur with him. The noble Duke says that my noble Friend is not patriotic; but he would appear not to be patriotic, simply because he differs from the noble Duke, and expresses the earnest opinions which he holds. Few men in this country have given such proofs as my noble Friend has done of patriotism, of vigour, of honour, and of a desire at any risk to maintain the British Empire in India; and yet, because he does not happen to agree with the noble Duke, he is to be spoken of in such terms. It is repugnant to all my feelings of justice and to every sentiment of propriety that a man of such distinguished services should be so spoken of in this House. My noble Friend has a perfect right to express his opinions on the causes of this war, and to say whether he thinks it just or unjust. It is fortunate that we have men like him in the country, who know something of our former relations with Afghanistan, and who can correct statements which have been made, and despatches which have been published, by the knowledge which they possess. One thing more. With regard to the Amendment proposed by the noble Earl (Earl Grey), I hope it will not be pressed to a division. Unfortunately, this discussion has assumed a somewhat personal character. Nobody more regrets that circumstance than I do; but from that very fact, if the Amendment were to be pressed, your Lordships would be asked to vote upon a proposition which you have not yet had an opportunity of fully and completely discussing. At the same time, I must confess that I concur entirely with that part of the argument of the noble Earl which rests upon the Act of 1858. I hold that it is not right for any Administration carrying on war outside India to apply the Revenues of that country towards the expense of such war without the previous consent of Parliament. In this case there was plenty of time before the declaration of war for the Government to have summoned Parliament and explained their policy; therefore, that would have been a proper and a Constitutional course, because there can be no doubt that the Prerogative of the Crown is limited by Act of Parliament, and, although it is the Prerogative of the Crown to declare war, at the same time the clauses of the Act of 1858 prescribe the course that should be followed under the circumstances. It has been a matter of extreme regret to me to be placed to some extent in collision with the noble Marquess and the noble Viscount opposite. I have endeavoured since I returned from India to abstain from making unnecessarily any observations on Indian affairs. I can say with perfect sincerity that, both in and out of Parliament, I have endeavoured to look at Indian affairs entirely apart from Party politics; and I should not hesitate for a moment to express my opinion as strongly with regard to anything done by those on my own side of the House as with regard to the conduct of noble Lords opposite.

THE EARL OF BEACONSFIELD: Although, my Lords, I cannot support the noble Earl who moved the Amendment, I still agree with him that there are occasions when Amendments to the Address are desirable, expedient, and politic. I think I may speak with some authority on the subject, for probably I am the only Member of this House who has, in his time, moved an Amendment to the Address—with what success I care not to recollect—but, at the same time, a feeling of duty, such as that which has animated the noble Earl, actuated me, and I am quite prepared to say that, under similar circumstances, I should deem it my duty to take a similar course. What, then, was the state in which we found ourselves some 25 years ago, advocating a cause with deep and warm convictions, but one which, perhaps, was not supported by a majority of the House, to which we appealed, or the nation? The Recess had passed. We had all of us made a good many speeches—in which, probably, we had used language not much more measured than we have lately become accustomed to; many of us had written letters—though not so many, perhaps, as some individuals have done in more modern times; and, under these circumstances, being also—if I may recall the circumstance without offence—members of a society of great activity and organization—more active certainly than the Afghan Committee—having agitated the country for a considerable time by the sincere expression of our opinion, we did think that when Parliament met we were bound to take the opinion of that great Assembly on the question which we had so long described as of the highest importance and of the most urgent interest. The noble Earl (Earl Grey) has taken that step to-day; but the noble Earl (Earl Granville), in his recognized position of Leader of the Opposition in this House, has taken an entirely different course. He has declared that to-night we are not to enter into the question of policy which so deeply interests the country, and which, if we are to judge from the speeches, organization, and conduct of noble Lords opposite and their friends in the country, so deeply excites and agitates them. We are not to-night to enter into the merits of that policy, but confine ourselves to what the noble Earl who last spoke (the Earl of Northbrook) so admirably described as descending into the personalities of the question. But, although the Leader of the Opposition told us that we were not to-night to enter upon the question of policy, he still felt it consistent with his duty to denounce the war into which we have entered as an unjust and impolitic war. He has still felt it consistent with his duty to hold up to depreciation and ridicule the Viceroy of the Queen, who is at this moment incurring the greatest responsibility, and on the devotion of whose intelligence more, perhaps, depends than on that of any other individual in the country. He has even felt it consistent with his views to intimate that Her Majesty's Ministers are, at this moment, neglecting their highest duty, and that they are not supporting those gallant men whose heroic exploits have just reached us, and that we have not reinforced them as was required. This, my Lords, is a strange vein to indulge in when we are asked not to enter upon the merits of this question. If that insinuation against the Government be founded on fact, we should be unworthy of the seats we hold. Is it to be said that those soldiers, who have given so good an account of the enemy, have not been adequately supported? Is the country to be informed on the first opportunity that they are hardly equal to the exertions they have been called upon to make? Not more complimentary to the troops than to Her Majesty's Government. I cannot but feel that the country to-morrow will be greatly disappointed in reading this debate. To-morrow the country will not be considering what one ex-Minister may have written, or what a present Minister may have quoted. It may, under ordinary circumstances, be a legitimate mode of passing our time that we should compare notes on such subjects, and if any misrepresentations have been made as to the conduct or expression of individuals our utmost efforts on both sides should be given to rectify them; but is it right that hour after hour should be wasted, at a time when the country wants our opinion on one of the greatest issues ever submitted to the consideration of Parliament, in order to ascertain whether Secretary This misquoted the despatch of Governor General That? Hours have been passed in a discussion leading to such a mystification that, excepting the principal actors in the scene, I defy any human being to understand what the whole controversy is about. To whatever monstrous proportions you may exaggerate this discussion, it is nothing after all but an official squabble; while the real issue is the most important that can be presented for our consideration. See the unjust effect produced upon the House—By this singular process of debating, we are not to discuss to-night the policy to discuss which Parliament has been summoned. But though we are not to discuss it, the Leader of the Opposition has given his opinion on the great issue. He tells you we are engaged in an unjust and impolitic war. But what is this? It is mere assumption. If the war is unjust and impolitic, prove it. Bring forward your reasons and your arguments. Assail our policy, and give us the proofs on which your opinions are founded. Do this and we will meet you, and the House and the country will decide. That is the legitimate and Constitutional manner which the noble Earl (Earl Grey) has adopted in moving his Amendment. But to-night we have been for hours listening in the House of Lords whilst a number of influential men have risen and denounced as unjust and impolitic what they refrain from attacking openly and frankly. It would be vain at this hour to enter into such a discussion. The noble Earl opposite has, with consummate dexterity, prevented any expression of opinion by Parliament on this all-engrossing subject to-night. It is postponed to some day when there may be a long and adjourned debate; instead of now animating the spirit of the country, and explaining why they are called upon to make great sacrifices and encouraging that patriotic spirit which has been sneered at, but which I trust there are some in this House who appreciate. A week may yet elapse, at a time very critical to this country, before the opinion of Parliament can be taken. I cannot refrain from expressing my entire disapprobation of this course of proceeding. I admit its dexterity; but I think that there are times when Parliamentary manoeuvring, a very happy quality when great interests are not at stake, may be misplaced. There are one or two points on which I should not have touched on this occasion, but for some remarks which the noble Earl called upon me to notice. He has a habit, when I do not notice every remark he makes, most amiably to remind me of it, and I must notice what he tells us about the Treaty of Berlin. The noble Earl, who has already decided, without discussion, the question of this war, expresses great doubts about the statement in the gracious Speech from the Throne, that Her Majesty has every reason to believe the Treaty of Berlin will be successfully carried into effect; and he asks us, like a counsel cross-examining a doubtful witness—"But is this the real opinion of the Ministry?" If it had not been, is it to be supposed that we should have recommended Her Majesty to use such language, and ourselves have come down to support such a Speech from the Throne? Why, my Lords, in that case our conduct would have been not only infamous, but absurd. I may, in fact, say that it would have been akin to what has been charged against my noble Friend the Secretary of State for India (Viscount Cranbrook), of garbling in a despatch an epitome of important State Papers which he knew would necessarily be made known within 48 hours of the publication of his own despatch. My Lords, the language which Her Majesty has been advised to use in the gracious Speech from the Throne has been entirely warranted by circumstances. We do look upon the Berlin Treaty as certain to be carried completely and successfully into effect. But the noble Earl says—"It is not merely the Treaty of Berlin. There are other Treaties; there is the Convention with Turkey. Why not insert a paragraph in the Queen's Speech to inform Parliament what is being done to effect the reform of the Ottoman Empire?" Why, the Treaty of Berlin, like other Treaties, provides a certain specified time during which its arrangements may be properly carried into effect, and a moiety of the period has not yet elapsed. Probably of all the arrangements connected with the Treaty of Berlin, the arrangements with respect to Turkey are the most important. But the noble Earl is under a great error in supposing that nothing has been done. Unceasing labour has been bestowed upon the subject; and nothing but the great ability of those who fortunately are in the employment of Her Majesty abroad, their perseverance, and untiring devotion to their task could have effected the considerable results already accomplished. My Lords, I look forward to the Convention respecting Turkey and Cyprus as one likely to prove most advantageous, not merely for this country, but for the world in general; I look forward with confidence to the regeneration of Asia Minor. When the noble Earl turns round and ridicules the occupation of Cyprus and the objects for which we undertook that occupation, I will tell him that it is not easy in language to describe the advantages of that position; and when the noble Earl assumes that the Island is wanting in many qualities which were announced, and that its acquisition is a blunder, I can assure him that the conditions for which we agreed to occupy that Island have been entirely fulfilled. I repeat without the slightest fear, after communication with my Colleagues who have recently visited it, that it will be, as I have formerly said, most important as "a place of arms," as affording a capacious harbour for our Navy, and unlimited convenience for the quartering of Her Majesty's Forces. It has entirely fulfilled our expectations, and I believe will soon be recognized as one of the most important and influential positions under the dominion of Her Majesty. My Lords, I regret very much that there has been a feeling among certain of your Lordships that there has been an omission in the gracious Speech from the Throne, inasmuch as there was no allusion to the prevalent distress in the country consequent on the badness of trade. That was through no inadvertence, no neglect. Noble Lords opposite will, I am sure, agree with me in one thing—that there are no persons so interested in the prosperity of the country as Her Majesty's Ministers, whoever they may be. But it is a questionable course to allude publicly to the distress of the country when it is not peculiar to the country itself; when you are not yourselves prepared with any remedial measures; and when, if you express your real opinions, you may give rise to hopes and miscalculations which afterwards may be disappointed and defeated, and which you must deplore. That is the reason that has governed us in this case. What is the real state of affairs at present? The distress in this country is great; but there are circumstances which alleviate it in the low price of provisions. Still, that distress cannot be denied; and yet it must be borne in mind that it is a commercial distress, which is shared by every other country. It has been occasioned by the same causes which occasion the distress of other countries. Her Majesty's Government are not prepared—I do not suppose any Government would be prepared—with any measures which would attempt to alleviate the extensive distress which now prevails. But if we are pressed upon the subject, it is, I trust, justifiable, though I speak with the utmost diffidence, to say that the opinion of Her Majesty's Government is that the worst part of the distress has been experienced. We believe, from all that reaches us, that there are indications, not in this country only but in other countries, of a re-action. We believe that not only in this country, but in other countries where the industry peculiarly affects our own, where the course of commerce exercises a particular influence on the industry of England, there are symptoms of amelioration and general amendment which must in time—and perhaps sooner than the country is prepared for—bring about those advantageous results which, after periods of suffering, we have before experienced. But in a Speech from the Throne addressed to Parliament assembled for a specific purpose, upon which the attention of Parliament ought to be concentrated, it did not appear to us advisable to introduce the subject, though we hope that before the year is passed we shall every day find ourselves in a better position with respect to the employment of the people, the employment of capital, and the enterprize of individuals. I will not dwell on the words of the President of the United States, though words from such an authority and such a quarter cannot be treated with too much consideration. But the enterprize of America generally precedes that of Europe, as the industry of England precedes that of the rest of Europe; and I look forward with confidence that the industry and enterprize of America will be productive of beneficial results upon this country. I should not like to sit down without thanking the noble Earl who moved the Address for the speech which he made this evening. I am sure the House listened to it with much interest. It would well have preceded a debate which, unfortunately, we are not to have. But it will be a satisfaction to my noble Friend to remember that it has been his lot, which is not the lot of all of us, to have in his time addressed both Houses, and to have succeeded in interesting both. I do not wonder at the interest which has been shown in the affairs of India by my noble Friend who seconded the Address. I believe there is no portion of Her Majesty's subjects who have profited more by our Indian Empire than the Irish; and, what is more, our Indian Empire is, perhaps, more indebted to them for the great talent and energy which they have shown in its administration than any portion of Her Majesty's subjects. Well, my Lords, in conclusion, we are told that on Monday we are to deal with this great question which now excites public attention, and that we are to come to a decision upon it. We have received intelligence to-day which no man, on whatever side he sits, can read without pride and admiration. Whatever may be the results of that brilliant victory—and I should hope that the result will be speedy and satisfactory—there can be but one opinion among us as to the admirable qualities by which that victory has been accomplished. Her Majesty's Ministers, my Lords, have another sort of encounter hanging over us. I know not what may be its result. The decision may differ from what might be calculated upon in ordinary times. Whatever that result may be individually, I am prepared to meet it, as, I am sure, are my Colleagues. Whatever the result, it will be, I hope, equal to the occasion. That the House of Lords will decide that they will maintain the Empire, and that they will not in any way sanction that policy which mistakes timidity for wisdom;—that is what I most earnestly hope, and that is what I believe the people of England expect.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, may I be permitted to reply very briefly to some of the criticisms which have been made? The noble Duke has complained of my being illogical in condemning a war which I consider unjust, unnecessary, and impolitic, and yet being ready to vote the Supplies for it. He is quite right—it is illogical; but when once our soldiers are before the enemy, and the honour of the country is engaged, however illogical it may be, I will not consent to deprive our army of the necessary support, however desirous I may be that the war should be brought to a speedy termination, honourable to ourselves, and just to the foe. The noble Duke complains that a disapprobation of the war will encourage the Ameer. But Parliament has been debarred from any previous knowledge of the policy which has caused this war; and now when it has broken out, if we may not discuss this policy, lest it should encourage a semi-barbarian on the other side of the world, there cannot be much use in calling Parliament together at all. But if I am willing to kiss the rod of an old political and personal friend like the noble Duke, I am not prepared to do the same for the rod of the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury). It is much too full of buds. The noble Marquess has read me a severe lecture for indulging in personalities. I admit that there is no greater authority in either House of Parliament than the noble Marquess on the subject of personalities; but as the House has been misled on a most important measure and policy which has been maturing for two years, I think it is not mere personality to ask for some explanation of what has occurred. The noble Earl (the Earl of Beaconsfield), who is himself not wanting in authority on a question of Parliamentary manœuvring, has given me a severe lecture for the manœuvring I have done to-day. Well, I have only made a complaint which I thought I was entitled to make, and asked certain questions which have not been answered. I had consulted the convenience of the House in not beginning a skirmishing discussion on the merits of a question which must be thoroughly discussed, and on which the House will be asked to give an opinion on the early opportunity which has been promised by the noble Viscount. In conclusion, I appeal to my noble Friend on the cross benches to withdraw the Amendment, which cannot be disconnected entirely from the general subject which is to be discussed on Monday.

EARL GREY said, he would not press his Amendment to a division; but he wished the Question to be put.

Question put, Whether the said words shall be there inserted? Resolved in the negative.

Then the original Motion was agreed to.

AFGHANISTAN (MILITARY OPERATIONS)—THE PEIWAR COLUMN—TELEGRAM.—QUESTION.

MR. RITCHIE asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether any information has been received at the India Office with reference to the report of the great victory of General Roberts?

MR. E. STANHOPE: Sir, I am happy to be able to inform my hon. Friend and the House that we have received full confirmation from the Viceroy of India. With the permission of the House I will read the telegram from the Viceroy. It is dated the 5th of December, and is as follows:—

"Roberts attacked Peiwar 2nd; turning movement during night of 1st successful; surprised and turned enemy, but attack of Kotal from that side found impossible. Roberts, therefore, continued turning movement, placing himself in enemy's rear, with flanking column, while General Cobbe engaged attention in front. Enemy, reinforced by four regiments from Khushi, made determined resistance, but were driven from Kotal, which was occupied at 4 p.m., 2nd. Enemy completely defeated, leaving 15 guns and large amount of ammunition in our hands; other guns abandoned, and will be secured. Loss supposed to be very heavy. Our loss—Captain Kelso, R.A., Major Anderson, 23rd Pioneers, killed; General Cobbe and Lieutenant Munro, 72nd Highlanders, wounded; about 50 men killed and wounded. Troops had to undergo great exertions and exposure at altitude of 8,000 feet, but behaved admirably, and are in excellent spirits. Roberts continues pursuit towards Shutar-Gardan to-day; wounded sent into Kuram."

THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.

MR. SPEAKER reported Her Majesty's Speech, made by Her Chancellor, and read it to the House.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HER MAJESTY'S MOST GRACIOUS SPEECH.

VISCOUNT CASTLEREAGH: Sir, I rise with the greatest diffidence to move that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, thanking Her Majesty for Her Most Gracious Speech. I have had the privilege of being a Member of this House but a short time, and I trust that in the few remarks I shall make I shall receive its indulgence, and that any shortcomings on my part may be attributed not to any want of confidence in the cause I advocate, but rather to the inexperience of one who is, for the first time, addressing it.

At first sight it may appear to many hon. Members a matter of great inconvenience to have been summoned to attend a meeting of Parliament at this time; but on further consideration of the questions that are before the country, and the provisions of the law by which Indian Revenues cannot be expended without the sanction of Parliament, I think there is no hon. Member who will not agree with me that Her Majesty's Government had no course open to them but to summon Parliament in this sudden and extraordinary manner.

Since we last met many things have taken place which have caused serious apprehensions that the Treaty of Berlin, which secured peace to Europe, was in danger of being disturbed. I cannot but think that one advantage gained by the meeting of Parliament to-day will be to dispel any such illusion, for there is not the slightest fear that any Power concerned in that Treaty has any intention of not observing its conditions. I trust, Sir, that the House will permit me to say that I think the country owes much to the Commissioners in Turkey, who have done so much to bring about a solution of those problems which at present are in a state of uncertainty there.

Very recently, Sir, another question, which at one time promised to be of a very troublesome character, has been brought, I am thankful to say, to a successful and satisfactory issue. The United States have paid over the sum of money which was adjudged to this country in the Fisheries dispute. I am sure no one doubted for a moment that that money would be paid; and I do hope that this amicable conclusion, of what might have been a serious difficulty, will tend to draw in still closer connection the tie of friendship which I hope, and I am sure will always, exist between the two countries.

Her Majesty's Most Gracious Speech refers chiefly to the condition of affairs on the borders of our Indian Empire. With the permission of the House I shall touch but generally on that question, as no doubt it will be amongst many others brought under its notice; but I am happy to think that I can commence at a period on which all parties are agreed. No one can deny that the statesmanlike ability of Lord Mayo, his personal qualities and his natural courtesy, created between himself and the Ameer of Afghanistan, I may say I think, a feeling of good-will—nay, even more, a feeling of friendship. When, at last, we suffered a great loss by Lord Mayo's death, he bequeathed to his successor the same state of good feeling. In the meantime, Sir, a new element had been introduced. The advances of Russia were beginning, and the Ameer applied to Lord Northbrook for assurances of protection against that advancing Power. What those assurances were it is unnecessary for me to say. At all events, Lord Northbrook was unable to comply in such a manner as to give complete satisfaction to the Ameer. The Russian advances still continued, and the Ameer became more and more estranged to England, and more willing to enter into negotiations with the advancing Power. Lord Salisbury, at last, thought that the time had come when he should be justified in giving further assurance of protection to the Ameer against foreign invasion, upon condition that our officers were allowed to be present at certain places in his territory, in order that they might thoroughly watch the movements on the Frontier. To this the Ameer declined to agree. The discussion was prolonged indefinitely; and, in the meantime, the Ameer showed a still more unfriendly feeling towards our country. Suddenly, in July of this year, we were startled by hearing that the Ameer had received a Russian Envoy at Cabul. Under these circumstances, the Indian Government felt that the time had come at which they should consider how they would act. They proposed a friendly Mission to Cabul on the part of this country. Of the circumstances which followed the House is well aware; and when, later on, they gave the Ameer—if I may so use the expression—another chance, the House is well acquainted with the manner in which that Ultimatum was treated. Under these circumstances, the Indian Government felt compelled to take those steps which are now to be brought under the consideration of Parliament. We are at the present moment engaged in a war which, I trust, will be short, successful, and decisive; and I can only express a hope, which I am sure you will all feel, that our European soldiers, as well as our Indian troops, will, as they have ever done, do their utmost to show that they are fully qualified to maintain the glory and the power of our Indian Empire.

As regards domestic legislation, I may be excused for saying that it is impossible for me to form any opinion of the work of the coming Session; but I wish I could feel sanguine that anything can be done to alleviate the distress which unfortunately prevails through the greater part of this country. In view of the bad harvests and the depression of trade, I feel that the prospects of a return of prosperity are anything but good. At the same time, hon. Gentlemen will remember that these misfortunes are not confined to our country. They extend all over Europe and America; and as, therefore, there can be no question that they are not the consequence of political causes, I think we must not despair. On former occasions we have had a similar depression of trade; and as bad harvests have been previously met by the skill and energy for which Englishmen have always been renowned, so, I trust, England will again overcome those difficulties as in former days.

I cannot conclude without expressing my most grateful thanks to the House for the kind indulgence which they have shown to me, and I shall conclude by moving—

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, to convey the thanks of this House for Her Majesty’s Most Gracious Speech:

“Humbly to thank Her Majesty for the gracious expression of Her regret that She has found it necessary to call for our attendance at an unusual, and, as Her Majesty is pleased to say, probably at an inconvenient time:

“To express our regret that the hostility manifested towards Her Majesty’s Indian Government by the Ameer of Afghanistan, and the manner in which he has repulsed Her Majesty’s friendly Mission, has left Her Majesty no alternative but to make a peremptory demand for redress:

“Humbly to thank Her Majesty for informing us that, in consequence of this demand having been disregarded, Her Majesty has directed an Expedition to be sent into his Territory, and has taken the earliest opportunity of calling us together, and making to us the communication required by Law:

“To thank Her Majesty for directing that Papers on the subject shall be laid before us:

“Humbly to express the gratification with which we learn that Her Majesty receives from all Foreign Powers assurances of their friendly feelings, and that Her Majesty has every reason to believe that the arrangements for the pacification of Europe, made by the Treaty of Berlin, will be successfully carried into effect:

“To thank Her Majesty for having directed the Estimates for the ensuing year to be laid before us in due course:

“Humbly to assure Her Majesty that, after full deliberation upon the matters which have led Her Majesty to anticipate our usual time of meeting, we shall be prepared, at such date as Her Majesty may determine, to give our careful consideration to such measures for the public benefit as Her Majesty may direct to be submitted to us:

“Humbly to assure Her Majesty that our best care shall be devoted to the maintenance of the great interests of Her Empire; and that we unite with Her Majesty in praying that the blessing of the Almighty may attend our counsels.”

MR. HALL: In rising to second the Address, I shall not hesitate to allude to the great subject to which the remarks of my noble Friend the Member for Down (Viscount Castlereagh) have been mainly directed. It must be quite clear that when Parliament is summoned at this unusual and, as Her Majesty is pleased to say, somewhat inconvenient season, there must be some great topic for discussion and settlement by the House, which rightly and necessarily puts the ordinary Business of an ordinary Session entirely in the shade. Sir, that great topic is the question of our North-Western Frontier of India, and the relations of Her Majesty towards the Ameer of Afghanistan, and as being germane to that question. The House will have learned with satisfaction the assurance contained in Her Majesty's gracious Speech that Her Majesty is in friendly relations with all other foreign Powers.

It is a matter, I venture to think, not only for satisfaction, but also for profound thankfulness, that those great subjects which the Berlin Congress was called together to discuss seem to be in a fair way of being brought to a final adjustment, without any break whatever in the friendly relations between the signatory Powers; because it cannot be denied that whether we look to our North-West Frontier in India, or look at home for that revival of trade prosperity, for which so many eyes are anxiously scanning the horizon, much depends on the peaceable and loyal carrying out of the Berlin Treaty. And, Sir, I cannot use the word "trade" without venturing to express the sympathy, which I am sure the House feels, with our fellow-countrymen in Scotland, who have suffered from so severe a financial calamity, and who have borne their suffering so bravely.

Sir, the regret which has been expressed in the Speech from the Throne, that Parliament should have been called together to discuss the war in Afghanistan, is a regret which, so far as the war is concerned, will be shared by every hon. Member of the House, no matter what may be his political opinions. These Frontier Wars, so many of which have been entailed on this country by the necessities of our Indian Empire, are at all times undertakings which this country would fain avoid if she could fairly and reasonably do so: and of Afghan Wars especially, it may be said that our reminiscences certainly are not of such a character as to induce responsible Indian statesmen to rush into them lightly or without a grave sense of responsibility. Therefore it is that we have always found that the chief and most cardinal point in the policy of our Indian statesmen has been the independence and friendship of Afghanistan. But, as has been well pointed out in one of our great centres of commerce and intelligence by the Leader of this House on a recent occasion, that independence and friendship must be real; because what we desire is, that Afghanistan should be for us in Asia that which our forefathers always desired Turkey should be for us in Europe—a buffer between ourselves and the possible aggrandizing propensities of other Powers. That has been a position as favourable for the Ruler of Afghanistan as for this country. It was a position which was always cordially and frankly accepted by Dost Mahomed, and up to 1872 apparently by his less reliable son Shere Ali, with more or less sincerity. I use the word "apparently," because it is very doubtful whether Shere Ali ever forgave this country for the recognition it gave to his rival brothers in 1867. Be that as it may, and without stopping to inquire whether the result of the famous Umballa Conference in 1869 did or did not carry out Shere Ali's wishes, I think we may fairly say that up to the year 1872 the relations of Shere Ali to this country were fairly friendly. Since that date, however, there has been a great change. His friendship has given way to ill-concealed enmity, and his estimate of the comparative power of Russia and England has undergone a complete change—a change not in our favour. What the causes of the change may be, and the amount of responsibility that will have to be borne for it by previous Viceroy and the present Administration, must and will, of course, be discussed at a fitting moment. That moment is certainly not the present; but when that time comes, and strong opinions are expressed, on the one hand that a more resolute and less ambiguous policy in the past would have secured Shere Ali to our interests, and on the other hand opinions are as strongly expressed that a less resolute and a more ambiguous policy now, would have had a similar effect, I am inclined to believe that political circumstances farther North than Cabul, in the one case, had not so far matured as to render a more resolute policy absolutely necessary; and, in the other case, had done so, in so marked a manner and with such great rapidity, that a longer continuance in the rut of ambiguity would have been not only unwise but absolutely impossible; and I, therefore, venture to think that it would better become the Parliament of England frankly and fully to look this side of the question in the face with a view to our future advantage, rather than by useless endeavours to prove opponents wrong and lose our capacity for forming a sound judgment in a mist of political prejudice. At the end of the year 1872 the Seistan boundary arbitration was concluded, and that seems to have left a rankling sense of wrong in the mind of the Ameer, and it was but a few months after that the continued advance of Russia in Central Asia seemed to impress the Ameer with the possible difficulties of his position in regard to that country, and he therefore sent an Envoy to Simla to endeavour to induce Lord Northbrook to enter into an alliance specifically against Russia. I venture to think that the wisdom or unwisdom of the course then adopted depended upon the estimate reasonably to be formed—of the reality of the danger which Shere Ali apprehended. And we must not, in determining that, forget, that only six months before an agreement had been come to between Russia and this country as to the boundaries of Afghanistan, and that so frank, full, and unreserved were the assurances of Russia in this respect, that the English Government seemed to have no difficulty in coming to the conclusion that Shere Ali's reading of the political barometer had been entirely incorrect. The House will remember that when these assurances were given Lord Granville had been told that Afghanistan did not come within the political purview of Russia, that the Emperor considered an extension of territory as a weakness; while as to Cabul, it was admitted that English officers might fairly be found there, and that Russian officers ought not to be found there. But it would seem that Shere Ali was a better judge of the immediate future than either the Russian or English Governments, for within six months of the agreement, Khiva had fallen, and Shere Ali had seen the Russian Frontier and his own drawing nearer and nearer day by day. He seemed to be making up his mind to side with the strongest Power, whether that should be Russian or English; and I cannot help thinking that however favourable a Treaty might at that time have been concluded between his country and ourselves, the well-known character of the Ameer Chief would have rendered it not impossible that the Treaty would have been frankly and fully accepted by him so long as, and no longer than, it tallied with his own interests and squared with his own estimate of the relative power of Russia and England. With regard to this I may venture to quote the opinion given by Lord Lawrence in 1869—that if an invasion of India were imminent, every Afghan, from the Ameer on the Throne to the domestic slave in the household, would join it. In 1875 Lord Northbrook expressed his belief that whenever the day came for Russian influence to be supreme in the Turcoman territory, it would be necessary that more specific assurances should be given to the Ameer that we should have a British Resident at Herat; and at the close of that year Her Majesty's Government had come to the conclusion that the time had arrived. That opinion was not shared in by Lord Northbrook; but subsequent events went far to show that the real question was, not whether the time for more specific assurances had arrived, but whether, in truth, it had not for ever passed away? For what do we find? That when, in obedience to Lord Salisbury's instructions, the Mission of Sir Lewis Pelly was proposed to the Ameer, it was rejected by him, and when, after considerable pressure, the Envoy of the Ameer was sent to Peshawur, it was abundantly clear that the Treaty for which his master was said to have been looking so long no longer had any charms for him, and his whole ingenuity appeared to be directed to the frustration of the objects of the Conference. Old grievances were raked up; much time was wasted by interminable discussions as to the position of the proposed British Residents, although that point was well understood to have been previously agreed to; and, generally, it appeared that no definite conclusions were desired by the Ameer. With regard to those British Residents, I may mention that the question had been fully explained to the Ameer over and over again, and there is evidence to show that he not only understood it, but fully acknowledged the justice of our demands. For it must be quite clear that in any Treaty entered into by us for securing the integrity of Shere Ali's dominions, it would be necessary to us to secure speedy and trustworthy information of what was going on upon the Frontiers, if only to enable us to carry into effect our engagement to prevent conduct on his part provocative of Russian aggression. If we had not done this we should have been placing our responsibility at the mercy of Shere Ali's caprice. The Peshawur Conference went on until the Envoy died, and then Lord Lytton, having information of continued hostility on the part of the Ameer—who was trying to raise a jihad, or religious war, against the English—wisely seized that opportunity to close the Conference. For 12 months nothing more was done, when all British India was, as my noble Friend has said, startled by the intelligence that a Russian Mission had been received at Cabul. Then the question arose as to whether the Government could remain a pacific spectator of that great event? and it was felt that to do so would be practically to hand over the interests of Afghanistan to Russia, in the same way that Bokhara had been handed over to her. I do not know whether, as a simple matter of International Law, it might have been justifiable for Shere Ali to receive a Russian Mission, and to reject an English one; but for our Government to have permitted such conduct would have been contrary to all the dictates of common sense, and would have been an utter disregard of that salus reipublicæ which we all know is suprema lex. It must be quite clear that even if the British Government could have forgotten the treachery—the base treachery—of Shere Ali, and the gifts which have been so freely lavished upon him by successive Viceroy's during a period of eight years—gifts comprising ammunition without end, 12 cannon, 21,000 rifles, and £250,000—for which no sort of return has ever been made, or is ever likely to be made; if they could have forgotten all that, it was absolutely impossible for them, as guardians of British honour in India, to forget the insult offered by the stoppage of a peaceful Mission. I believe there are many of our way of thinking who believe so fully in the ultimate power of our country in India, that they are apt to despise what generally goes by the name of prestige. That is a view with which I cannot sympathize. Prestige, Mr. Speaker, I once heard well described—I think the description emanated from an hon. Member of this House—prestige is credit, and credit, as we all know, is capital. Prestige, in the present case, is the estimate formed in the Native mind of the invincibility of the British power in India. It is that which in the olden times was won for you by the genius of Marquess Wellesley and the great Wellington, and, in more recent years, by Pollock, Nott, Sale, and Havelock. Let us remember how much this prestige has cost to win, and prize it as the talisman of the future. With regard to increase of territory, I ought, perhaps, to say that, in the ordinary acceptation of the word, I believe Great Britain desires no increase of territory either in India or anywhere else; but I may venture to express a hope, with regard to the future, that in any rectification of Frontier which may take place by arrangement with the Border Tribes—who are independent of Shere Ali to a great extent, be it remembered—or otherwise, that care will be taken to have the mountains on our own side. In that case our responsibility will not only be not increased, but we shall be able, at less cost and at less trouble, to guard our own, which is all that Great Britain desires to do, and with less than which I hope she will never be content.

I thank the House very much for having listened to me so patiently; and I will only venture, in conclusion, to express a hope that, when those feelings of partisan passion which on these subjects seem naturally to arise, and which although we have heard nothing of them in debate to-night may possibly be still in store for us—that when they are hushed, as one day they will be, and the calm gaze of the historian is directed to the Eastern policy of England in 1878, I trust it will be written that without European convulsion, and at the cost of only a short Frontier war, British India was secured from foreign foes, not only in the South-East, amid the fertile valleys of Asia Minor, but also on her North-Western Frontier, in that less hospitable region, which borders on the snows of the Himalayas and the great Hindu-Kush.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON :
Sir, the first and most agreeable portion of my task to-night is to congratulate the House and my Friends the noble Lord the Member for Down (Viscount Castlereagh) and the hon. Member for the City of Oxford (Mr. Hall) for the manner in which they have moved and seconded the Address. It is unnecessary for me to say anything respecting the speech which has just been delivered. The hon. Member who has just spoken has on former occasions often taken part in our debates, and all will be prepared to admit the ability he has on those occasions manifested. With regard to the Mover of the Address, although the last Lord Castlereagh who sat in this House was a statesman with whose politics we on this side of the House could not generally agree, I am sure we shall all be disposed to welcome the appearance of the noble Lord who spoke first to-night, and I hope he will rival the distinction which has been acquired by various members of his family.

Certainly the Members who moved and seconded the Address have had before them an easier task than that which has fallen to some of their Predecessors ; for Her Majesty's Government have, I must admit, succeeded in compressing the Queen's Speech within shorter limits than those which have marked former documents. Therefore, I suppose, it was not thought necessary for either the Mover or the Seconder of the Address to enter into the consideration of the great variety of those disconnected topics which have frequently somewhat embarrassed Members who had a similar duty to perform. No doubt the haste with which it has been found necessary to summon Parliament will account for some of the omissions which we may perceive in the Queen's Speech ; but there are other omissions for which I do not think that hasty summons furnishes a sufficient excuse.

In the first place, I have noticed with very great surprise that there is no allusion to the Colonies in the Speech. I believe the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Colonies has attended the recent deliberations of the Cabinet, and I believe he is at present in his place, and that he knows how that has come about. I believe and understand, and we are all aware, that events of the gravest character are occurring in one of the Colonies of South Africa ; that a war is actually in progress in that Colony which is occasioning much excitement and some measure of alarm there ; and that it has been found necessary to send out reinforcements from the mother country. Yet Her Majesty's Government seem to think it so utterly trifling and unimportant a matter that in Her Majesty's Speech it is not even mentioned. I cannot help thinking that such neglect as this is likely to be felt very deeply by the Colonies. It is possible that no measures dealing with the matter are in contemplation by Her Majesty's Government ; but a few words of sympathy and encouragement for the difficulties under which the Colony is at present labouring would have been found acceptable, and would not have been thrown away.

There are, Sir, a few lines devoted to the progress made in the re-organization of European Turkey under the provisions of the Treaty of Berlin. I do not complain that the reference is very short ; but I think the House will probably expect to have from Her Majesty's Ministers some further information with regard to the matter. Since the Prorogation of Parliament we all know that one of the provisions of the Treaty has been carried into effect ; but not without very prolonged resistance on the part of the Turkish people or the Government, and a very considerable loss of life and injury to the resources of Austria. We heard a few weeks ago—as has been mentioned by the hon. Member who has just sat down—that there were considerable difficulties in the plan of organizing a new Province in Eastern Roumelia. We heard, and it was supposed at that time, that obstacles had been thrown in the way by Russia. I trust, however, from the language at the end of Her Majesty's Speech, that the Government will be able to inform us that this is not the case. At the same time, I believe that these obstacles to the desired organization of the Province are very great, and arise both from the difficulty of framing a Constitution for the Province, and also from the disinclination of its inhabitants to remain under Turkish rule. I trust, Sir, that in these matters we shall have some information from Her Majesty's Government; and that they will be able to inform us that it will not be necessary to employ force upon the inhabitants of Eastern Roumelia in order to impose upon them a Government to which they are irrevocably opposed.

I think the hon. Member for Oxford felt the force of the omissions from Her Majesty's Speech when he referred to the existing depression of trade, and that he thought the matter one worthy of mention in Her Majesty's Speech. It is possible—nay, it is probable—that that depression is beyond the power of control of Her Majesty's Government; but are we to gather from the Speech that they have no legislative intentions with the view of endeavouring to improve the existing state of things? I believe it is unexampled in the history of Queen's Speeches that Parliament should be opened without a single indication from the Throne of the subject of domestic legislation during the Session. We are not without precedent in this case. A Conservative Government was in power when Parliament was hastily summoned at an earlier period of the year than the present for the consideration of a very similar subject. Parliament was summoned, in 1867, on account of the war in Abyssinia, in the middle of the month of November; but on that occasion the form of Her Majesty's gracious Speech was the usual form. The subjects of legislation were set forth at length, and the Business intended to be laid before Parliament during the Session was mentioned in the usual manner. I hope, Sir, that Her Majesty's Government will be able to inform us that the remarkable omission to which I have referred arises from the fact that the Government have not yet made up their minds as to the legislation they are about to introduce; or whether, on the other hand, they know what Bills they will bring in, but that they are of such infinitesimal importance that they could not properly require or find a place in Her Majesty's gracious Speech.

I now come, Sir, to the subject which occupies the greater portion of Her Majesty's Speech, and which was the cause of Parliament being summoned at an earlier period than usual. And here I may point out the extraordinary position in which Parliament is placed. It is now but a few months since we were rejoicing at the conclusion of a Treaty—the Treaty of Berlin—and of an arrangement which we were told had given us “peace with honour.” Within those few months we find ourselves involved in a war, a war which may be—I trust it will not be, but which may be—an anxious and a prolonged war. Although it is not a formidable war, having regard to the antagonist with whom we are immediately engaged in it, yet we cannot conceal from ourselves that it is a war which may probably bring us further difficulties and complications with a more powerful Empire. Well, Sir, and what are the circumstances under which we are called together? Some time since we were told by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department that a cloud had arisen on the horizon in the East. Well, Sir, that cloud we now find has been in the sight of Her Majesty's Government for the last two years, and yet this House has been in perfect ignorance of its existence; and so far as any official communication to it was concerned, so far as they had information other than that derived from the ordinary sources open to every hon. Member, might have assembled to day and heard in Her Majesty's gracious Speech for the first time that anything had disturbed the tranquillity of our relations in India. It is true that Papers have been laid before us; but with regard to those Papers I think the House has just cause to complain. Three months ago Her Majesty's Government must have been perfectly aware, from the repulse of the Mission, that, whether the matter was amicably settled or not, it should become the subject of discussion in Parliament, and that information should be laid before Parliament. A large portion of those Papers might have been published in the early part of this year; but, though it was known three months since that the Papers must necessarily be presented to Parliament, they were only placed in the hands of hon. Members on Saturday last, and a portion of them only within the last few hours; while other important Papers which bear closely upon the subject, relating to affairs in Central Asia, and which were promised in answer to a Question put by my hon. Friend the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke) at the conclusion of last Session, were only presented last Monday. That, in my opinion, is a very serious matter. It is one not merely affecting the convenience of hon. Members, but which may affect the character and the honour of this House. The case of the Government, I presume, is contained in the Papers which lie on the Table, and the statement of facts as they have occurred has been given in the Queen's Speech. It may reasonably be contended that it would be the proper course and absolutely necessary for any hon. Member who desired to question the policy, the expediency, or the justice of this war to make himself acquainted at the earliest possible period with the contents of those Papers, and to raise those questions upon the earliest possible opportunity—namely, upon voting the Address to the Crown; but, in my opinion, the conduct of Her Majesty's Government, to which I have referred, has rendered such a course impossible. The Papers are so voluminous, the subject to many of us is so new, it requires such careful consideration, that no hon. Member would be justified in calling the attention of the House to this great question and asking it to pronounce a final opinion on the conduct pursued by Her Majesty's Government until the House had more time than it could possibly get to examine the case of the Government as set forth in those Papers. Sir, as I have suggested, it may probably become necessary, and be the duty of some hon. Member, to call in question the policy and expediency of this war. But before I go further let me say for myself, and, I believe, for those who sit near me, that we have not the slightest intention to oppose in any way any proposition the Government may make for obtaining the necessary Supplies and means for carrying on the war. In my opinion, this war has been entered upon by Her Majesty's Government, a Government—unfortunately as I think—entrusted by Parliament with full powers to enter upon such a course—a Government—unfortunately again, as I think—which has received many proofs of the confidence of the present Parliament, and therefore, as I have stated, fully entitled and empowered to advise the Crown to exercise its Prerogative of declaring war. Under those circumstances, it appears to me that it is due to the safety and honour of our gallant Army—it is due also, I will admit, to the safety and honour of our Empire in India—that a war once entered upon, whether rightly or otherwise, should be conducted with vigour and conducted to a successful end. I may even go further, and say that I think it is now the truest mercy to the Ameer himself and to his people that the war which has been begun should not be allowed to linger, but that it should be brought to a speedy conclusion. For these reasons, Sir, I have no intention whatever to oppose any measure which Her Majesty's Government may think it necessary to bring before the House for the purpose of obtaining means to prosecute the war; and for these reasons I have also the very greatest pleasure in congratulating the House and Her Majesty's Government upon the news which has been received to-day. As this war has been entered upon, it is no doubt satisfactory that it should be prosecuted, as I have said, with vigour; and it is satisfactory, too, to know that so far as the operations have hitherto been conducted, they have been well conceived and admirably executed.

Well, Sir, having said that, I revert to what I said before, and I must acknowledge that the discussions which took place previous to the assembling of Parliament, and the perusal, as fully as I have been able to read them, of the Papers, have raised doubts, and more than doubts—they have given rise to a very strong conviction in my mind—that the conduct and policy of Her Majesty's Government which have led to the outbreak of this war are not capable of justification. I trust, Sir, that we shall not be told that, now that the war has broken out, it is mere waste of time to go back to the origin of the war; that a patriotic Parliament has but one duty to perform—namely, to ignore the past, and simply to support the Government who have undertaken the war. If it were necessary to refer to precedents, I could point to the conduct pursued by the Opposition at the close of the last and the beginning of the present century in the course of the War of Independence with the American Colonies and the Revolutionary War with France. With respect to the first case, at all events, I think there is no doubt that the Opposition took a wise and patriotic course in opposing, and continuing to oppose, the Government during that war. With regard to the other there may be more difference of opinion. But I may remind the House that in 1857, in the other House of Parliament, the late Lord Derby, and in this House Mr. Cobden, supported by the present Prime Minister, by the whole Conservative Party, by many hon. Members on both sides of the House, did not think it unpatriotic to pass a Vote of Censure upon Lord Palmerston on account of the war which was in progress at the time. But it is unnecessary to refer to precedent on the subject, for reason points to the same conclusion. Therefore, if the Papers had been placed in the hands of hon. Members at an earlier period, it would have been competent to them not only to discuss and criticise, but, if necessary, to condemn the policy and conduct of Her Majesty's Government. If this policy has culminated in a war without the knowledge of Parliament, it would be strange if that fact should absolve the House from the duty of criticizing the conduct of the Government. I think, indeed, that the very fact of war having broken out would only make the conduct of the Government more worthy of criticism. I have very little doubt that the Government themselves would not feel a complete confidence in the goodness of their case in justification of this war. The unofficial explanations repeatedly put forward by Gentlemen holding official positions—explanations put forward in anticipation of the meeting of Parliament—appear to me to be open to objection and to point to that conclusion. The publication of Lord Cranbrook's despatch of the 19th of November, in anticipation of the publication of the Papers, appears to me to point to the same conclusion, and I must confess that the publication of that despatch appears to me to be open to grave misapprehension and objection. The publication of such a document, reviewing the whole of the long series of events referred to in the long series of Papers, I think could only be justified by giving to it the strictest character of an historical narrative. Without imputing any intentional partiality to Her Majesty's Government in this matter, I think that it is very difficult for a statement of this kind, made by one of a party implicated in these transactions, and who has taken part in them, to be made a strictly historical narrative. Such a statement made in these circumstances is very apt to become, not an impartial historical narrative, but a mere statement of the case upon one side, and accordingly that is what I find to be the character of this despatch; and I contend that, therefore, that document is not calculated to enable Parliament and the country to form a calm and deliberate judgment upon what has occurred. That despatch has been allowed for some weeks to sink into the mind of the country before the statement on the other side could be put forward. No sooner, however, was that despatch put forward than we find its impartiality challenged. I am unwilling to refer to a matter that has already been dealt with at considerable length by those who possess a much fuller knowledge of the subject than I can pretend to have; but I wish not to pass it over altogether unnoticed, because I desire to give the right hon. Gentleman opposite an opportunity of giving the House some explanation with regard to it. I refer to what has taken place with respect to the 9th and 10th paragraphs of Lord Cranbrook's despatch. In those paragraphs extraordinary importance is attached to certain negotiations which took place between Lord Northbrook, the then Governor General of India, and the Envoy of the Ameer. I am not saying that any actual statement is made; but the general impression conveyed by those paragraphs has been challenged by those who were concerned in the transactions referred to. The impression conveyed is that Lord Northbrook, finding that the Ameer of Afghanistan was seriously alarmed at the Russian progress in Central Asia, desired to give to the Ameer certain more extended assurances of support and protection than had hitherto been offered to him by the British Government; and that on his telegraphing to the Home Government for permission to do so, he was told that the then Government did not share the Ameer's apprehensions, and that the result of the telegram in reply was to tie Lord Northbrook's hands and to prevent him from giving the assurances which the Ameer desired to receive, and to put the matter off until a more convenient season. That is the impression which would be conveyed to the mind of any ordinary man on reading the paragraphs of the despatch to which I have referred. What are the facts, however, as they appear in the Papers and in the narrative of Lord Northbrook? The Ameer had not sought the interview with Lord Northbrook in vain. On the contrary, Lord Northbrook had himself desired to communicate with the Ameer, in order to explain what had taken place with regard to the boundaries of Seistan and also the character of the negotiations which had taken place between the British and Russian Governments in reference to the Northern boundaries of Afghanistan. Lord Northbrook found, in the course of his conversation with the Envoy of the Ameer, that there was considerable alarm in the mind of the latter, and he gave him certain assurances which had been given by previous Governors General, and telegraphed to the Home Government for authority to give the Ameer further and more precise assurances on the point. The Government replied to him in a telegram which authorized him to give the further assurance that the British Government would pursue a certain policy with regard to Afghanistan. The result was that Lord Northbrook gave those re-assurances which he, with the advice of his Council, was prepared to give, and refused simply those conditions which were asked for by the Envoy, and which neither he nor his Council had the slightest intention of giving, or thought it was possible that any Government would give. That is a short statement of the difference on this part of the despatch. I do not impute to Lord Cranbrook any intention to convey a false impression; I merely wish to show the difficulty of making a statement of this sort thoroughly impartial. The questions which are involved in the accuracy of the remaining portions of Lord Cranbrook's despatch are of a very much graver and more important character; and on the accuracy, or the want of accuracy, of those statements it contains depends the question whether this war and the policy of Her Majesty's Government are justified or not. The hon. Member for Oxford (Mr. Hall) has stated substantially, and with great ability, the version of the story conveyed by this despatch. I need hardly go over it again; but perhaps the House will permit me to recapitulate the main points of the case put forward by Her Majesty's Government, as I understand them. When Lord Lytton went out to India as Governor General, he found that the Ameer of Afghanistan was unfriendly to us. He found that proofs of his ill-will and unfriendliness had been accumulating for some time; that he had become more and more estranged from us; and that he had been negotiating with the Government of Russia; and, in fact, he found that all the efforts which had been made, and all the sacrifices which had been incurred, by the British Government had been thrown away; and that instead of having on our North-Western Frontier, as we had hoped, the Ameer as an Ally and as an advanced guard of our Indian Empire against invasion, he was, on the contrary, no Ally at all, but a mere instrument in the hands of possible enemies of this country. That I gather is the correct statement of the representation of the Government as to matters existing between this country and Afghanistan. But the story goes on that Lord Lytton went out with instructions from Her Majesty's Government to correct this state of things. He went out to offer the Ameer an alliance under far more favourable terms than had hitherto been offered by any previous Government. But the sole condition required as preliminary to the alliance was one of eventual safety to the Ameer himself, as well as for our own protection. It was that our Agents should be permitted to reside in certain parts of Afghanistan. It is further reported that the Ameer was approached in a most conciliatory manner, and that overtures were made in a manner most calculated to insure a favourable reception. Notwithstanding this the negotiation fell through, and the Ameer declined to accede to the condition. After long consultations with Sir Lewis Pelly nothing further remained for the Government than to adopt an absolute vigilant reserve, not, as I understand it, being on bad terms with the Ameer, but simply on terms of vigilance and watchfulness, in the hope that time would enable him to see the advantage of the proposals which we made to him, and the danger he was incurring by rejecting our alliance and holding himself aloof from us. At this point the Russian Mission was despatched to Cabul, where it met with a very ostentatious reception, and Her Majesty's Government thought it necessary that a Mission from India should also be received by the Ameer; but, notwithstanding the fact, as stated, that representations to this effect were made in the most friendly spirit by the Government of India, permission to send a Mission was most positively refused by the Ameer, and when the Mission attempted to approach it was stopped in a most ostentatious manner by a hostile force. That I understand to be the history of these despatches. I admit at once the perfect accuracy of the position, that if the attitude of the Ameer has been correctly described in these Papers, it went a long way towards establishing the painful necessity for the war which has been undertaken. I say "the painful necessity," because, even if it were established, it is difficult to see what useful object we can hope to gain by having undertaken it.

I must say, however, that, on the other hand, there is a very different case set up, and it is contended that that case is supported by a greater weight of authority and of evidence than is contained within the pages of the Blue Book which has been issued by Her Majesty's Government. I, however, have no intention on this occasion to attempt to prove any allegation. I have already said that, in my opinion, the time has not come when the House can with advantage be asked seriously to discuss the bearing of these Papers. I do not wish to argue anything; but having stated what I take to be the opinion of the Government, I wish to show briefly what I understand as the nature of the case which may be set up on the other side in support of the view that Her Majesty's Government were not justified in undertaking the war in which we are now engaged with the Ameer of Cabul. Now, Sir, what is that case? It is this—The view to which I allude is based on the fact that before the departure of Lord Northbrook from India the relations of Her Majesty's Indian Government with the Ameer, though not cordial or altogether satisfactory, presented no element of danger; that the Ameer was thoroughly convinced that he had no danger to apprehend from aggressions upon our part, but that he was very seriously alarmed at possible aggressions on the part of Russia; that he had shown no symptom of rejecting our advice, but had conformed to it in his Frontier relations and in the matter of the Seistan boundary; and that, in fact, the main object of the policy of successive Viceroy's from the time of Dost Mahomed had been secured, and there was no occasion to alter it. In fact, he showed that the bad terms were the result of the policy which had been adopted by Lord Canning and his successors—Lord Lawrence and Lord Mayo. Lord Lytton when he arrived was determined to remedy this state of things and was prepared to offer an alliance. The requirement of a preliminary Conference was a proceeding which all the best authorities in India condemned as unwise and dangerous. It prepared the way for the proposed Treaty by a pretext as transparently unwise as it was un-English. Lord Lytton put forward a pretext, in which the Ameer saw only the fulfilment of those schemes for the partition of his country which, although made and discussed here, he was perfectly well acquainted with, and which he at once prepared to resist. He was addressed, before any interview had taken place, in letters which contained threats which were calculated to alarm him, and which did alarm him. These threats were repeated in an interview which was had between the Ameer and our Native Envoy, who conducted the negotiations with considerable skill and ability, and in the course of which the Ameer protested against the conditions sought to be imposed upon him, and appealed to the Treaties which had been concluded with him, and the assurances he had received from various Envoys, as to the position which he was to hold in relation to political matters affecting his country. At the end of this negotiation a violent letter was written by Lord Lytton for transmission to the Ameer, in which his conduct was denounced, and in which Lord Lytton repudiated the obligation contracted by the British Government towards that of Afghanistan; and, in short, cast off the alliance which had been entered into. The Conference was put an end to by the death of the Envoy; but Lord Lytton concluded the business, and did so on the basis of renouncing our obligations to the Ameer, although he was informed that another Envoy was on the road, and instructed to accept our terms.

I will now point out a singular circumstance in connection with all these events. All the accounts given of the Conferences at Peshawur are reported in one single despatch from the Government in India to the Government at home. These transactions are not, as is usually the case, related in despatches sent at short intervals, while the events were in progress. During the whole, or at least a great part, of that time—a period of 15 months—there appears to have been but this single despatch. Why was that? Is it a fact, as has been surmised, that if the despatches which passed were published they would not point to an unanimous, or nearly unanimous, opinion between the Viceroy and the Home Government; or is it a fact that the high-handed measures of Lord Lytton did not receive the cordial support and concurrence even of his own Government? I certainly [think that explanations on this point ought to be received, and that is my sole reason for mentioning it at the present juncture. Then, a year after these events, it was found that a Russian Envoy had arrived at Cabul. Could the Government be surprised at that? Lord Lytton, having repudiated the relations between his Government and that of the Ameer, was it to be wondered at that the Ameer should seek the support of, or throw himself into the arms of, his next most powerful neighbour? I do not deny that Her Majesty's Government [were, probably, justified in requiring that the Ameer should receive an Embassy; but it does not seem clear, on the face of the Papers, that the refusal to grant a reception was a positive one, or one couched in such terms as to justify Her Majesty's Government in proceeding by force of arms against the Ameer. It is stated in the despatches that the Ameer strongly complained of the tone of the letters addressed to himself and to his Ministers; but in spite of all these things, there appears to be good reason for believing that the Ameer was perfectly willing to receive the Mission if only it was understood that it came by his permission and was not forced upon him. Notwithstanding that, no delay was granted, and the consequence was the stoppage of the Mission.

I have now briefly stated the arguments which may be put forward on the opposite side, and I think it puts the matter in a very different light. It is, therefore, for the House to decide as to the view and the statement of facts which is most entitled to support and credence. What opinion can the House pronounce, except that the Governor General and the Government never had any serious intention in these negotiations with Shere Ali; because we heard nothing then about a "scientific Frontier" or "irresponsible frivolity"—the words of truth and justice were much more heard. Was it not, then, reasonable to infer that the account which I have just given, and which shows that the Government was in search of a scientific Frontier, indicates that the Government did not object to find a pretext for a quarrel with the Ameer? If that is not the explanation, I should like to hear what explanation can be given. If their object was to cultivate friendly relations with the Ameer, and to secure in him a friendly Ally instead of a sullen enemy, I must say they have mismanaged the negotiations as negotiations never before were mismanaged.

I know what is said on another view of this question, and I know that it is said this is not a matter which merely concerns Great Britain and a small Frontier State; that we cannot leave out the great question of the advance of Russia in Asia. I can assure the House that I am by no means indifferent to the gravity of the considerations involved in that question. No Government—no Party—in this country has been indifferent to these considerations. There is no despatch which is more remarkable than one of the earliest written by the Government of Sir John Lawrence—the greatest advocate of what is called "masterly inactivity"—in which the attention of the Government of 1867 is directed to the advance of Russia in Central Asia. In that despatch the Government of Sir John Lawrence pointed out what was the character and what the inevitable course of that advance, and they prophesied with remarkable accuracy the extent to which Russian progress would extend. There is one despatch in this Book which is still more remarkable. It is the answer given by the Government of the day—by the right hon. Gentleman opposite, who was Secretary of State for India—and the expressions are so remarkable that I shall ask the House to allow me to read them. They are the only extracts I intend to read. The extract to which I refer states that—

“Upon this point [the question of the progress of Russia in Central Asia], Her Majesty's Government see no reason for any uneasiness or for any jealousy. The conquests which Russia has made, and apparently is still making in Central Asia, appear to them to be the natural result of the circumstances in which she finds herself placed, and to afford no ground whatever for representations indicative of suspicion or alarm on the part of this country. Friendly communications have at various times passed between the two Governments on the subject, and should an opportunity offer Her Majesty's Government will avail themselves of it for the purpose of obviating any possible danger of misunderstanding either with respect to the proceedings of Russia, or to those of England. This is all that it appears necessary or desirable to do.”—[Afghanistan, No. 1, pp. 25-6.]

[An hon. MEMBER: What is the date?] I said 1867. I have pointed out that the Government was informed of the inevitable progress which would be forced upon Russia, and the extent to which Russia would be forced in a few years to extend her dominions. I am not imputing any blame to the Government of the day; but I say there is no excuse for imputing to the late Government, or to any other Government, that they were indifferent to the movements of Russia. I am perfectly willing to admit the possible danger and the certain inconvenience to our external and internal relations with India, with the power of Russia bordering on the Frontiers of India. I am perfectly willing to admit this; but it does not follow that that danger is disposed of by rushing into hasty or ill-considered measures in the way of extending our Frontiers. Certainly, the effect of an advance on our part will not be to retard, but rather to accelerate the danger which will ensue when our Frontiers are coterminous with those of another European Power. It is not an infallible remedy against an apprehended danger; and we may hasten the danger, if we take the initiative and advance to meet Russia. The policy of all former Governments has been to deal with Russia direct in this question—to hold Russia responsible for what she was doing in Asia—and not the intermediary States which are coming within her influence. That has been the policy of former Governments. It has also always been our policy to provide that, when Russia approached towards India, she should find other States well affected to us, anxious to maintain their own independence—States jealous of the danger of Russian advance. That, however, has not been the policy of the present Government; for we find that it holds, not Russia responsible for what it is doing in Asia, but it holds the unfortunate State of Afghanistan responsible for it—a country which will not be rendered jealous by the Russian advance, which will not be actuated by feelings of amity towards us, but which will be forced to fall into the arms of Russia. Before I sit down I have only to refer again to the condition of complete ignorance in which Parliament has been kept; and I think we have something more to complain of than the neglect that information has not been communicated to us. It has been withheld from us. In the Session of 1877 the attention of the Government was called by the Duke of Argyll to this subject of the North-West Frontier of India, and in reply to the Question Lord Salisbury replied as follows:—

“Now, we have not tried to force an Envoy upon the Ameer at Cabul—we have not suggested Sir Lewis Pelly as an Envoy to Cabul. . . . . Our relations with the Ameer of Cabul have undergone no material change since last year. I do not believe that he is worse disposed towards us than hitherto, or that his feelings are in any way more embittered towards the British Government. . . . . If it is necessary to re-open the Conference it will be done under better auspices. . . . . There is no ground for any of the apprehensions to which the noble Duke has referred, or for suspicions which are too absurd to be seriously entertained. . . . . But there is no reason for any apprehension of any change of policy, or of disturbance in our Indian Empire.”—[3 Hansard, ccxxxiv. 1835-6.]

I am not going to controvert any of these statements. I have no doubt that proof may be brought forward for the verbal accuracy of every word that has been stated; but what I want to bring before the House is the general impressions and inferences of that statement, and what it seems to sanction, judged by what has taken place at Peshawur. Who will imagine for a moment, after hearing that speech, that an interview had taken place between the Envoy of the Ameer of Afghanistan and the Representative of the British Government?

There was a similar attempt to obtain information from the noble Lord the Member for Middlesex (Lord George Hamilton). In the debate on the 9th of August, 1877, the noble Lord said—

“He hoped that the frank exchange of opinion which had undoubtedly passed between Sir Lewis Pelly and the Ameer's Envoy had removed previous misconception, and would lead to a restoration of those friendly terms which had formerly existed.”—[3 Hansard, cccxxvi. 707.]

I need not refer to the further declarations of Lord Salisbury, nor to a speech made by the right hon. Gentleman opposite, giving a warm adherence to what is called the old policy, and saying he would be no party to any change in it. Again, Sir, precautions should be taken by the Government to relieve this House up to the present moment of a serious responsibility. The responsibility is not shared in the slightest degree by Parliament at present. It will be shared in a few days no doubt; but, in my opinion, that does not relieve the House in the slightest degree. On the contrary, it is still more incumbent on this House to examine the policy which has led to this. I do not intend to take up the attention of the House any further. It will, no doubt, be anxious to hear from the Ministers what information the Government has to give, and to hear such explanations which may have some influence on the judgment of the House as to the objects of the war; and I do not think any explanation on that point can avert, or ought to relieve, the responsibility of asserting a judgment which the House ought to form on the previous conduct and policy of the Government which led to the outbreak of the present war.

MR. GLADSTONE: I purposely rise, notwithstanding the Chancellor of the Exchequer has risen, for a reason which will be obvious. I do not propose to enter at all, on the present occasion, into what I conceive to be controversial matter. My noble Friend has made the observations that he thinks necessary, and I have no wish to make any addition to those observations. He has given us a distinct intimation that, on a future occasion, a Motion will be made which will open up fully the whole question of the merits of the policy which has led to the present war, and the merits of the war itself. That being so, I feel under no obligation to touch the matter at present; but, that being so, I take it likewise to be quite clear that nothing shall be said or done in the Address which shall have the effect of committing us to any opinions expressed. I am going to point out what I think an unfortunate error, an error which I do not think anybody in the least degree to blame for, but it is an error which has probably arisen from the haste of preparation; and I know that sentences sometimes assume a form and colour, in fact, which is far from the intention of those who phrased them. It is almost habitual with us not to pay a very close attention to these Addresses when they are read, and I am very far from blaming the noble Lord and the hon. Gentlemen who have so well discharged their duties to-night; yet, at the same time, it is a matter of grave consideration for those whose minds do not happen to be in the same attitude, that we should not be called upon to express an opinion on the hostility of the Ameer's policy, and the manner in which he has repulsed Her Majesty's Mission, leaving Her Majesty no alternative but war. [Cheers.] I do not question that sentiment on the present occasion; but is it the meaning of the hon. Gentleman who so gallantly cheers me that I am to be called upon to vote that? That is the obvious meaning of his cheer, if it has any meaning; but, in truth, I do not believe it has any meaning. I do not think it will be necessary to postpone discussion on the Address for this reason, as doubtless Her Majesty's Government will see fit to make some verbal Amendment, which will have the desired effect. I reserve myself entirely for a future occasion, when we shall be enabled to open up the merits of the question. I am anxious to make one observation merely in the manner of question. It would be of great advantage to the House if Her Majesty's Government could on one or two points enlarge the information given us on this subject. My noble Friend has referred to points apparently omitted—one a reference to the distress in the country, and the other a reference to the war at the Cape. The point I want information upon is this—It is stated in Her Gracious Majesty's Speech from the Throne that Her Majesty contemplates with confidence the execution of the requisitions of the Treaty of Berlin. There is one point among those requisitions with regard to which it does not appear that any progress has been made, so far as the public are informed. I mean the question relating to the Greek Frontier. I have heard various rumours of efforts made by other Powers, and of efforts made by Her Majesty's Government, in this direction. I am quite sure it is a matter on which the country feels a lively interest; and if Her Majesty's Government are in possession of, and can give the House any information on the subject, I think it will be received with thankfulness. There is another omission which I think is rather remarkable, considering that in the Speech at the close of the last Session there was a very full paragraph on what is called the Anglo-Turkish Convention, and the purposes are very distinctly described. It is singular that this matter does not re-appear in any form in the Speech which has now been delivered. I will not say that sufficient time has elapsed for the execution of reforms in Asiatic Turkey; but five months have elapsed since that Instrument was executed between the Sultan and Her Majesty: and I do think that, after all that has been said upon this subject and considering the obligations under which the Turks have been to England, some progress ought to have been made by the Porte in, at all events, initiating reform. If Her Majesty's Government can give the House any information with regard to reforms in Turkey, I am sure it will be received with great thankfulness. There is only one other subject to which I will refer. Notice has been given on the part of Her Majesty's Government that a Resolution will be moved on Monday next that the charges of this war shall be borne out of Indian funds. For my own part, I concur in what has been stated by my noble Friend. I do not think the House, in the position in which it is placed, is in a condition to refuse the Supplies necessary for carrying on the war; but the very fact of its not being in a position to exercise a judgment on that subject must be a very important element in the general discussion as to the mode in which the House came to be placed in that position. But with regard to the particular question relating to the charges of the war, we are, I submit, free to exercise a discretion upon it. In that discretion is involved a vital principle altogether apart from any desire to withhold the means necessary for defraying the engagements into which the Crown has entered. I hope, then, that accurate information as to the probable charges of this undertaking will be given, and that the explanations regarding them will be full and explicit. It will be remembered that on the occasion of the Abyssinian War, 11 years ago, we felt under very serious difficulty. What was stated by the Government in relation to that war was supposed to be the outside cost of that war, and no more at that time was said upon the subject. When, however, Parliament was dissolved and the new Parliament had met, the amount of the charge on being examined into was found to be about double that which had been stated to the House by the Government. I am sure that Her Majesty's Government will be anxious to avoid any error of this kind with respect to the present war charges. I trust that when the explanations in respect to them will be made that they will be given with as much accuracy as possible; and that it will be perfectly understood that upon all questions relating to the proposals of the Government the House shall retain an unlimited discretion.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I will endeavour, in the observations with which it will be my duty to trouble the House at the present time, to follow the example which has been so well set by the noble Lord (the Marquess of Hartington), and not import into our discussion to-night anything that can be advanced of a controversial character before this matter is finally parted with by Parliament. I feel that the noble Lord and my right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich, in abstaining on the present occasion from importing the premature discussion of questions which will by-and-by have to be fully considered and discussed with the debate on the Address, have exercised a wise and convenient discretion. I wish, I may add, at the outset to dispose of one or two points which may be considered of a formal character, and with respect to which we can all agree. In the first place, with reference to what has been said by both of those who have spoken from the opposite Bench as to the manner in which the Address has been moved and seconded. I am sure what has fallen from them will be in consonance with the feelings of the whole House. My noble Friend (Viscount Castlereagh), in his first essay in public speaking in this House, has, I think, broken the ice in a manner which leads us to hope that we shall often meet him in the field of debate, and that he will sustain the honoured name he bears. As to my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford (Mr. Hall), he has well maintained to-night the reputation which he had previously already established. I am, at all events, quite sure, that whoever is to blame—if, indeed, there be anybody to blame—for the incorrectness of expression which has been noticed in the Address, it cannot be either the Mover or the Seconder. The Address has been prepared in the usual manner, and there is no doubt that the thoroughly well-understood habit of this House is that it should be so drawn as not to raise any question of controversy in the moving of the Address. It is obviously for our convenience that the Address should be as positively neutral as it can be, and that we should simply confine ourselves to thanking Her Majesty for the information which She has been good enough to communicate to us. The intention with which the present Address was framed was certainly to do that and no more; but it may, no doubt, be a question among very acute critics whether the particular phraseology employed may not fairly be held to go a little further. Nobody will for a moment suppose that there was any desire to do so, and I would venture, Sir, to leave the matter in your hands. If you should be of opinion that the expressions to which exception has been taken could be improved by a slight verbal Amendment, there would, I believe, be no difficulty in getting the correction made. I suppose the Motion might be withdrawn, and renewed in a more proper form.

Now, there is another point on which I wish to say a few words. The noble Lord opposite (the Marquess of Hartington) has remarked that the Speech is one of unprecedented brevity, which is perfectly true; and he has, I think, gone so far as to say that there is no precedent for any Royal Speech at the commencement of a Session, however suddenly that Session might have begun, in which some reference was not made to measures of domestic legislation. I do not think, however, that the noble Lord is quite accurate in that observation. It is quite true that in the case to which he referred—the meeting of Parliament in 1867—domestic measures were alluded to in the Royal Speech; but there is an earlier instance when Parliament was called together, in 1854, with reference to the question of the Crimean War, in which no allusion to domestic measures was made, more specifically than on the present occasion. Her Majesty's Government, after fully considering the advice they should give Her Majesty on the subject, thought it would be more convenient that on this occasion the attention of Parliament should be directed exclusively to the subject which had caused our early and unusual meeting, and that we should reserve for our more regular meeting at the usual time of the year a statement of the Business with which we proposed that Parliament should occupy itself; and, though such a course may not be in accordance with all the precedents which have been referred to, I think it would be more convenient to the House, that when the attention of Parliament is to be directed to questions of domestic legislation, that should be done after full and careful consideration, and that all reference to measures of the kind may be well omitted on such an occasion as the present. For the same reason we have avoided referring to other subjects to which it is usual to refer in the Speech from the Throne. The question we had to consider was, shall we have the Queen's Speech directed exclusively to the subject which brought us together, or shall it be made to deal with matters of a more general character? and we decided to advise Her Majesty to direct the Speech exclusively to one point, there seeming to be no reason why we should go into other questions.

In reference to the various points on which particular questions have been raised, undoubtedly, in the first place, the position of affairs in South Africa is not free from some anxiety. At the end of last Session Parliament was informed that the war in Cape Colony was over, but that there was still cause for anxiety in other parts of South Africa. Since that time, I am sorry to say, the cause of anxiety has increased rather than diminished; and, in compliance with the request of Sir Bartle Frere and Lord Chelmsford, it has been thought advisable to re-inforce our troops in the Zulu territory. But the last advice, dated October 19, says—"There is no war, and we still hope that war may be avoided." Our object has been to send out troops to impress the Zulus with the strength of this country; we hope that there may be no actual collision, and that the relations between us may be improved. We are asked as to the position of the question of Greece. Well, with regard to that, I may say that at the present moment a rectification of the Frontier, as recommended in the Treaty of Berlin by the Six Powers, has certainly not as yet been made. But negotiations are in progress, and we hope a satisfactory settlement may be arrived at. I am not now, however, in a position to go into detail upon that question.

With respect to reforms in that interesting part of the Turkish dominions—the Island of Crete—I believe that the reforms there have been practically arranged, and that a Firman, giving satisfaction to all parties in the Island, is at this moment on the point of being issued.

As to reforms in Asia Minor, these have formed the subject of serious communications between Her Majesty's Government and the Porte, and at the present moment we may say the progress is satisfactory, though the negotiations are still going on; and I am not at this moment in a position to lay the Papers on the subject on the Table of the House. They will, however, be produced as soon as possible. I forget whether there was any other point which my right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich mentioned particularly.

With regard to Cyprus, I hope we may before long be in a position to lay the Papers on the Table; and I wish to say with reference to Cyprus in connection with some observations which I made a month or two ago which seem to have been misunderstood—that we have had very careful estimates prepared, and that so far as those estimates go we are very much encouraged to hope that the revenue of the Island will more than cover the expenditure, exclusive of those matters which belong to the military arrangements. At present that is such a serious exception, that I am not able to go into the question; but the House may be sure it is a matter that engages our attention, and we do not think it is at all probable that Cyprus will be the burden upon us that some persons have supposed. With regard to the expenditure generally, so far as we are able to make any estimate of it, including, of course, military expenditure, the information which I have received from the spending departments encourages me to hope that at the end of the year we shall be able to show that the estimates of the year have not been exceeded. I am sorry I cannot give a thoroughly satisfactory report of some branches of the Revenue; but the course of the Revenue for the last month has been of a character more encouraging than we have recently found it to be: but I do not wish to forecast that about which I am really in the dark.

I now come to a subject which has formed the principal topic of discussion this evening; and I, in the first place, want to assure the noble Lord opposite that I greatly regret that there should have been any delay in the presentation of the Papers which have been laid on the Table of the House. I do not know that there is any blame to be attached to anyone for that delay. The selection of Papers, which are contained in a large mass of correspondence, and which had to be looked over for a series of years, has unavoidably taken up a good deal of time; and when it is necessary, as it has been on this occasion, to consult persons who are affected by the publication of the Papers, a further delay takes place. We did not, till a very recent period, anticipate that it would be necessary to call Parliament together, or to make any appeal to it on this subject. We fully believed—and I think had very good ground for believing—that the necessity which has arisen would not arise. We were fully impressed with the belief—which was also the belief of Lord Lytton—that the Mission we proposed to send to the Ameer at Cabul would be received, and that this unfortunate necessity would not occur. When it did occur, we lost no time in taking the necessary steps for advising Her Majesty to call Parliament together, and in setting about the preparation of the Papers which have been laid before Parliament. The noble Lord complains that while this preparation of Papers

the manner in which the Address has been moved and seconded. I am sure what has fallen from them will be in consonance with the feelings of the whole House. My noble Friend (Viscount Castlereagh), in his first essay in public speaking in this House, has, I think, broken the ice in a manner which leads us to hope that we shall often meet him in the field of debate, and that he will sustain the honoured name he bears. I now come to a subject which has formed the principal topic of discussion this evening; and I, in the first place, want to assure the noble Lord opposite that I greatly regret that there should have been any delay in the presentation of the Papers which have been laid on the Table of the House. I do not know that there is any blame to be attached to anyone for that delay. The selection of Papers, which are contained in a large mass of correspondence, and which had to be looked over for a series of years, has unavoidably taken up a good deal of time; and when it is necessary, as it has been on this occasion, to consult persons who are affected by the publication of the Papers, a further delay takes place. We did not, till a very recent period, anticipate that it would be necessary to call Parliament together, or to make any appeal to it on this subject. We fully believed—and I think had very good ground for believing—that the necessity which has arisen would not arise. We were fully impressed with the belief—which was also the belief of Lord Lytton—that the Mission we proposed to send to the Ameer at Cabul would be received, and that this unfortunate necessity would not occur. When it did occur, we lost no time in taking the necessary steps for advising Her Majesty to call Parliament together, and in setting about the preparation of the Papers which have been laid before Parliament. The noble Lord complains that while this preparation of Papers was going on, the Government took a step in advance by publishing separately a particular despatch of Viscount Cranbrook, summing up the case of the Government, and explaining to the country the views of the Government on the situation of affairs; and the noble Lord intimates that by so doing we were producing an unfair impression, and taking a course which we had no right to take—laying our own case before the country before there was an opportunity of the whole of the Papers being in the hands of the public at large. I can assure the noble Lord there was no intention in the publication of that despatch to endeavour unfairly to prejudice the public mind. We knew the subject was one which, to a great extent, the public were unacquainted with. We knew it was very desirable their attention should be drawn as speedily as possible to the outline of the case, which we endeavoured to present as fairly as it could be done, and which I venture to think we did present fairly. I am not disposed to admit there is a shadow of reason to impute to us anything in the nature of distortion or suppression, or any unfair dealing with the statements we made in that despatch. But there must be, in an account of transactions extending over so many years, and in which so many Governments have been concerned, and so many distinguished persons have taken an active part, and which were of themselves difficult and complicated transactions—there must be many occasions on which different views will prevail, and on which those who are interested will desire to state their case in a different way from that in which it would appear to the Government of the day. And I cannot but think that some advantages have arisen from the publication—premature, if you like to call it—of the despatch of Viscount Cranbrook, because it has given the opportunity to those who are interested in the matter to lay hold of the points to which they wish to draw attention, and to give the answers which they had thought themselves entitled and bound to give. I am told that no opportunity of an answer was given. I really think that is an extraordinary view for anyone to take who considers what has taken place, and what controversy has arisen since the publication of that despatch. If such controversy could go on when no opportunity of an answer was given, what would have gone on if an opportunity had been given I cannot conceive. After all, the despatch only anticipated the publication of all the Papers and the meeting of Parliament, by a very short period; and I must say that it gives very fair notice of the particular points on which explanation may be desired, while its result has been to assist the elucidation of the whole subject. The noble Lord goes on to make a much more serious charge. He imputes that we have introduced into that despatch a paragraph which, according to his view, misrepresented—and almost wilfully misrepresented—the conduct of our Predecessors at an important stage of these transactions. I quite agree with the noble Lord that the relations between statesmen sitting on different sides of the House, and who represent different Parties in the country, ought to be maintained upon a footing of perfect honour and confidence in respect of the representations they make of the conduct of their opponents. We may differ—and we do differ—very widely upon questions of policy; we may—and do—differ very widely upon matters of the greatest importance; and we may express our opinions—and it is well we should do so—with freedom and vigour; yet anything like an unfair representation of the conduct of an opponent is a matter which undoubtedly ought to be visited with most severe censure. But I can only say that having read and re-read the paragraph in question, and having examined and re-examined the correspondence on which that paragraph is founded, I can see no reason whatever for regretting or questioning the language of the paragraph in Lord Cranbrook's despatch. There ought to be no mistake about this despatch. Undoubtedly it was written, and it is signed by Lord Cranbrook; but it is also true that the despatch, before it was finally sent out, was submitted to the whole of the Cabinet, and that we are all responsible for the statements in that despatch—at all events, for the general character of the despatch. With regard to this paragraph 9, I think an undue amount of importance has been given to it in this respect: the noble Lord seems to imagine—as others have seemed to imagine—that our great object throughout this despatch, and especially this part of it, was to throw the blame of what has occurred on our Predecessors in 1873. Undoubtedly there is reason to doubt whether the conduct that was pursued in 1873 had the best results. Whether it was not, on the whole, open to the charge—I will not say charge, but to question—whether it was the proper policy to be adopted. But the great object that we had in writing the despatch, and in setting out this history, was not so much to throw blame on this Government or on that Government, but to show what the progress of events had been, and how matters had come into the state in which we found them when we were obliged to act a short time ago. But with respect to this particular paragraph, the substance and purport of it was that in 1873 certain communications were opened between Lord Northbrook and his Government in India and the Ameer of Afghanistan; that those communications led to an unsatisfactory result; and we attributed—undoubtedly it was a fair inference from the paragraph—that result, in a large measure at all events, to Her Majesty's Government at home. The paragraph certainly gives the impression that it was our belief that the Government at home had overruled Lord Northbrook in India. Lord Northbrook has since said that is not a true statement of the case. Of course, we know nothing of what may have been in the minds of Lord Northbrook or the Government, and we are bound to accept that statement. But allow me to say that if you read the different telegrams which passed between the Cabinet at home and the Government of India the suggestion which is contained in that paragraph is, at least, not an unnatural suggestion. I am sorry to trouble the House with extracts; but the challenge has been made, and it is on a point as to which it is desirable we should not submit to have it said that we are dealing unfairly with our opponents. I must therefore read some portion of this Correspondence. The matter begins in this way—There is a telegram from the Viceroy at Simla to the Secretary of State in London, dated June 27, 1873, and in that we read—

"We think it for interests of peace that Russia should know our relations with Afghanistan, and we say in paragraph 18: 'Although we have abstained from entering into any Treaty engagement to support the Ameer by British troops in the event of Afghanistan being attacked from without, yet the complete independence of Afghanistan is so important to the interests of British India that the Government of India could not look upon an attack upon Afghanistan with indifference. So long as the Ameer continues as he has hitherto done in accordance with our advice in his relations with his neighbours, he would naturally look for material assistance from us; and circumstances might occur under which we should consider it incumbent upon us to recommend Her Majesty's Government to render him such assistance.' I propose to inform Cabul Envoy of sense of this paragraph."—[Afghanistan, No. 1, pp. 102-3.]

What is the answer he receives to that telegram? It is one which certainly appears in the nature of throwing cold water on the proposal. It is dated July 1, from the Secretary of State in London to the Viceroy at Simla—

"I do not object to the general sense of the paragraph, which you quote as a communication to Russia from the Foreign Office, but great caution is necessary in assuring Ameer of material assistance which may raise undue and unfounded expectation. He already shows symptoms of claiming more than we may wish to give."—[Ibid. p. 103.]

That is rather holding back than otherwise, and to a certain extent qualifying the intention of the Viceroy. A short time afterwards, on the 24th of July, after communications had been opened with the Ameer, the Viceroy telegraphs—

"Ameer of Cabul alarmed at Russian progress, dissatisfied with general assurance, and anxious to know definitely how far he may rely on our help if invaded. I propose assuring him that if he unreservedly accepts and acts on our advice in all external relations we will help him with money, arms, and troops, if necessary, to expel unprovoked invasion. We to be the judge of the necessity."—[Ibid.]

To which Her Majesty's Government at home reply—

"Cabinet thinks you should inform Ameer that we do not at all share his alarm, and consider there is no cause for it: but you may assure him we shall maintain our settled policy in favour of Afghanistan, if he abides by our advice in external affairs."—[Ibid.]

I do not deny that those telegrams may have been perfectly well understood between the Secretary of State and the Viceroy to mean that they were entirely in accord as to what they were to do; but certainly the impression of anyone reading the Papers would be that the Ameer was dissatisfied with that indefinite understanding known by the name of "our settled policy;" that the Viceroy had been anxious to say something more definite; and that the language of the Cabinet at home had been rather to throw cold water upon that, and to suggest that the Cabinet did not at all share the alarm of the Ameer. If we turn to Lord Cranbrook's despatch, what do we find in the 9th paragraph?

"Finding that the object of the Ameer was to ascertain definitely how far he might rely on the help of the British Government if his territories were threatened by Russia, Lord Northbrook's Government was prepared to assure him that, under certain conditions, the Government of India would assist him to repel unprovoked aggression. But Her Majesty's Government at home did not share his Highness's apprehension."

That is perfectly true—

"and the Viceroy ultimately informed the Ameer that the discussion of the question would be best postponed to a more convenient season."—[Ibid. p. 282.]

Just so. What was the effect which this communication produced upon the Ameer?

MR. GOSCHEN: You have not read what was said to the Ameer. [Mr. GLADSTONE: Hear, hear!]

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Here it is, at page 114 of the Correspondence.

"The Envoy observed that at the previous interview His Excellency had said that if, in the event of any aggression from without, British influence were invoked and failed by negotiation to effect a satisfactory settlement, it was probable that the British Government would in that case afford the Ruler of Afghanistan material assistance in repelling an invader. His Excellency had also said that such assistance would of course be conditional on the Ameer following the advice of the British Government, and having himself abstained from aggression. Now the Ameer, in expectation of the assistance of the British Government, had up to the present time followed the advice of the Viceroy as regards abstinence from aggression, and in the event of assistance being given would continue to follow that policy."

He goes on to point out that we did not give him sufficient re-assurance. Then the Viceroy made this peculiar communication to him—

"The Viceroy replied that the British Government did not share the Ameer's apprehensions, but that as already mentioned in the previous conversation, it would be the duty of the Ameer, in case of any actual or threatened aggression, to refer the question to the British Government, who would endeavour by negotiation and by every means in their power to settle the matter and avert hostilities. It was not intended, by insisting on such previous reference to the British Government, to restrict or interfere with the power of the Ameer as an independent Ruler to take such steps as might be necessary to repel any aggression on his territories; but such reference was a preliminary and essential condition of the British Government assisting him." [Mr. GOSCHEN: Go on.] "In such event should these endeavours of the British Government to bring about an amicable settlement prove fruitless, the British Government are prepared to assure the Ameer that they will afford him assistance in the shape of arms and money, and will also, in case of necessity aid him with troops."

The Viceroy thought the Ameer should hold this assurance to be sufficient. The Envoy then pressed that the contingency of an act of aggression on the part of Russia should be expressly mentioned in the letter. He was answered that this suggestion could not be adopted, for the British Government were not prepared to admit the possibility of such a contingency occurring. Now, let me conclude this part of the story by referring to the answer which the Ameer gives, at page 119—

"All that has been written regarding the northern boundary I have fully understood, and I offer up my grateful thanks to the Almighty that peace and tranquillity have, praise be to God, been established in all States in perpetuity, and that doubts and disputes have on every side been removed; and that such security has been established in all countries that no aggressions will take place, nor will any Power raise discussions or disputes with another within the dominions of that Power; and that the use of inimical expressions has been discontinued in diplomatic correspondence, and that peace and tranquillity have been secured to the whole world."

Then he goes on and says, in effect—

"Under all these circumstances, why was it necessary to hold all these conversations?" I have intervened so far with these quotations from the Correspondence because of the challenge of the noble Lord opposite. I do not for one moment dispute that Lord Northbrook acted entirely in accordance with his own judgment in what he said, and that it was not in consequence of a communication from the Cabinet, although a suggestion appeared to have come from the Cabinet. But it was impossible in reading these despatches not to remember that when Lord Mayo, in his former dealings with the Ameer in 1869, made certain communications to the Ameer, he was taken to task by the Secretary of State of that same Government, and he had to explain and satisfy them that he had not gone too far in what he had said, which, being of a more definite character, had been quite satisfactory, as we know, to the Ameer. I cannot help thinking that a sort of assurance might have been given by Lord Northbrook, if he had been left as free as Lord Mayo was, to say in what form assistance would be given, and to explain under what circumstances it would be given. There was just that sort of restriction which might be represented by the difference between drinking a glass of champagne fresh out of the bottle and drinking it after it had been allowed to stand for a while. I have no doubt that the effect of all the qualifications insisted upon by Lord Northbrook was to produce upon the mind of the Ameer a wholly different impression from that which would have been produced by more definite assurances. I do not find fault with the Government of that day for what they did. They were placed in great difficulty. The British Government has, throughout its dealings with Afghanistan, been placed in a position which was necessarily difficult and complicated. All I have to point out is, that the attempt to deal with Afghanistan in the way in which we have for many years attempted to deal with it has led to misunderstanding and difficulties; and I cannot doubt that many of those difficulties have been occasioned by errors of judgment, though perfectly honest and honourable. But we are going, by-and-bye, to have a more solemn and serious debate on this question, and it will be the duty of the Under Secretary of State for India, when he states the case and makes a proposal to the House, to take a more general view of our relations from time to time with Afghanistan than I have now done. But the noble Lord has brought another charge of a much more serious character against the Government. He threw out the suggestion that Her Majesty's Government and the Viceroy of India have been guilty of a deliberate intention to pick a quarrel with the Ameer. Now, that is about the most serious charge that could be made. Pick a quarrel which is to bring about a war in which, whatever may be our successes, we must suffer considerably, and in which we must, under any circumstances, inflict great suffering! To bring about a quarrel for the purpose of attaining some object which we do not like to avow is one of the most serious charges that can be made against the Government. It is with the very deepest regret we find ourselves involved in a war at all. It is with the greatest possible reluctance that we have been brought by the force of circumstances to the position in which we find ourselves; and with all our admiration for the gallantry of our troops and for the military operations which have, so far, been conducted, we yet hope that the war will be of very short duration. But with all these qualifications, it cannot but be a matter of most serious regret that we should be forced into such a position; and to say that the Government and the Viceroy have deliberately brought about that state of things, and deliberately picked a quarrel, is to make a very serious charge indeed against the Government. I utterly and entirely deny the charge of the noble Lord. I need not now go through what the case of the Government really is in this matter, because the noble Lord opposite has done it for us. In the most complete and lucid way he stated what he understood to be the case of the Government, and he stated it with the most perfect accuracy. It was, and it always has been, our desire to live upon terms of friendship and to maintain good relations with the Ameer of Afghanistan. Our great object, and the object of all successive Governments, has been but one. We have never desired to enlarge our territories or to annex fresh soil, and certainly not such a country as Afghanistan; but what we have felt it our duty to provide for as well as we could was the security of India. Let me remind the House that it is a question not of ambition, or prestige, or covetousness, or anything of that kind. We are under obligations to those hundreds of millions of subjects who are under our charge in India to procure for them such tranquillity and opportunities for the development of the country as it may be possible for us to do. Whatever difficulties there may be lying in our way, the general effect of the British rule in India, I think, has been to produce happiness among its people, and if our rule were overturned it could not fail to occasion the most serious mischief. The Government has been desirous to prevent this injury, and to maintain the confidence of the Native population in the British rule. Our power in India rests upon two bases—justice and strength, and it is absolutely impossible you can maintain security unless you are known to be strong. What is the quarter from which danger has been apprehended? It is the North-West, and it has been the object of successive Viceroy's in every possible way to prevent and obviate danger from that quarter. We have endeavoured to do that for a long series of years, by keeping up, as far as possible, friendly relations with Afghanistan, and preventing others from interposing there. I do not propose to go into that question further; but I say that that is the object we have sought to attain throughout. Opinions I have formerly expressed have been referred to. Well, Sir, I hold those opinions as strongly as ever I did. I desire now, as ever, to abstain from the taking of an unnecessary step; but when we saw that a Russian Mission was received at Cabul at a time when an English Mission was refused—and refused on two grounds—one, that they could not receive any Mission at all; the other, that if they received an English they must receive a Russian Mission—it was absolutely impossible, if we were to have regard to the question of our security, for us to remain inactive. The noble Lord and the right hon. Gentleman have intimated that, perhaps, we ought to have gone to Russia; and the noble Lord assumes and implies that we did not. Well, but we did. We made inquiries at St. Petersburg as to what the Mission was. And what was the answer we received? It was, that the Mission was sent under circumstances now happily passed away. A friendly character was given to the Mission. But does the noble Lord suppose that we could stop the danger that was going on in that part of the world by communications with St. Petersburg? Does he not know that there is this real difficulty—that the Government of Russia is often ignorant of what is going on in the neighbourhood of Afghanistan and in Central Asia, or is powerless to prevent or control the proceedings of its officers. It was necessary for us to take some step to secure our proper position in Central Asia. We acted upon that principle, and we sent a Mission with every precaution that could suggest itself to us, so that it might be received in a friendly manner. It was a Mission at the head of which was an officer well known to the Ameer—a friend of the Ameer's—and whose views were of the most pacific character. It was sent with every circumstance of care and caution, that it might not interfere with the mourning then going on in the Ameer's Court. How was it met? It was met with hostile interruption upon territory which did not belong to the Ameer, for it was in a Pass which belongs to tribes more or less independent of the Ameer, but upon whom he put pressure, under threats of punishment, to refuse acquiescence to our passage, after they had assisted the Mission to come in a friendly way towards the Pass. Under these circumstances, what alternative had we? I venture to say that when the case is fully stated, and the judgment of the House is asked upon it, it will be very difficult, indeed, to show that the course taken by Her Majesty's Government was not forced upon us, or was one which we could have avoided without serious danger to British interests or the interests of the people of India. Well, Sir, something has been said as to the probable extent and limits of this war. It is impossible at this moment, when military operations are going on, to speak with confidence on such matters. Our object is clear. It is not aggrandisement; it is not annexation of large Provinces or the extension of our territory; but it is the security of our Frontier. How that security is to be obtained is a matter on which very serious attention must be bestowed. I hope and trust, from all we hear and read, that this calamitous struggle will be of short duration. I hope and trust that the arrangements which will be made may be such as to give confidence, and secure for us that Frontier which we have hitherto been unable to secure. This, at all events, I am able to say—that it is a struggle which has been forced upon us by the conviction that it was our duty to the people of England, and to the people of India more particularly, that we should not allow the dangerous state of things to which I have referred to continue; that we ought to make clear that which has hitherto been a matter of suspicion; that we should ascertain what were the feelings towards us of the Ameer; that we should take steps to vindicate our honour, which is essential as part of our strength in India; and also that we should take steps to secure that which is the great object at which we have always aimed, and still aim—namely, the security of our Indian Frontier.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, it was not his intention to enter into the struggle which had been going on between the two front Benches with regard to the merits of the Afghan Question in the past—struggles which would probably be resumed at an early day. He rose for the purpose of asking for the presentation to the House of information which it was absolutely necessary should be placed in the hands of hon. Members. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had spoken with an air of injured innocence as to charges which had been made by the noble Lord (the Marquess of Hartington) with respect to the Government; but the right hon. Gentleman must be aware of the tone which had been taken out-of-doors by some of his supporters, and also in the Press, as to Members of former Governments, and the charge which had been made to the effect that the present war was traceable to their policy and conduct. It was impossible that they could sit down quietly under such accusations, or not take the first possible opportunity of putting themselves right before the country. The right hon. Gentleman had stated that inquiries as to the character of the Russian Mission had been made at St. Petersburg, and that the Government had received assurances of a satisfactory nature; but the Papers showed that no satisfactory assurances had been received, and that the despatch which was sent to St. Petersburg immediately after the rising of Parliament required the withdrawal of the Mission, and was little short of an ultimatum. The despatches of the late Government and their Viceroy had been criticized; but it would be seen that the present Government held almost the same language as their Predecessors. The House was told in 1875 that if confidential Papers could be produced, it would be seen that the relations between this country and Russia were harmonious, and yet at that time all the acts now complained of had taken place, and they all remembered the speech of the noble Lord at the head of the Government, in which he said that he felt no alarm at the advance of Russia; that there was room enough in Asia for England and Russia. The noble Lord spoke on that occasion with General Kaufmann's letter in his pocket. These were matters he would not then go further into, as he had merely risen to ask for further Papers which it was absolutely necessary they should have before they could give an opinion upon this war. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had not explained the delay in the production of the Central Asian Papers, which had been promised within a few days after the 15th of August, but had been kept back to the last moment before the meeting of Parliament, although they were essential to the understanding of these questions. Was it consistent with the ordinary observances of the House that, having actually laid Papers on the Table of the House in August last, under the title of "Central Asia, No 1," there should be delivered to hon. Members on Saturday last as part of the same Papers despatches three months later in date? But several Papers of the most vital importance had not been given to hon. Members at all. Surely Lord Lytton's Proclamation of War ought to be laid on the Table. Lord Lytton had been made to say in it that the Ameer had "openly and assiduously attempted, both by words and deeds, to incite war against the British Empire in India." There was not, as far as he knew, any evidence in support of this statement; and he should certainly like to know why a document containing it was not laid before the House, in order that it might be compared with the milder allegation of the hon. Member who had seconded the Address, that there was an "ill-concealed enmity" between the Ameer of Afghanistan and the Government of the Queen. Next, then, came the four letters written by the Commissioner at Peshawur, and referred to by the Ameer. These letters also should be before them. Perhaps they might serve the Ameer's view, and if they did they ought to be known here. They had, he understood, been published in India. The Instructions upon which Sir Neville Chamberlain would have acted had he reached Cabul would be a document in which the House would find the Government policy very clearly laid down. The Government might refuse to present these Instructions to the House; and, if so, hon. Members could account for the refusal in their own way. He threw on the Government the responsibility of assenting or refusing to assent to their publication. At page 170 of the Afghan Papers, paragraph 34, there would be found an extraordinary statement alleged to be made by the Representative of the Ameer. That man was one of the ablest diplomatists in his service, yet he was represented in these Papers as saying that since his own absence from the Cabul Durbar His Highness had fallen under mischievous influences, which he himself deplored and condemned. He found nothing in the Papers to explain that statement, and he was inclined to think there was some mistake in the translation from the Persian, for he could not understand how so able and astute a man could make such an admission. If it was true, they ought to know what the mischievous influences were, and if it was not it ought to be rectified. Then at page 180 some extracts from a conversation at Simla with our British Native Agent at Cabul were given. Extracts were generally unsatisfactory; and it was almost always possible to make an extract report the very contrary of the tenour of the document or report from which it was taken. Sir Charles Wingfield, a great Indian authority, had represented Shere Ali as saying that the chief reason for his estrangement from the Indian Government was the fact of his having read in Sir Henry Rawlinson's works that the policy that was being pursued by the British Government towards Afghanistan was a policy of annexation. Was he right in believing that that part of the conversation omitted in the extracts was the part in which the Ameer's Agent said that? He came now to matters outside the Afghanistan Question. In the Speech there was a paragraph about the Treaty of Berlin. The noble Lord who moved the Address said that one result of the meeting of Parliament would be that no Power would check the carrying out of the Treaty; and the hon. Member who seconded it said, further, that on the carrying out of the Treaty of Berlin would depend the revival of trade. In that he quite agreed with the hon. Member; but he was greatly mistaken if he supposed the Treaty of Berlin was going to be carried out very soon. He had no doubt that the Russian troops would retire by the stipulated time; but it would be still a very long step indeed to the final execution of the Treaty, and they might expect a formidable insurrection in Southern Bulgaria before that result would be consummated. We had been committed to certain engagements with Turkey. Were we ready to be a party to compelling the South Bulgarians to accept a Government, even when they opposed it by revolt? He would remind the noble Lord who moved the Address that his great Predecessor in the title constantly refused to impose by force upon a people a form of Government against which they maintained any reasonable sort of objection. Lord Castlereagh, who was so unpopular in consequence of the violence of his repressive principles with regard to a portion of this country, never would have gone so far as to impose by force upon foreigners a form of Government they did not like. This led him to ask for Papers on this subject. There had been a great many Papers in connection with the carrying out of the Treaty of Berlin, and surely there were many of those Papers which might be produced without the least inconvenience, such as the German Circular to the Powers in August, and their answers, the German Circular to Turkey, the French despatches recommending Turkey to carry out the suggestions of the Congress with regard to Greece. Would the Government present the past Papers with regard to Greece, the Greek Circulars of August last and our reply, and the French Circular of the 22nd October, to which we only replied on the 21st November, after every other Power had answered it? There were Papers published during the Recess with regard to the negotiations between this country, France, and Egypt. They were complete as far as they went; but they made no mention of previous communications. It was well known, however, that the Government went out of its way to make communications to the French Government respecting Egypt; and there was one in which they said that, under no circumstances, would they take any steps for the annexation of Egypt. He did not know whether there were any more Papers on this subject. The present Government seemed inclined to give Parliament a vast mass of information on subjects which were not so

material, and to keep them in the dark with regard to important matters essential to the understanding of our position. With respect to Egypt, he would make this remark. Lord Salisbury alluded in his despatch to the Correspondence between the English, French, and Austrian Governments with respect to the Tripartite Treaty; but M. Waddington went further in his reply to Lord Salisbury, and spoke about the clandestine Convention between ourselves and Turkey, and mentioned that France and Austria refused to act under the provisions of the Tripartite Treaty. That meant that they had been asked to act together with England in maintaining the integrity of the Ottoman Empire, and had refused. He wanted to know when that proposal was made to France and Austria? This was of great importance, because they had been told very early in the Eastern troubles by the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs that the Tripartite Treaty must be looked upon as virtually dead, and it seemed to him that after that statement was made France and Austria were invited to intervene by force to maintain the integrity of the Ottoman Empire. He also wanted to know what was the present situation with regard to Merv? The Government had attached very great importance indeed to the possession of Merv by Russia; and he should like to know whether there was any information to disprove the very serious rumours which were afloat on this question? More information was also needed with regard to Cyprus, previous questions in reference to that subject having been answered in an uncandid way in that House. The very question as to jurisdiction and sovereignty, which had been pooh-poohed last Session by the Solicitor General as highly speculative, had arisen in regard to the trial of an American before a Court presided over by a Turkish cadi, and at which the assessor was an Englishman. A conviction for digging up antiquities was obtained under a Turkish statute, and the antiquities were confiscated. The point was raised whether the Court was a Turkish or an English one; the defendant maintaining that if it was an English Court he should be tried by English law, and that if it was a Turkish Court he ought to be tried by the Consul. The Consul had been appealed to, and, as the American Government did not pass over these matters quietly, there had no doubt been some communications with the Government. Information was thus needed not only with regard to the health of Cyprus—which, he feared, from the reports of to-day, was a serious question, for a diminution of the troops quartered there had been found necessary—but also with regard to the grave question of jurisdiction and future sovereignty. Parliament, unless otherwise informed, must treat as idle rumours stories as to a new secret Convention handing over Cyprus entirely to us; but it was important that in any new arrangement between England and Turkey Parliament should not leave these matters in the unsatisfactory position in which they now stood.

MR. BOURKE: I only rise to trespass on the attention of the House for two or three minutes in consequence of what has just fallen from the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea. I am very far from complaining of any remarks of his. On my part, and on the part of the Government, I may state that we are always ready to give every Paper to the Members of this House which they ask for, provided it can be given with due regard to the public interests. It is very difficult to know what are the Papers which shall be presented to Parliament. After the Government have done all their duty in a matter, certain parts of a question, or certain other questions, may occur to hon. Members of this House, and therefore all the Papers required are not always produced at first. I can only say that all the Papers he may want with respect to the Foreign Office, if he would only give me Notice of them, I will do my best to produce to the House, and it will not be on any small or narrow ground that they will be refused. With regard to one or two remarks which were hardly worthy of the position the hon. Baronet holds in this House, and with regard to "extracts" which he thought were occasionally garbled and not produced by the Government with a very good intention—

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I did not allude to the present Government; I was referring to something that occurred some years ago.

MR. BOURKE: Then I have nothing more to say upon that point. I am very glad, indeed, to have elicited that expression from the hon. Baronet. There is another question upon which the hon. Baronet did say something and upon which I am anxious to say a few words myself. I certainly did at the end of last Session use the words which he has attributed to me, and have never denied them for one moment, either in public or in private conversation, and those words were that the Central Asian Papers would be produced "in a few days." The fact of the matter is this—when I answered that Question I consulted those whom it was my duty to consult; and having satisfied myself that the Papers should be, and could be, produced within that period, I used the words "a few days" advisedly. The Vacation then began, and the preparation of those Papers did not cease, because the preparation of them was confided to one of the ablest and most industrious public servants we have, and he went on with the task. But events soon occurred which made it perfectly clear that the Papers which we intended to present, and which we thought would be sufficient at that time, would be inadequate, with regard to Central Asia. It was therefore determined that a very much larger series of Papers should be presented, and therefore an examination of the Central Asian documents for the last 13 years had to be undertaken. The Register for the last six years contains 15,000 documents; therefore, the examination of the Papers for 13 years was no light task. I, during the recess, reminded the Office on several occasions of the promise I had given, and I also heard on several occasions of the subject from the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett). I have throughout done my best to have the Papers produced; but they were delayed, in the first instance, owing to the press of business, and, in the next place, owing to the great mass which had to be examined. All I need add is, that we were as anxious as any hon. Member could be that they should be presented, and that the statement that they would be produced "in a few days" was made by me in perfectly good faith. I hope this explanation will be sufficient for the House and for the hon. Baronet; and, at the same time, I think I may say that no great difficulty or inconvenience has been caused by the Papers not being produced. With regard to one expression used by the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea, "that the Papers had been kept back," I must say the Papers were not kept back for one moment; but, on the contrary, we have done our best to get them forward; so, as to having any intention to keep them back, such an intention has not existed for one moment. The hon. Baronet has already made a statement with regard to the Berlin Treaty; but I may say that we have no reason to suppose that any Power in Europe has any intention of not carrying out that Treaty; and I am sure the hon. Baronet will attach importance to what has been said by M. Waddington on the subject. M. Waddington, at a dinner which was given a few weeks ago in his honour, said, with regard to the Berlin Treaty and the work which has been accomplished by the French Plenipotentiaries—

"They have inaugurated peace; they have constantly supported the great principles on which our modern society rests. They have maintained the honour and dignity of France, and they have brought back for her from Berlin the esteem and respect of Europe. The work of the Congress has been, and is still, the object of attacks as passionate as they are unjust. The moment for judging it as a whole has not yet arrived, and can arrive only when it has been completely carried out. The Treaty of Berlin is a work of compromise and equilibrium, whereby the Powers, while taking account of accomplished facts, have sought, as far as was possible, to conciliate a host of conflicting pretensions, claims, and resistances. I regard it as an equitable and comparatively durable solution of the Eastern Question; but on one condition—that it shall be completely and loyally carried out in all its stipulations, without exception, to ensure which result the French Government will devote all its efforts. The Prefect has spoken of apaisement. It is a word I always hear with pleasure; but there is one I like still better—it is peace. We have at Berlin secured you peace abroad. May it soon be equally profound at home, and take root in the heart and mind of every Frenchman who loves his country. I give the health of the President of the Republic, the highest personification of French Fatherland."

That was the sentiment by which Her Majesty's Government were animated in carrying out the Treaty of Berlin, and I wish to state that they are entirely in accord with the French Government on the subject. With regard to Greece, the hon. Baronet has already been informed by my right hon. Friend that it would be impossible to present the Papers with respect to that country at this moment. The negotiations are going on, and I can say they are favourable to the sentiments of Her Majesty's Government. As to the document to which the hon. Baronet has alluded on the subject of the Tripartite Treaty, I am not sure whether it is of any great importance now whether it is shown or whether it is not that Her Majesty's Government have asked the other Powers to join in communications on the subject. It is extremely unlikely, because unnecessary; and I do not think for one moment that the idea was entertained by Her Majesty's Government of asking the other Powers. With regard to the Central Asian Papers connected with the execution of the Berlin Treaty, if the hon. Baronet will kindly give me a list of the particular Papers which he wishes to have produced, and repeat his Question on Monday, I will then be prepared to give him an answer.

MR. W. E. FORSTER took this opportunity to ask for a little more information, especially on the point which was more particularly before them—the war with Afghanistan. Before that, he must state that although his hon. Friend the Member for Chelsea asked for a great many Papers on a great many subjects, he yet gave good reasons for every question. He had been met very fairly by the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs; but there was one Paper which his hon. Friend would find it extremely difficult to include in the list which he had been invited to give in, because it was not actually a despatch, but a statement of M. Waddington. He (Mr. W. E. Forster) had only one more remark to make with regard to the general question, and that was as to the state of the negotiations, or the conditions to which this country and the Government stood committed with regard to Bulgaria and Eastern Roumelia. There appeared to be a feeling abroad that the English power might be used to prevent the people of Bulgaria being a united Commonwealth. Now, he would not enter into the question of the expediency of dividing Bulgaria; but he knew there was nothing that a large part of the population would look upon with more distaste than the use of the English power to put down such a union as that of the two Bulgarias. He entirely supported his hon. Friend in saying he trusted the Government were not in any way committing the country without giving information, so that the House might form a judgment as to the ground on which they did so. His hon. Friend had anticipated him in two or three questions he was going to ask with regard to Papers that had been given to the House upon this country's position in Afghanistan. In the first place, he alluded to the Proclamation of War. He supposed that would be given. [MR. E. STANHOPE: Yes, it is given to-night.] His hon. Friend had alluded to the terms of that Proclamation. He understood it went back for some time past, and supposed it referred to those acts which were alluded to in that part of Lord Lytton's despatch which appeared in page 170; but he did not think his hon. Friend quite described the full weight of the ground upon which the House might fairly ask for a little more information. At page 170 an account was given by Lord Lytton of the Peshawur Conference. In paragraph 33 of that despatch Sir Lewis Pelly is reported to have demanded from the Envoy an explanation of the reported hostility of the Ameer's conduct. The Envoy is stated to have replied that the reports which had reached us of the Ameer's utterances were much exaggerated, and he feared His Highness had fallen under influences which he must condemn. In the enclosures there were most detailed memoranda of all the interviews between Sir Lewis Pelly and the Minister of the Ameer, and yet there was no mention of this demand, or of the answer thereto. The question he (Mr. W. E. Forster) wished to ask was whether there was not some such allusion; and, if there was not, upon what Lord Lytton founded his statement in the 33rd and 34th paragraphs, that there was a demand for explanation, and that the Envoy gave it? He could not find in the detailed account either the demand or the explanation. One other Paper he should like to ask for, which was not of great importance; but he thought they should have the letter from Captain Grey, alluded to in the Memorandum by Dr. Bellew, in page 195. This letter he wanted produced; because, though he could not put his hand on the statement, he knew it was in the despatches, that one reason why the Indian Government believed the Ameer was hostile

One other Paper he should like to ask for, which was not of great importance; but he thought they should have the letter from Captain Grey, alluded to in the Memorandum by Dr. Bellew, in page 195. This letter he wanted produced; because, though he could not put his hand on the statement, he knew it was in the despatches, that one reason why the Indian Government believed the Ameer was hostile was that he thought this Minister was prejudiced against him. With respect to the letters referred to in the despatch which Lord Cranbrook called the evasive letter, perhaps they were not in England. [Mr. E. STANHOPE: Yes, they are.] Then, again, the Nawab Gholam Hussein Khan was sent to sound the Ameer as to whether he would receive Sir Neville Chamberlain, and the practice was in Indian matters for a gentleman sent on a mission to make a Report. If he did make a Report, and if it was in England, would it be produced? If it was not, would the Government telegraph for it? He could not help thinking that the Report would throw a great deal of light upon the Ameer's conduct. The only other request for additional information which he would make referred to a different matter. The policy with regard to the admission of British Residents in Afghanistan had been admitted on all sides to have been changed by Lord Salisbury, who wrote on the 22nd of January to Lord Northbrook, and again on the 19th of November, in a tone which undoubtedly denoted a great change of policy. The question he was going to ask was, whether there were any opinions given by any Members of the Indian Council in England on the matter, and whether they would be produced? He could not think that there was anything in any of these Papers which the Government would refuse to give to the House. He had only one other remark to make, and it was with reference to the question as between the present Government and the Government he had had the honour of being connected with. It might be thought unseemly that there should be bickerings between two front Benches, between the present Ministers and the late Ministers, with regard to their past conduct when the country was in a difficult position, and when they were engaged in so very important a matter; yet the Opposition could not, with a due regard to their own honour, allow charges to be made against them without making some reply. He only wished, very briefly, just to state what the country, generally speaking, understood by Lord Cranbrook's despatch. They understood, first, that Lord Northbrook and the Government did not agree as to the treatment of the Ameer; that, in consequence of that disagreement, Lord

Northbrook informed the Ameer that the discussion as to his reception of a Resident had better be postponed to a more convenient season, and that the result was that no assurances were given to the Ameer. He was confident that it was the impression of the country that the Ameer wanted assurances against Russia; that Lord Northbrook was prepared to give these assurances; and that it was owing to the action of the Home Government that they were not given. Now, the facts were these—that Lord Northbrook proceeded to give certain assurances containing the word "probable," and that it was in consequence of a telegram he received from the Home Government that he missed out the word "probable," and gave to his assurances a stronger character. The question of the assurances was not postponed. On the contrary, in the Blue Book there are positive statements made by Lord Salisbury and Lord Lytton, that assurances were given against aggression. He thought they had some right to complain of the right hon. Gentleman dwelling upon the refusal of Lord Northbrook to insert in his communication to the Ameer a distinct reference to a possible aggression on the part of Russia; because they had every reason to believe that for two years, at least, thereafter the right hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues would have taken up precisely the same ground. Lord Northbrook was given to understand by the Government that the policy of their Predecessors was approved.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU*: Sir, a reference has been made by the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. W. E. Forster) to some "acts of hostility" supposed to have been committed by the Ameer of Afghanistan against the English nation. No such acts could have been committed prior to the conclusion of the Peshawur Conferences in the month of May of last year; for Lord Lytton and the Indian Council wrote, in their despatch of May 10—

"We see no reason to anticipate any act of aggression on the part of the present Ameer, or on our own part any cause of interference with His Highness. Our relations with him are still such as we commonly maintain with the Chiefs of neighbouring and friendly countries."—[Afghanistan, No. 1, p. 172.]

Sir Lewis Pelly, moreover, on March 15, 1877, summed up the conclusions of the

Conference in a Paper for the Ameer's Envoy, and said—

"The British Government harbours no hostile designs against Afghanistan. . . . The Afghan people may rest fully assured that so long as they are not excited by their Ruler, or others, to acts of aggression upon the territories or friends of the British Government, no British soldier will ever be permitted to enter Afghanistan uninvited. . . . The Ameer . . . need be under no apprehension whatever of any hostile action on the part of the British Government."—[Ibid. p. 220.]

The supposed casus belli is simply and solely the refusal to receive, at the date named by Lord Lytton, an armed British Embassy of 1,000 strong. It is worth while to trace the causes of that refusal; for there is a patent and distinct chain of causes and effect, which brought about that refusal and the war. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has just accounted for the lateness of the production of the Papers—just a week before this time—and the short notice which was given for the assembling of Parliament—little more than a week—by saying that the Government had not at all expected a war; and that as soon as they saw that war was inevitable, they determined upon calling Parliament together. I was glad to hear that assertion; for it is as much as denying that the war was intentionally brought about, and a casus belli invented to serve a particular purpose. That, indeed, would be a crime too awful in its conception, and too heinous in its perpetration, for anyone calmly to contemplate. But if this be not true, then the Government may be accused of want of prescience in not foreseeing the war of which they had been warned by the Indian Council, and of blindness in not detecting a very manifest chain of causes and effect. At the time of our Afghan reverses, in 1842, a policy towards Afghanistan was inaugurated. That policy was to cultivate and maintain, by every means in our power, the goodwill and friendship of the Ameer, and, as a part of that policy, not to force upon him the location of European Envoys on his territory. That policy was perfected by Lord Canning; it was carried out by Lord Lawrence; it was endorsed and practised by Lord Mayo; and not repudiated by Lord Northbrook. During all that time, for 30 years, there has been an Indian Envoy at the Court of Cabul; but no British Envoy was forced upon the Ameer. That policy was successful. On June 7, 1875, the Indian Government wrote, in a despatch to Lord Salisbury—

"If we have formed a correct judgment of the sentiments of the Ameer towards the British Government, the main objects of the policy which was advocated by Lord Canning . . . are secured."—[Ibid. p. 134.]

Lord Salisbury, however, comes to the India Office in 1874, and he soon determines to change the policy which had been maintained by so many successive Governments, and advocated by all who were acquainted with India, and which had been successful; he determined to change it, and adopt an opposite policy. He wrote a high-handed despatch, commanding a change of policy. The Indian Council replied by a dignified, but strong protest, warning him of the dangers which he was incurring. Lord Salisbury's despatch was written on January 22, 1875. The Indian protest was written on June 7th. On November 19th, Lord Salisbury sent a still more peremptory order, directing the appointment of a British Envoy. Again, Lord Northbrook and his Council remonstrated, protesting in strong and unmistakable terms—

"We deprecate, as involving serious danger to the peace of Afghanistan and to the interests of the British Empire in India, the execution, under present circumstances, of the instructions conveyed in your Lordship's Despatch."—[Ibid. p. 155.]

This was met by Lord Salisbury, and overridden, by a most peremptory order to carry out the opposite policy without a moment's delay. There is then a hiatus in the Blue Book. But we know that Lord Northbrook came home before his time, and that Lord Lytton was appointed. Lord Lytton had conferences with Lord Salisbury and the Russian Ambassador, Count Schouvaloff, and went to India to carry out the new policy. There was a new Council and a new Viceroy; and they wrote home in May, 1877, that the information concerning these conferences with the Russian Ambassador "influenced their considerations," and then they proceeded to affirm many things which they had a short time before most stoutly denied, in order to vindicate or at least exculpate the change of policy. Thus was the settled and time-honoured policy of 30 years reversed, and no information is laid before the House of the grounds which "influenced" and brought about that change. We know not how or by what arguments that sudden volte-face, before the Russian Ambassador, was produced. It is now for the House to look at the results, not unpredicted and unwarned, and to judge of that change of policy. A policy approved and maintained by Parliament, by successive Administrations and Viceroy, has been suddenly and secretly altered, and Parliament knows not the reasons which induced the alteration. Unless the House of Commons is to be no more than a debating society, it must judge the acts of the Ministry, and hold them responsible for a change in a declared policy that Parliament had approved. The country expects the House to do this. Yet the information which alone can enable the House to arrive at this judgment, has not been laid before the House; and we are called together because the wilful change of policy has immediately resulted in a war, just as we were forewarned that it would. The fact I believe to be this—Lord Salisbury never apprehended the old policy, because of a most pernicious fallacy in his mind; and he initiated the new policy as a direct outcome of that fallacy. He could not understand the former policy, which has been termed "masterly inactivity," because he has no conception of any influence except brute force. He, for the same reason, disbelieved in the possibility of any Russian influence being exerted in Afghanistan or India, and told us to study "maps on a large scale," and see how far off India is from Russia; and he jeered at Russian power being felt in India, saying that you might just as well expect a Russian Army to march on the Cape of Good Hope. As he misjudged the former policy, so too when he found that Russian influence had become paramount at Cabul, he had no other idea of establishing English influence, except by brute force. Yet, "opinion is stronger than armies." That disbelief in anything except brute force is the grave error in Lord Salisbury's mind, which has proved fatal to our influence in the East, and has thrown Afghanistan into the arms of Russia, and given Russian policy full scope in Europe. He has, as I will presently show, been playing Russia's game, in fighting the Ameer, and causing us to assume the character of aggressors, while Russia is enabled to appear as a protector. Lord Napier, in his able Memorandum on this question (at page 225 of the Papers)—a Memorandum penned on the very day of the signature of the Schouvaloff-Salisbury capitulation—May 30—says—"We have managed the Ameer badly. . . . the Afghans look upon us as a weak and treacherous people." That is very true; and all our recent acts and words have, I will show, tended to increase that distrust in the Ameer's mind. It will be found, by the Papers, that the Ameer reiterated frequently his profound distrust of the Russians. That feeling pervades, indeed, the whole of Central Asia. Thus we read in Sir Donald McLeod's Memorandum (page 47)—

"All the information I have been enabled to obtain on the subject leads me to believe that there exists, throughout Central Asia, in the minds of all the most influential and best informed of its populations, a wide spread feeling of distrust and dislike of the Russians, as an aggressive and unscrupulous Power, who have brought their co-religionists (Mahomedans) to ruin and humiliation, in almost all quarters where their dominion has been established."

That was written in 1868, before the events of the late war, the Berlin Treaty, and the Secret Agreement; or the same would have been also said of us. Another example of this feeling is given in the Ameer's letter of May 5, 1873 (page 110), in which he says—

"It cannot be concealed that it is impossible for the Russians to remain always firm in their negotiations. For instance, they could not remain firm in their engagements about the Crimea even for a short period. My anxiety which I feel on account of the Russians will never be removed unless the British Government adorns the Afghan Government with great assistance in money and ammunitions of war for the troops, and unless great aid is given for the construction of strong forts throughout the Northern Afghan Border. And further, if an emergency arises from the Afghan Government to oppose the Russians, such opposition cannot take place without the co-operation of the disciplined troops of the British Government. . . . Time has approached very near, when the Russians, after taking possession of Urganj and Merve Shajehan, will make communications for exercising some influence in my kingdom."

That was the state of feeling throughout Russia. They knew the Russians to be false, faithless, and robbers of territory by fraud and force. They recognized the fact that the Russian political principle is—Destruction in order to annex. What should have been our line of conduct? We should have been careful to dissociate ourselves entirely from the Russians, and separated ourselves entirely from their proceedings. What was our line of conduct? On Gortchakoff's suggestion we did the very reverse. We set to work thoroughly to re-assure the Ameer (as we learn from page 211 and many other places). We told the Ameer that there is no danger from Russia; no precautions need be taken against Russia; Russia will never invade him, nor interfere in his territory; there is not the slightest reason to fear Russia. Lord Salisbury expatiated upon this theme in his speech about "large scale maps," and "Cape of Good Hope" re-assurance. Doubtless, that speech was read in Cabul, and the incredulous Afghans learned that we English considered that the inspection of a large map was enough to convince any sane man that the Russians could never reach Afghanistan, and that no apprehensions need be entertained of a Russian advance in Central Asia. But, at the same time, we were urging the Ameer to receive a British Envoy at Cabul, and English officers on his Northern Frontier. "I really cannot be answerable for their lives (reiterated the Ameer), my people have an ineradicable hatred to Europeans." Yet we continued to urge it vehemently. "Why then should you want to send Envoys and officers?" asked he. "Merely out of kindness; in order to protect your territory." "From whom?" "From Russian aggression." "That is but a pretext (thought he). You tell me not to fear Russian aggression, and yet you want to send Envoys and officers to protect me against Russian aggression. I suspect that you would send them to undermine my independence, so that you may make me a mere Indian Prince, or openly annex my territory." That was a very natural conclusion for him to arrive at, and that was the conclusion which he arrived at. Colonel Taylor, the British Commissioner at Umbeyla, wrote these words with regard to British officers in Afghanistan—

"As a body, the Afghans do distrust us, and the re-appearance of fair faces in the streets of Cabul would not be popular, as they would be regarded as the forerunners of occupation."—[Ibid. p. 58.]

That was a very natural conclusion in regard to the real object in the urgency of British demands to send British Envoys. The occupation of Quetta strengthened that suspicion. "It would be a very good step," said the Indian Government, "provided you could get the Ameer to concur in it; but not otherwise, as it would raise his suspicions." Look at the position of Quetta on the map; at the mouth of the Bolan Pass; excellent to bar an advance of the Russians; but no one fears an advance of the Russians; we are all thoroughly re-assured on that point. The only other use of it is, as a basis from which to effect a coup de main on Candahar, and then on Guzni, and then on Cabul. That was the next step to sow distrust, and to make the Ameer suspect our intentions. So that, as we re-assured the Ameer against all fears concerning Russia, as Prince Gortchakoff persuaded us to do, we were, in fact, causing him to distrust our own good intentions. Not content with this, the suggestion is quietly rumoured (as we find from the despatch of the Indian Government of May 10th, 1877) that the Ameer was "assumed to be dependent" on Great Britain. We are further told (page 166)—

"Prince Gortchakoff had not been slow to fix upon us all the responsibilities of such a position. . . . It is the British Government which the Government of Russia would endeavour to hold responsible for the conduct of the Ameer."

He had not only, then, been led, by our own words and acts, to mistrust us, and to suspect us; but he was induced to associate us in the same enterprize with the Russians, and we had so far succeeded that he was already regarded as a mere dependent of Great Britain. What was the effect on the Ameer? At the Peshawur Conferences, on May 19th, 1877, we find the Envoy saying significantly—You talk of danger? But danger is of two kinds, external and internal. Against all external danger you have re-assured me; you say there is none. There is then only a danger from within; and that is the very thing which I fear that your Envoys would cause. The mischief seemed, then, to have been already done; and it was worked by our own hands. Yet we were not content. We allowed ourselves to be inveigled into going further in our mischievous re-assurance. The Envoy at the Peshawur Conference was a cunning man. He bethought him of a delicate test. "You wish me to accept your British Envoys, to guard me against Russia, because the advance of Russia is so rapid in Central Asia? (thought he.) I will see whether you are sincere." He therefore said to Sir Lewis Pelly (page 114) — "The Turkomans, across the Oxus, are much afraid of the Russian Army which is approaching; and they have sent to the Ameer for help against the advancing Russians; but what do you, Sir Lewis Pelly, advise?" "Oh!" said Sir Lewis, "the Turkomans are a set of robbers; do not help them; leave them to the Russians." "Oh no! (thought the Envoy), you seem very much to concur in the Russian plans of aggression; perhaps you belong to the same gang, and are a mere pal of theirs." That was a suspicion. Was it a just suspicion? Of course, it was more than a suspicion. For the Peshawur Conference was closed in February, 1877; while on January 28, 1876, the Indian Government wrote, in their despatch, concerning—

"The assurances given to the Ameer, that a good understanding exists between England and Russia on Central Asian affairs."—[Ibid. p. 154.]

Then England and Russia had already come to an understanding, not only as to what should be done with Afghanistan, but also respecting all the Khanates of Central Asia! The booty was already divided beforehand! That was one way of "re-assuring" the Ameer, who had already begun to think that Afghanistan had been placed between the upper and nether millstone! Again, the Viceroy and Sir Lewis Pelly used a threat to the Envoy at Peshawur—a threat which flew like an arrow, to wound beyond its mark. On October 10, 1876 (page 183) they said—

"Our only interest in maintaining the independence of Afghanistan is to provide for the security of our own Frontier. But the moment we cease to regard Afghanistan as a friendly and firmly allied State, what is there to prevent us from providing for the security of our Frontier by an understanding with Russia, which might have the effect of wiping Afghanistan out of the map altogether? If the Ameer does not desire to come to a speedy understanding with us, Russia does; and she desires it at his expense."

Just as I thought! said the Ameer to himself; they have been plotting together for my destruction; and if I cannot be persuaded to admit the "internal danger," they will tear me in pieces by force; better to trust to the God of Battles and of Justice, and die sword in hand. Lord Napier, in his Memorandum written on the Schouvaloff-Salisbury capitulation day, says—

"Does not the example of Turkey, with her tributary States stirred into rebellion by emissaries from Russian societies, show the mischief which Russia might work in India?"—[Ibid. p. 225.]

That the Ameer had been thinking much on this subject is proved by the fact that his Envoy spread out a map, and asked Dr. Bellew (on February 7, 1877) to point to Bosnia and Herzegovina and Serbia and Bulgaria, and Circassia; and asked—

"How it was that the nations of Europe (and notably Great Britain) permitted Russia to send her soldiers to fight in the Serbian ranks whilst the Russian Ambassador remained at Constantinople."—[Ibid. p. 203.]

Doubtless he asked, also, why we interfered to save Serbia, who had been guilty of the "most outrageous and wicked war" (as the Prime Minister said on September 21, 1876), and to prevent Turkey from crushing Serbia, and even from taking securities against a repetition of the offence. He perhaps asked why we had been content with telling Russia that it was a breach of Treaties and of International Law to invade Turkey; while we did not fulfil our obligations under those Treaties, and defend the integrity and independence of the Ottoman Empire. Dr. Bellew states that he asked about Circassia—Circassia, whose independence we had recognised—Circassia, the great bulwark that prevented the advance of Russia into Central Asia, the first fortress of India (as was well remarked by Sir Henry Rawlinson, and by others in these Afghan Papers). And we allowed Russia to take Circassia and menace India! Yet that was of little use to Russia; for the Caucasus, even although Russian, was yet impassable; and Poti, to the south, was marshy, and malarious, and with three miles of shoal water between it and the sea; and so we gave Russia the only good harbour on the coast — Batoum — and enabled her to turn the Caucasus and land her troops to menace Persia and India. So the Envoy saw how that by our perfidious advice to Turkey we had weakened her hands—the Head of all Islam—and by our treacherous acts at Berlin we had given away her fortresses and harbours, and by our secret agreements, we had partitioned her Empire. Nay more; his suspicions were confirmed when he read the Premier's speech on the 28th July—

“One of the results of my attending the Congress of Berlin has been to prove, what I always suspected to be an absolute fact, that this horrible, devastating war, which has just terminated, would not have taken place if England had spoken with the necessary firmness.”

Was not all this enough to make the Ameer say: “Russia and England seem to be pulling together; they are in the same boat; while there is this difference between them—Russia is the stronger, and England is afraid; besides England deserts her allies in the hour of need; it is better for me at once to propitiate the Russians.” These were the Envoy's words, as reported by Sir Lewis Pelly (page 181)—

“The Russians broke Treaties at pleasure, were very pushing in their policy, and feared no one. The recent political history of Europe showed that the English were unable to compel the Russians to adhere to Treaties, and were equally impotent to arrest Russian aggressions.”

That, then, was the Ameer's suspicion of our real intent in forcing British Envoys upon him; and that was the estimation in which he held us. In his eyes, we seemed to be plotting with his enemy, while pretending to be his friend; we appeared to be insidiously forcing Envoys upon him, in order to break up his independence; we were afraid to fight in fulfilment of our Treaty obligations; we connived at violations of law; we approached him with character gone and honours tarnished. And that was the time which Lord Salisbury chose for making his haughty demands (page 159)—

“Her Majesty's Government . . . must have, for their own Agents, undisputed access to its Frontier positions (of Afghanistan). . . . They must be entitled to expect becoming attention to their friendly counsels; and the Ameer must be made to understand that, subject to all——”

MR. E. STANHOPE observed that the Ameer had never seen the despatch from which the noble Lord was quoting.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU: He may have heard of the despatch of February 28, 1876, before the Peshawur Conference at the end of the year. Such things are easily done in India. I am, however, no longer speaking of the effect on the Ameer's mind; I have passed from that to the acts of the Government——

MR. E. STANHOPE said, that the document referred to was a confidential and private despatch, containing instructions intended for the Viceroy. The Government thought it ought to be now published for the information of the House.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU: Then, I think, Sir, that the next poetical effusion, which Lord Lytton writes, should be entitled—“The Sorrows of a Viceroy;” for it appears that he must submit to receiving despatches couched in language which no gentleman would address to his butler. Yet Sir Lewis Pelly, taking his cue from his superior, seems almost to have capped it. For, on February 15, 1877 (page 210), he told the Ameer's Envoy that the British Government would—

“Strengthen the Frontier of British India without further reference to the Ameer. . . . The Viceroy will take such measures as he may deem wise and lawful for strengthening the Frontier of British India, and providing for the safety and repose of that Empire; and this without communication with the Ameer.”

Nothing, then, can be more manifest than this chain of causes and effect; nothing more clear than that the words and acts of the Government have led straight up to war, and that those acts and words were such as to make the Ameer conclude that England was perfidious and secretly hostile to him, and that his safest course was to cement a timely friendship with Russia. This effect had been foreseen, but not by the British Government. It was foreseen that British policy would throw Afghanistan into the arms of Russia, and that the consequent war was playing the game of Russia and securing her aims. The Indian Government, in their despatch of June 7, 1875 (page 133), said—

“If we are correct in believing that the refusal (to receive British Envoys) would not show the intentions of the Ameer to be disloyal, it would afford no sufficient justification for a change of policy which might throw Afghanistan into the arms of Russia upon the first favourable opportunity. We may also observe that the refusal would weaken the hands of Her Majesty's Government in any future negotiations with Russia when questions might be raised as to the real value of British influence in Afghanistan."

Sir Richard Temple went further, and, in his Memorandum (page 69), he states the conclusions to which we had arrived—

"If we engage ourselves in Afghanistan, Russia will find us in the hour of trial impoverished and embarrassed. If we keep out of Afghanistan, Russia will find us in the hour of trial strong, rich, and prosperous in India. If she really wishes us ill she must naturally desire that we may be so infatuated as to pursue the former course. But it is for us to avoid the course which our enemies, if we have any, would desire us to follow."

So much for the expediency of this war; and now as to its justice. Either Lord Salisbury intended war, or he did not. If he intended to force on a war (which he has done, whether intentionally or not), then the war is unjust, and a grievous crime. If he did not, then by over-riding the Indian Government, in his pride and petulance, and despising its earnest warnings, he has committed a very grave error. They closed their despatch of January 28th, 1876, with a most solemn warning on a matter "of such grave importance," and "deprecated" the demand to send British Envoys "as involving serious danger to the peace of Afghanistan." Was it just to make such a demand? It was a violation of pledges and assurances repeatedly given by the British Government to the Government of Afghanistan, as will be seen on pages 89, 94, and 95. The Indian Government themselves assert in the above-mentioned despatch that—

"The proposal to establish British Agents in Afghanistan is, as we pointed out in our Despatch of the 7th of June, a departure from the understanding arrived at between Lord Mayo and the Ameer at the Umballa Conferences of 1869."—[Ibid, p. 151.]

At the end of the Conference at Peshawur last year, after the demand had been rejected, the Ameer was assured that there was no cause of quarrel or ground of hostility between England and Afghanistan, as you will see on page 172, where we have the statement to this effect deliberately written by the Indian Government; and on page 220, where there is Sir Lewis Pelly's own assurance. Yet the Conference was prematurely closed on the death of the Ameer's Envoy, although the Ameer desired to prolong it, and had despatched another Envoy with instructions to accede to the British demands. The cause of war, if any, was therefore of a later date. The Indian Government (page 247) state it to be the Ameer's refusal to receive the English Mission, which was armed, and 1,000 strong. Yet he did not refuse; he merely wished to delay it, as he was mourning for his favourite son; and also he did not wish to accede to the peremptory demand to admit it on a specified day; because he said it would "disgrace him in the eyes of his people." But he intimated that he would receive it later. Yet our pretended cause of war is his refusal to receive our Mission. Be it so. Would that be a just cause of war? Sir Neville Chamberlain evidently thought that the refusal would not be a sufficient cause of war; for he telegraphed to the Viceroy on September 21 (page 236)—"Shall I make . . . Faiz Mahomed . . . fire upon us?" and on being forbidden to do so, he telegraphed (page 244) that he would consider a refusal to let the Mission pass "the same as if we had been fired on." It is clear that such a refusal, even if absolute, would not give a cause of war. If an acquaintance whom I did not care to see were to call on me, and I told my servant to say—"Not at home," would he have a right to burst into my house, and enter my room and fire a revolver at me? On October 6, the Ameer wrote a letter of expostulation to the Viceroy, saying (page 252)—"I am astonished and dismayed by this letter, written threateningly to a well-intentioned friend;" then he pleads his "great trouble,"—the loss of his favourite son, and complains of the "harsh and breathless haste" in sending the Mission. This letter, Lord Lytton came to regard as "a direct challenge" (page 253). On October 30, Lord Salisbury telegraphed the Ultimatum which was to be sent to the Ameer, where the cause of war was thus stated (page 254)—"You did not hesitate to instruct your authorities on the Frontier to repel the Mission by force." Yet it was expressly stated by Major Cavagnari, Sir Neville Chamberlain, and others, that the Commander of Ali Musjid explained that, having received no orders from the Ameer, it would be his duty to oppose by force the forcible entrance of the Mission. It seems to me that there has been no cause of war; and that Lord Lytton, in order to make one, trumped up a false tale about a threat to shoot down Major Cavagnari and his suite—a tale utterly repugnant to Major Cavagnari's own account of the affair. Yet war is either the highest and most solemn judicial act, to procure reparation or to defend a right; or else it is the greatest and most heinous of crimes. One murder is bad enough; yet an unjust war is murder—murder multiplied by thousands. If the Cabinet has made an unjust war, then on them rests the guilt. But if a majority of the House endorses and adopts that action, then the fault is with them; and unless the nation protests, the nation is involved in the crime. For my part, I enter my humble and feeble protest against that which I sincerely believe to be a crime.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR believed the war to be an error financially, politically, and in a military point of view; and his main reason for this belief was that it was based on a violation of Treaty obligations in reference to the new claim for the admission of British officers as Envoys, in violation of the condition for non-interference with the affairs of Afghanistan, as entered into between Her Majesty's Government and Dost Mahomed in 1855. He also questioned very much if they had any right to occupy Quetta without the consent of the Ameer. No doubt, the Treaty with the Khan of Khelat of 1854 did give that right of occupation; but the two prior Treaties of 1839 and 1841 made the Khelat and Shawl territories subordinate to the Ruler of Afghanistan; and he hoped they would hear something from the Secretary of State which would set their minds at rest on those points. As to the Khyber Pass and the Afridis, the rights of Dost Mahomed in that direction were acknowledged by Sir John Lawrence, and he did not see how they could be disputed now. The hon. and gallant Gentleman referred to the 1868 Memorandum of Sir Henry Rawlinson which, he said, was reported to have been circulated in India, and was known to several English officers there; and he drew attention to what was common rumour—namely, that a copy of it had fallen into the hands of the Ameer, and said that it was, 'in all likelihood, after he pursued its contents, so hostile to him, that his conduct towards England changed. At all events, the work published by Sir Henry Rawlinson in 1874, known as England and Russia in the East, advocated the occupation not only of Quetta, but of Candahar and Herat, and it was very likely a translation of this part might have been made for the Ameer by the Russians. He would remind the House that the policy of non-interference with Afghanistan had been initiated by a Tory Government at the time of our disasters. When our Army was withdrawn in 1842, Lord Ellenborough, with the advice of the Duke of Wellington, by public Proclamation abandoned Afghanistan for ever. That was the resolution arrived at by the Tory Government, aided by the advice of a most experienced commander, who said that, though we might invade Afghanistan, the difficulty lay in coming back again from that country. He hoped that they would have an estimate given as to the probable cost of the war, and trusted that it would be a more accurate one than that given at the commencement of the Abyssinian War. To hold Afghanistan, he maintained they would require to keep at least 15,000 European and 35,000 Native troops, in all 50,000 European and Asiatic troops, in the country. The cost of these, with the many military charges, could not be less than £4,000,000. It would be a fatal policy to cast this enormous charge on the present embarrassed finances of India.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING said, that the Queen's Speech was one of the most meagre ever delivered in that House. It did not contain one matter connected with the affairs of England, Scotland, or Ireland. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had spoken as if it were a usual thing to omit such matters from the Queen's Speech to a Parliament specially summoned; but in 1867, when Parliament was called together in November on a question of at least as much magnitude, he found that in the Speech from the Throne there were many important questions affecting the three countries of the United Kingdom. Fenianism in Ireland was referred to, and it was stated that it was intended that there should be repressive laws with regard to it. It was also stated that Reform Bills for Scotland and Ireland would be introduced; that a Commission would be issued to settle the boundaries of existing boroughs in England; that Bills with regard to bribery and corruption at elections, to public schools and general education, and to consolidate the Acts relating to the Mercantile Marine would be brought in. Parliament was called together in 1857 in consequence of a monetary crisis of great severity, and because India was then in rebellion—a more important reason for calling Parliament together than the question of Afghanistan. Was there on that occasion no reference in the Queen's Speech to local matters of importance? On the contrary, the Speech said that the attention of Parliament would be called to the law to regulate the representation of the people in Parliament, and that there would be introduced Bills to amend the law relating to real property and to amend several branches of the Criminal Law. The Government on that occasion indicated to the House of Commons what measures would be brought in, after, of course, the period of adjournment, but no such thing was done now. The late Lord Derby in February, 1858, when Parliament met, and when, in the House of Lords, the adjournment of the House was moved at an early period of the evening, said he conceived that was a course of proceeding most unusual, and that he was quite surprised the Government had made no statement of their general policy, and of the measures which they intended to introduce into the House after the adjournment. The present Government had made no such statement either; and very likely when the House met in February they would still make no announcement of their policy. In 1847, on the 18th of November, when Parliament was called together in consequence of the state of trade, and a commercial crisis owing to the failure of several banks, and the condition of trade in America, and also because of the famine in Ireland, the Government indicated the measures which they intended to introduce. That was an occasion when they may have avoided giving to the country a statement of what their policy was. But they said in the Queen's Speech that they should introduce a Bill to regulate navigation, and that a Commission would be appointed to report on the best means of improving the health of the Metropolis. An Amendment was moved and seconded in consequence of there being no measure for the amelioration of the condition of Ireland, upon which an assurance was given by the Chief Secretary for Ireland as to Bills which the Government intended to introduce after the adjournment. Well, was the Chief Secretary for Ireland in his place to-night to tell them if the Government meant to do anything for Ireland. There had been three bad seasons—that of this year having been the worst that had occurred since 1847—and was no measure to be introduced for the amelioration of the condition of that country? Had they been promised a University Bill? Had they been told their Grand Jury Laws were to be amended? Had they been told there was to be a Land Bill? They had been told nothing of the kind. Why, there might be a Dissolution of Parliament before the right hon. Gentleman would have an opportunity in February of stating what measures he intended to introduce. The House might not meet after the adjournment until there had been a General Election; and it was very convenient for the Government not to make any declaration of their intentions either with regard to England, Scotland, or Ireland. He should not be at all surprised to hear of a Dissolution of Parliament before February; and, therefore, the Government were acting very wisely. They had come to a wise conclusion in saying—"Oh, we will just go before Parliament on this Afghan Question, with which we will amuse them before we meet again. We will dissolve Parliament, and in the meantime we will not tell them what we will do." The Government could not be charged with having promised to do this or that, and with not having done it, and with having thereby incurred opposition. Whether that was the object of the omission or not, the omission might be very convenient. Irish Members had come 600 miles at an unusual period of the year to hear what Her Majesty would say with respect to the affairs of Ireland and the people of Ireland, and then not hearing one word on the subject was a proceeding which, at all events, merited the condemnation of Irish Members.

MR. E. STANHOPE hoped the hon. Member who had just sat down (Mr. M'Carthy Downing) would excuse him

if he did not refer to the subject which the hon. Member had mentioned, but addressed himself at once to the subject with which he was connected, and to which most of the remarks that evening had been directed. The Government had been asked to give some additional Papers. He had laid on the Table that night some additional Papers with reference to the relations between this country and Afghanistan. First, there were some Papers relating to Mr. M'Nabb, which had been left out by inadvertence as referring in great part to other subjects, and to the omission of which he was glad that attention had been called. Secondly, there was the Proclamation, in justification of which, against a statement that had been made by several hon. Members, he wished to say that it certainly was the case that at the very time the negotiations were going on between Sir Lewis Pelly and the Envoy of the Ameer, the Ameer was preaching a religious war against us. Thirdly, there were four letters, or rather one letter, written to an official of the Ameer, three copies being sent to other officials. There was a fifth letter, which was addressed to our Agent at Cabul, and that letter was opened by the Ameer. The following was the text of the Commissioner of Peshawur's letter, dated September 7, to Mustaufi:—

“After compliments, I write this friendly letter to inform you that the 16th or 17th of September has been fixed for the departure of a Mission of high rank from the British Government to Cabul, and that the Mission will start whether Nawab Gholam Hussein shall or shall not by that time have had the honour of waiting on His Highness the Ameer. The object for which Mission is deputed is friendly, and the refusal of free passage to it, or interruption or injury to its friendly progress, will be regarded as act of hostility. I am to explain that the Mission will not in any case enter capital of Cabul before expiry of the month Ramadan. In conclusion, may you keep well.”—

With regard to the Papers asked for by the hon. and gallant Member for Kincardine and others, he was quite sure the House would understand that until he (Mr. E. Stanhope) consulted his noble Friend he could not say whether those Papers could be given. Some of them, he believed, were not in the possession of the India Office; whilst some that were asked for were obviously impossible to be produced. For instance, the noble Lord the Member for Westmeath (Lord Robert Montagu) suggested that they should publish some opinions which the Viceroy had expressed in his Council.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU explained that he referred to a report of a Conference between Lord Lytton, with his Council, and the Russian Ambassador.

MR. E. STANHOPE replied, that there was no report of such a Conference. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) had asked whether the Government would lay on the Table any opinion which had been expressed by a Member of Council adverse to the course which had been adopted? He would have to look into that matter. He doubted whether any such opinion had been expressed in the form of a Minute. With regard to the Papers actually presented to Parliament, he must say that any attempt to withhold Papers which could with propriety be produced would subject them to suspicions which they were most anxious to avoid; and he supposed that in no Papers had the secrets of diplomatic intercourse been so fully given to the world. The hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke) had accused the Government of having struck out a passage containing an allegation by the Ameer in which the name of Sir Henry Rawlinson was mentioned; but the despatch to which he alluded contained no reference whatever to Sir Henry Rawlinson, or any statement of his. Then there was another charge made by the hon. Baronet with reference to a conversation, of which, he believed, there was no report at all, but of which, at any rate, no report was sent home. He came next to one or two of the speeches which had been addressed to the House in the course of the discussion that evening. He was sure the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (General Sir George Balfour) would not expect him to follow him at any length into the observations which he had made; but he was bound to say that if anyone had broken a Treaty it was Shere Ali, because he had bound himself to be the friend of our friends and the enemy of our enemies. The hon. and gallant Gentleman went on to say that we had no right to occupy Quetta. Now, this was a question which would, he supposed, have to be gone into hereafter; but he would say at once that we had an absolute Treaty right to occupy Quetta; that we had done so to the advantage of the Ameer; and that the Ameer had since expressed his satisfaction at the result of the occupation upon the trade of Southern Afghanistan. He wished next to make one or two observations on the curious and discursive speech which the House had heard from the noble Lord the Member for Westmeath. The noble Lord jumped about from one thing to another, asking for explanations and pointing out contradictions, till no one knew what Government it was of which he was speaking; and he should really not venture to follow him through the very curious account of the transactions which he had given, if he were not anxious at once to point out that some of the propositions which the noble Lord had laid down could not for a moment be sustained. It was, in his opinion, unpardonable in the noble Lord to have accused the Viceroy of India of having trumped up a false statement. The noble Lord went on to say that we had attempted to impose Resident Agents on the Ameer contrary to our express promise. Now, he (Mr. E. Stanhope) would venture to say that no such promise had ever been given; and when it was suggested that such a promise had been made by Lord Mayo, he could only reply that no mention of the subject had been made by Lord Mayo in his communications with the Ameer. If hon. Members would look at the paragraph of Lord Mayo's despatch in which the subject was mentioned, they would find that it was described as a boon desired by the Ameer himself. As to the statement of Lord Cranbrook, in the famous 9th paragraph of his despatch, of which so much complaint was made by right hon. Gentlemen opposite, he must express his surprise that they were content to rest a complete change of policy on the authority of a single telegram. Having reversed, by means of a telegram, the whole of our Indian policy as regarded the Ameer, they were satisfied to allow it to remain on the authority of that telegram, and in not one single despatch did the Duke of Argyll think fit to place on record an explanation of his views. Let him examine for a moment what the words of that telegram were. The Ameer was to be assured that we were to maintain our "settled policy" in favour of Afghanistan, if he would only consent to abide by our advice in external affairs. Well, when a settled policy was spoken of, he presumed what was meant was the policy which was settled at the time of Lord Lawrence and Lord Mayo. But what happened? Lord Northbrook met the Envoy of the Ameer, and gave him further assurances of a somewhat vague character. The Envoy was then kept waiting for six weeks, and during that time there were further conversations; and when the Ameer at last asked for definite pledges against encroachment by Russia, and that it should be put in the writing from the Viceroy to the Ameer, instead of any satisfactory assurances having been given, Lord Northbrook, in a letter dated the 6th of September, informed him that, in his opinion, the question was of such importance that the discussion of it should be postponed to a "more suitable opportunity." In his despatch of January 28, 1876, Lord Northbrook had said that nothing short of full promises of protection would be satisfactory to the Ameer; and that, consequently, in the Viceroy's letter, the question had been deliberately reserved for future consideration. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) had called attention to a paragraph in the Address to which he had some objection, and he thought it very desirable there should be some change in the wording of it. He (Mr. E. Stanhope) would ask leave of the House to propose an Amendment of certain words of the Address, which he thought would entirely meet the views of everyone. He would ask, in the third paragraph, to omit the words "to express our regret," and to substitute the words "humbly to thank Her Majesty for informing us."

Amendment proposed,

In paragraph 3, line 1, to leave out the words "To express our regret," in order to insert the words "Humbly to thank Her Majesty for informing us,"—(Mr. Edward Stanhope,) —instead thereof.

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," put, and negatived.

Main Question, as amended, proposed.

MR. CHILDERS said, before the debate closed, he thought some further reference should be made to the very pointed remarks by his noble Friend the Member for the Radnor Boroughs (the Marquess of Hartington) with reference to the discrepancies in the despatch, as to which remark had been made, and as to which no explanation had been given either by the Chancellor of the Exchequer or by the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down. He thought it was absolutely due to the House that some such explanation should be given before the debate closed, for there were discrepancies on which comment might be made on another occasion. It was absolutely necessary to elucidate the problem why, when a great change of policy had occurred, it had been subsequently contradicted in Parliament, as had been done by Lord Salisbury. In the last despatch it was very distinctly stated that a change in the policy towards Afghanistan was deliberately made by the Government some time ago, and steps were taken in connection with that change of policy. Lord Salisbury had made a statement in the House of Lords as to the continuance of the former policy; and yet when his noble Friend (the Marquess of Hartington) had read this despatch the Chancellor of the Exchequer made no answer to it. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said that arose from an oversight.] He had no idea of impugning the truth, veracity, or honour of the Foreign Secretary or any Member of the Government; but when hon. Members read in a despatch statements which they knew were not accurate, they were perfectly entitled to speak of them in language which was warranted by the despatch itself. He considered that the discrepancies he had referred to were worthy of grievous censure, and that the explanations which had been up to this point given by Members of Her Majesty's Government were not satisfactory explanations, and also that the charges made against them were well founded, and had not been disproved. The House would remember the manner in which that despatch had been published and received, and the very singular argument they had heard from the right hon. Gentleman that evening, that the very incompleteness of the despatch would be advantageous to those it impugned

if it only notified certain points of attack and defence. That despatch had been published in a very unusual way in the newspapers, a week before the Papers were issued. It was a carefully arranged statement for a particular Party purpose; but the grounds on which it was based were not made public, so that the Government deliberately kept back from their opponents the defence from an attack which would have been impossible if the Papers had been issued in the usual way. When the whole question came to be discussed next week it would be seen what were the real facts, and we could then enter more fully into the matter. Notwithstanding the repudiation of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he contended that paragraph 9 of Lord Cranbrook's despatch conveyed a most unfair inference. That paragraph, too, had been said to be not a principal part of the despatch, but only part of a long narrative; yet it was remarkable that every person in the country who spoke or wrote on the subject had immediately fixed on that 9th paragraph. He was willing to believe that the Chancellor of the Exchequer and his Colleagues were as simple as they professed to be; but they were the only Members of their Party who were so simple. Besides, the 9th paragraph of the despatch was the foundation of almost all that followed. The whole argument of the central part of that despatch was that a wrong policy had been adopted at a certain time; that to that error all the mischief the despatch described was due; and that, therefore, an opposite policy was wise. It was noteworthy that there were only two statements in the whole despatch for which the authority was given, and both of these were in the 9th paragraph. It should, therefore, have been pre-eminently accurate, as when published no one could verify the quotations. Yet what happened? The quoted telegram consisted actually of an opinion and an instruction. The opinion was quoted in the paragraph; but the course which the Viceroy was instructed to pursue was not stated. And what the Viceroy said he had done was omitted, the only part quoted being his account of what neither he nor anyone else could have done. This was the real basis of the charge of unfairness which had been brought against the Government.

He would give the House an illustration of what he meant in the shape of a narrative of a similar kind. Suppose it were proposed to give an account of the events connected with the last Administration, and suppose it were stated that the late Government at the time of the General Election deemed it desirable to disestablish the Irish Church, and suppose the narrative then went on to say—"but Her Majesty's Opposition did not share the sentiments of the Government, and the Opposition ultimately succeeded in themselves becoming the Government." That would be exactly a parallel case to this objectionable paragraph in Lord Cranbrook's despatch. All the statements contained in such an imaginary narrative as he had described were perfectly true, but it was not the whole truth, and a similar suppression stamped this despatch with the character which was now universally ascribed to it. The hon. Gentleman who had last spoken had made a most ingenious defence of the omission in paragraph 9; but he placed it upon a ground that appeared to him (Mr. Childers) untenable. He had endeavoured to draw a line between "the settled policy" of the Governments of Lord Mayo and Lord Northbrook and the assurances which Lord Northbrook wished to give in 1873. For that there was not a shadow of foundation. He could prove this by the statements of the Government itself, for the despatch was not the only account that had been given of these assurances. With regard to the assurances of material assistance offered by Lord Northbrook to the Ameer in 1873, if the House would refer to the statements to the Ameer at the Peshawur Conference, and even to Lord Lytton's despatch narrating that negotiation, it would be seen that the present Government considered that those assurances had been of the amplest character; and it was not until the last despatch of Lord Cranbrook was compiled, that it was thought essential to throw blame on the late Government. The fact was that the Ameer wanted more unconditional and absolute assurances than any Government whatever had been prepared to concede to him. In a discussion in the other House, in 1874, Lord Derby, speaking with express reference to those negotiations of 1873, declared in the most emphatic manner, on the part of the present Government, that the assurances which the Ameer was seeking to obtain, and the condition which he was seeking to attach to them, were such as it would be improper for the British Government to assent to. He could not, therefore, accept the explanation which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had given as to the accuracy and fairness of that despatch. When the right hon. Gentleman said that despatch was the act of the Government and not that of an individual Minister, it was quite unnecessary to apologise for any strong language about it, which absurdly enough had been attempted to be called a personal attack on Lord Cranbrook; but it was necessary promptly to unmask its grossly and unfairly inaccurate character, and that inaccuracy had now been conclusively shown in the course of the debate.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER: Sir, I shall endeavour to follow the example of my hon. Friend the Member for Cork (Mr. M'Carthy Downing), and give expression to the feeling I entertain regarding this Address. My hon. Friend quoted several instances to show that the practice of submitting a Speech which contains no reference to local legislation is very unusual; and he complained that the claims put forward on behalf of the Irish people had been completely ignored. In my opinion, when we have been summoned here from different parts, we ought, at all events, to have been informed of the intentions of the Government respecting our own country, in the condition of which we are far more interested than in the successful policy of the Government in Afghanistan. Although I am opposed to the foreign policy of the present Government, I have not taken part in the Party quarrels or divisions in this House; and I do not intend to take part with the Liberal Party in any division which may be called for on foreign policy, being convinced, as I am, that, as between the two Parties, it is six of one and half-a-dozen of the other. What has this debate been this evening? Not such as to enlighten us as to the right and wrong of the war, but simply an attempt on the part of the Government to vindicate their policy, and an attempt on the part of the Opposition to show that something they did on a certain occasion is not deserving of the censure which has been cast upon it. Neither

Her Majesty's Government on the one hand nor the Opposition on the other have endeavoured to show that the policy of either of them is one that will recommend itself to liberty-loving men, or to those who profess to be actuated by Christian principles. Ireland is often regarded as an integral portion of the Empire; but my first duty as an Irish Nationalist is to assert the distinct nationality of Ireland. And why? Because, in ordinary times, Ireland is shut out from the observation of Europe, and her aspirations are judged by the caricatures given in the English Press. It is, therefore, when questions of an international character are before the House, that it becomes the duty of Irishmen to stand forward before Europe and declare that their first consideration is the nationality of their own country. The Union between Ireland and England is only a Union in name. It is not a union of hearts. It is the result of the blackest crime ever perpetrated by one nation against another—the destruction of the Irish Parliament. And the Imperialism of Lord Beaconsfield in 1878 ought to be as odious to the Irish people—certainly, it was as destructive to liberty—as the Imperialism of Pitt in 1798. It has the same object in view—English aggrandisement; it adopts the same means of reaching its object—corruption and violence; it proceeds from the same arrogant, liberty-hating Tory Party, and marches forward to the same dishonoured victory over the bodies of brave patriots fallen in defence of their native land. I have read all that has been written and spoken recently by English statesmen of both Parties on the subject of the Afghan War, and I am bound to say that a good deal of what they have said of each other is substantiated by the official Correspondence which has been placed in our hands. The accusations they have levelled at each other are well sustained in the official Papers; and as an Irishman I have the greatest pity for England, whose politicians are plunged in such violent dissensions that they seem determined to fight each other like the Kilkenny cats, until there is nothing left but their tails. We Irish are so often lectured on the sin of disunion that we would be justified in preaching a sermon on the beauty of Christianity for the benefit of Indian Viceroys and ex-Viceroys, and English

Ministers and ex-Ministers; but it requires too large a stock of English hypocrisy and self-complacency to succeed in such a task. I object to the Address in answer to the Royal Speech, because it is the duty, Sir, of the Representatives of the people to demand the redress of grievances before granting Supplies. I, for one, shall exhaust all the Forms of the House in refusing the Supplies for this wicked war. In the name of my constituents I denounce it as a base and cowardly aggression on an independent State. I shall vote against the Address, because I condemn and abhor the brutal policy which has been pursued towards the Afghan nation. I shall vote against the Address, because the Government has turned a deaf ear to the cries for justice which have been repeatedly raised on behalf of the Irish people in this House. Ireland repudiates from her heart and soul this blood-stained Imperialism, which tramples on the rights of nations; and though I care not who may betray her honour, by associating her fair name with the unhallowed policy of the Government in this unholy war, I assert that her sympathies are now, as they have ever been, on the side of struggling freemen in every oppressed land.

MR. SULLIVAN said, that the curtain fell last Session upon Her Majesty's Ministers placing on the back of John Bull Asia Minor. Now they were going to place there Asia Major too. The policy of Her Majesty's Government seemed to him to be one of universal annexation and war with smaller Powers, with those who might be weak enough to be safely bullied, in order that their territories might be added to that already overgrown Empire. The state of home affairs in England and Ireland was far more serious and far more worthy of a winter Session than this Afghan business, or any of these aggressive wars of Her Majesty's Ministers. What was the condition of Ireland at that moment? In a commercial and industrial point of view her condition was eminently worthy the attention of Her Majesty's Government; yet it was at that moment, when trade was depressed, and finances paralysed, that they came forward and prevented the revival of public confidence by creating gloomy apprehensions of further financial burdens and additional wars. They must lay at the doors of Her Majesty's Government the guilt and blame of whatever financial disaster might occur in Ireland from that broken confidence which could only be restored by a policy of peace. They had fondly hoped that after the Berlin Treaty and the return of the Prime Minister from that capital, there would be an end to the torture and suspense to which they had been accustomed for the past two years, but they had been mistaken. Every interest in the country was groaning under the present condition of affairs, for they could not tell from day to day what policy would be brought forth by that Ministry of surprises. Indeed, next week might see the Government spring upon them another war, and that at a time when great numbers of the people of England—in Staffordshire and elsewhere—were suffering from absolute starvation. He should have thought there would have been some reference in the Queen's Speech to the distress from which the people were at present suffering. Grave evils were at the doors of their manufacturers, and that was the moment selected by the Government for a military promenade with a Mission that would not, perhaps, be characterized truly in our day, but which 20 years hence England would blush to name. It was an unjust and aggressive war; and no greater crime that he knew of could be charged to a public Ministry than that of making war on an uncivilized community with an unjust cause. No nation should draw the sword lightly. What were the grounds for the war? The Prime Minister said that we wanted a "scientific Frontier;" and although that had not been avowed by Ministers to-night, he would rather believe Lord Beaconsfield's statement at the Guildhall than some of the reasons which had been advanced in that House. No. That was good for the Guildhall, but it would not do for the Houses of Parliament. They spoke of an "expedition." But what was an "expedition?" It might be scientific or geographical. They euphemistically called the war an "expedition" because they were ashamed to give it its proper name. The Indian Secretary, in his final despatch, was far more anxious to convict the Opposition than to convict the Ameer of wrong. Why had these voluminous despatches been withheld and then flung upon us in a mass, while public opinion in England had been misled by inspired telegrams from India? The object clearly had been to fan the war flame. Else, why were the Government dumb while the newspapers commented on the false telegram about the alleged insult? The Ministers put into the Royal lips a version of the story of the wolf and the lamb. The object of the Viceroy had been to pick a quarrel with the Ameer: on the same pretences on which they had gone to Afghanistan they might go to the North Pole. As for the despatch which had been issued by Lord Cranbrook to hocus the people, it was a Party document manifesting much more anxiety to show that the Liberal Party were wrong than that the Ameer deserved punishment. It was of a piece with the false telegrams sent from Simla with the tacit connivance of the Government officials to arouse the war feeling in this country. It was one of those tricks of political life which were unbecoming the dignity of Cabinet Ministers. He considered the Ameer came out of this quarrel with credit, whilst it was greatly to the reproach of Her Majesty's Government. They wanted to fasten a quarrel upon him in order to put Residents in his towns. He had previously known that Residents were spies, who would undermine his power, and he got a promise from an English Viceroy that no Residents should be put in his territory, and now that promise was sought to be evaded. Russia gave them an undertaking and now she was violating it. Let them settle with Russia; but she was strong and the Ameer was weak. Was that a policy worthy of Great Britain, when they wished to make the Indians pay for their "scientific Frontier?" Just as they struck the Ameer rather than Russia, because he was weak and Russia was strong, so they taxed the Indians rather than the English, because the former were unrepresented in Parliament, and had no one to take their part. They were plunging India into bankruptcy; but for a country which had felt the march of Great Britain's wonderful civilization his voice at least should be raised, and his vote given to whoever in that House made a struggle against that unjust war, and against the imposition of additional taxation on people who were not represented; and he believed he might say that the voice and vote and the best will of Ireland would be given with a protest against a public wrong, and to defend those who could not speak for themselves.

MAJOR NOLAN said, he regretted that no answer had been given by the Government to the remarks which had been made as to the omission of any reference to Ireland. He regretted that there were not more Irish Members present; but he hoped that they would be there before the end of the Session to protest against the total omission of Irish affairs from the Queen's Speech. It might be said that England and Scotland were also omitted; but he objected to the total omission of home affairs. He might be told that the whole interests of the country were entirely with the war; but he thought there were many grievances in Ireland—the Land Question, for instance—which most of them would say ought to be settled before any foreign war was considered. When they saw the tremendous slap in the face the Ministry were giving Russia by that war, they could not say in what they were involved for, or that the war in Afghanistan would not be followed by war with Russia. Then, again, there was not a word in the Queen's Speech about the Irish University, and he was afraid the Government would not do anything on the Land Question. If the Ministry would give something moderate in that direction, they would be satisfied. He would allow that the Government had done some good last year; if they would give them the University, it would be something more. The absence of any reference to Irish affairs left the Members in a most painful position in facing their constituents. In face of a war, he considered that a country which elected its Members freely had a very great superiority over the country which could not elect its Members freely. There was a vast number of persons in England who were not represented; but, as a matter of fact, England could elect its Members more freely than Ireland. At present the householders in Ireland were not represented in that House; and he did think it most unfair that they should be pledged to a war, and plunged into it without having some vote in the matter. He thought that they ought to have some declaration by the Government to a franchise equal in Ireland as in England before they were committed to a war. He was sorry there was not a large number of Irish Members present; but he thought that the expression of the regret of the Members who were there would, perhaps, be the means of bringing over a good many more, so that if no satisfactory statement was forthcoming from the Government they might try their strength.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK thought the hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power) very inconsistent, for while condemning the course of Her Majesty's Government, he announced his intention of not voting against them. This was not a matter simply between Her Majesty's Government and the Opposition. These were questions in which they were all deeply interested; and he could not understand how hon. Members could use expressions which touched the very verge of the usage of Parliament, and then declare that they were not going to vote. He had also referred to South Africa; but the fact was that this country had spent its money and its blood there, because it honestly believed it was necessary to protect the lives and property of Englishmen. It might be an error of judgment; but he thoroughly believed that there was nothing to be ashamed of in our conduct there. We were, in fact, making heavy sacrifices, believing that we were doing our duty. The hon. and learned Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) had condemned our previous dealings with the Ameer, and he (Sir John Lubbock) was previously of somewhat the same opinion himself; but he was bound to say that upon reading the Papers he had altered his views. In 1855 the Ameer made a stringent Treaty with us, and yet after receiving a friendly Mission from Russia, when we wished to send one, he refused to accept it; and again, after he had had ample time to consider the matter he treated all communications with contempt. In this and other matters it seemed to him that we had just cause of complaint, and he (Sir John Lubbock) thought that the Ameer brought this war upon himself. Whether the war was politic was quite another question, upon which he should probably quite agree with the hon. Member. He could not keep from expressing his astonishment when last Session Her Majesty's Government came down with large Supplementary Estimates and proposed, not to meet them manfully by extra taxation at the moment, but to distribute the payment over a period of years. But at that very moment they knew that this Afghan War was looming in the immediate future. ["No, no!"] Hon. Members said "No;" but he did not think that anybody could read those Papers without coming to the conclusion that Her Majesty's Government had determined at the time that the Ameer should receive an Envoy, and that the Ameer had also made up his mind that he would not do so. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had brought in a Bill to establish a new Sinking Fund; but he did not act up to his own principles, and borrowed money with one hand while he was repaying it with the other. After making every allowance, he thought this state of affairs most unsatisfactory; and he could not help feeling that it was much to be regretted that Her Majesty's Government should have rushed into this war, and that they should have departed from the old policy of the Indian Government.

MR. O'CLERY said, he also had to complain of there being no reference to Ireland in the Speech, and considered Imperial England held towards Ireland a somewhat similar position to that held by Imperial Rome towards the subject-provinces in the old days. He must say, however, that there had been times when England did not treat her in that way, and those were periods when England was entering into a great war, and when English resources were strained to the uttermost to maintain her position. At that time Ireland was loyal to the core, and gave 100,000 volunteers. The result was that when the war was at an end they had a great English Minister—Pitt—deliberately striking them down. While the blood of Ireland was shed on every field to maintain English splendour, how did they find Ireland treated during the famine? With supreme indifference. There was a time in the Crimean War in which the English Government were obliged to consider Ireland; and in regard to that war there was no higher praise given by English officers to anyone than that they gave to the Irish soldiers. They had always been told during a war that it was not the time to make applications; but he would be false to his own position if he said that the Irish people felt any interest in the struggle now being entered upon. The English enjoyed the blessings of a free Government, and there was not an Englishman who did not feel that he was defended by the Government; but an Irishman had not the same feelings. Irish people might regret the loss of life, and the Irish were compelled by the force of English laws to take part in what was undoubtedly an unjust war; but, beyond that, they could not take any further interest in this struggle. This Session, which had been called to discuss the fate of Afghanistan, would be better used for discussing the questions relating to Ireland. They thought they were entering upon a very little war; but they could not disguise from themselves that it might turn into a very large one. They thought they were only waging war with Afghanistan; but it might be possible that our real enemy—Russia—would not act towards Afghanistan the same part that England acted towards Turkey. Therefore, it was the first duty of every English patriot to see that the claims put forward by Irish Representatives should receive the measure of respect to which they were entitled, and by so doing Englishmen would be doing a higher duty than by providing for war with Afghanistan.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down (Mr. O'Clery) had used, perhaps inadvertently, an expression which he thought ought not to go uncorrected. The hon. Gentleman had spoken of Russia as an enemy of this country. He must point out that the Queen's Speech assured them that Her Majesty was now in friendly relations with all the great Powers of Europe—Russia included, of course. He had heard other expressions from hon. Members on that side of the House as to the injustice, and almost the cruelty, of this war, which unfortunately existed in Afghanistan; but as it had been generally understood that the debate on the justice or injustice of the war was to take place, not on that night, but on an early opportunity, he hoped hon. Gentlemen would withhold those strong epithets until the question had been fully debated. The hon. Member for Cork (Mr. M'Carthy Downing) had complained that there was no reference to Ireland in the Queen's Speech.

If legislation for England or Scotland had been mentioned in the Speech, while no notice was given to Ireland, then the latter country might have thought itself neglected. But at the beginning of an Autumn Session, called for a specific purpose, he thought it sufficient in the Queen's Speech only to state generally that measures would be laid before Parliament in the ensuing Session. There was the precedent of 1854, in the case of the Crimean War, for the course which had been followed in the present instance, and he thought in the matter of precedents they were pretty evenly balanced. When Irish Members spoke of that as a grievance, he hoped they would remember that the last measure which the Government had passed for Ireland was one of peace, goodwill, and, he believed, of justice. That being the last message of the Government to Ireland, he hoped that they would acknowledge, and do the Government the justice of believing, that they might have other measures to introduce for that country equally beneficial. A general statement would be made to Parliament, immediately after it re-assembled, of the measures which the Government intended to bring forward; and when their list of measures was produced the Irish Members might rely upon it that their country would not be overlooked.

MR. O'CLERY explained that his use of the expression had been misunderstood. What he meant to infer was that it was against Russia that they had to defend themselves in the East, rather than Afghanistan.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

LORD CHANCELLOR—The Lord President acquainted the House that Her Majesty had been pleased to create Hugh MacCalmont Lord Cairns, Lord Chancellor of Great Britain, a Viscount and Earl of the United Kingdom, by the style and title of Viscount Garmoyle in the County of Antrim, and Earl Cairns; and his Lordship, having retired to robe, was introduced in the usual manner.

AFGHANISTAN—THE WAR.

NOTICE OF AMENDMENT.

THE EARL OF CORK: My Lords, I beg to give Notice, on behalf of my noble Friend (Viscount Halifax), that on Monday next he will move the following Amendment to the Motion to be proposed by the noble Viscount the Secretary of State for India:—

"That, while this House whilst ready to consent to providing the means necessary for bringing the war in which we are unhappily engaged to a safe and honourable conclusion, regrets the conduct pursued by the Government which has unnecessarily engaged this country in the contest."

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON: May I ask my noble Friend whether the words he has just read are intended as an addition to, or a substitution of, the Motion of my noble Friend the Secretary of State?

AFRICA—CAPE FRONTIER MOUNTED POLICE.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

LORD HOUGHTON said, that complaints had reached this country from some young men of good family who, thinking that they were about to join a body of a civilian character, had enlisted in the Cape Frontier Mounted Police, but subsequently found that they were transferred to a military corps. He would therefore move for any Correspondence between the Government and the civil or military Authorities at the Cape of Good Hope respecting the change of the body of Cape Frontier Mounted Police into Cape Mounted Rifles.

Moved, That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for any correspondence between the Government and the civil or military Authorities at the Cape of Good Hope respecting the change of the body of Cape Frontier Mounted Police into Cape Mounted Rifles.—(The Lord Houghton.)

EARL CADOGAN said, that complaints of a similar nature to those stated by the noble Lord had reached the Colonial Office. The first of those complaints reached them on the 6th of November, and was followed by others. On the 14th, and again on the 21st of that month, despatches were addressed to Sir Bartle Frere requesting explanation of the matter. It was impossible for the Government to receive an answer before the middle or end of January, and therefore he hoped the noble Lord would not press his Motion for Papers on the present occasion, and he should be ready to give him an undertaking that as soon as the required answer and explanation had been received the Papers should be produced.

Motion (by Leave of the House) withdrawn.

House adjourned at a quarter past Five o'clock, to Monday next, a quarter before Five o'clock.

NOTICES OF MOTION.

AFGHANISTAN—AMENDMENTS ON THE ADDRESS.

MR. WHITBREAD: I beg to give Notice that it is my intention to call attention to the Papers on Afghanistan, and to move—

"That this House disapproves the conduct of Her Majesty's Government which has resulted in the War with Afghanistan."

With regard to the day on which I can bring that forward, I am, of course, very much in the hands of the Government. Having given Notice of a Motion which directly challenges the conduct of Her Majesty's Government, I am, of course, anxious to bring it forward at the earliest opportunity; and I presume that Her Majesty's Government—and, indeed, both sides of the House—would desire, as is usual, that not a day should be lost in bringing it forward. I therefore ask the right hon. Gentleman what day he will give me for the Motion?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Undoubtedly, Sir, under ordinary circumstances it would be the desire of the Government to give the very earliest day for a Motion that is in the nature of a Vote of Censure upon the Government, a Motion brought forward by an hon. Member of the standing of the hon. Member for Bedford, and with, as I have some reason to suppose, the general approval of the leading Members of the Party sitting opposite to me; but I would remind the House and the hon. Gentleman that on this occasion Parliament has been called together for the special purpose of discharging a Constitutional and statutory obligation entered into by the Government; and that in order to fulfil that obligation it will be necessary for us immediately to submit to Parliament a Vote giving the required consent of both Houses of Parliament to the course which is proposed to be taken. That being so, it would be impossible for us to set aside proceeding with the Motion of which Notice has been given by my hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for India. It was, of course, open to the hon. Member for Bedford or for his Friends to have brought forward a Motion such as that of which he has now given Notice yesterday upon the Address; or it would be open for him to bring forward his Motion as an Amendment to the proposal of my hon. Friend to which I have just referred. It is not for me, of course, to say what would be the most convenient or proper course for the hon. Member to take; but all I can say is, that if the question of the hon. Gentleman points to our giving up Monday and putting off the Resolution which we have already given Notice of, in order to enable his Resolution to be brought forward, I think it would be impossible for us to comply.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: I beg to give Notice that on the Resolution of the hon. Member for Bedford I will move the following addition:—

"And this House regrets that, in the present instance, the consent of the Nation, through its representatives, was not obtained before War was declared; and that the Government withheld from publication, until after the Declaration of War, the Papers which would have enabled a correct opinion to be formed as to its justice and necessity."

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I desire to make an appeal to the Government to re-consider the decision which has just been announced by the Chancellor of the Exchequer; but I am under the impression that it would be irregular for any discussion to take place at this stage of the proceedings. It would possibly be more in Order if I were to postpone any appeal I have to make until after the Notices of Motions and Questions have been put.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: We shall have to move that the House, at its rising, do adjourn till Monday.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON: It becomes my duty now to move that the House, at its rising, do adjourn till Monday.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the House, at its rising, do adjourn till Monday next."—(Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson.)

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I intended, if I had been enabled, to have made an appeal to the Government, before the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced the determination of the Government, to take into consideration the request made by my hon. Friend the Member for Bedford. My hon. Friend has given Notice of a Resolution which is undoubtedly a Resolution of Censure—or, at all events, of Want of Confidence in the Government. From the observations that I made yesterday I think it will be easily understood that I and those who act with me are prepared to support that Motion. Well, Sir, under these circumstances, I wish, as I have said, to appeal to the Government to re-consider their intention of moving on Monday the Resolution of which they have given Notice, and to give precedence to that of my hon. Friend. It occurs to me that that would be the most convenient course for two reasons. In the first place, as, I think, the Chancellor of the Exchequer has admitted, the Government would, under ordinary circumstances, be anxious to give the earliest possible opportunity for a vote involving the question of the confidence of the House in the Government. But, in the next place, there are peculiar circumstances which seem to me to render this course even more desirable. What will take place on Monday? On Monday the Under Secretary of State for India will make a statement which will not be confined to the financial question, but will open the whole case of the Government in reference to the proceedings in Afghanistan. The hon. Member will be followed by my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett), who has given Notice of a Resolution which raises the question whether the cost of the war shall be borne by the Revenues of this country or by those of India. Now, the course taken by my hon. Friend precludes the possibility, even if it had been otherwise desirable, of my hon. Friend the Member for Bedford moving his Resolution as an Amendment to the Resolution which will be moved by the Under Secretary of State. But I have ascertained that my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney is not disposed, even if that were thought desirable, to give way in order that my hon. Friend the Member for Bedford's Resolution might come on. I cannot complain of the decision at which my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney has arrived, because I believe it will be the only opportunity which he will have in his power of raising the very important question which he wishes to submit to the House. What will be the result? We shall have had a general statement of the policy of the Government from the Government Bench; we shall then be invited by the hon. Member for Hackney to consider a most important but still a subsidiary point; and the debate which is commenced and conducted under these circumstances cannot possibly be a very satisfactory one. We shall have on one side speeches made directed to the whole policy of the Government; and, on the other hand, we shall have speeches made directed to that subsidiary point raised by the hon. Member. Now, it strikes me it would be far more logical and convenient if we should decide, in the first instance, on the issue raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Bedford as to the policy, or want of policy, of the proceedings which have led to war. Having disposed of that question, we could then consider on a subsequent occasion the issue raised by the hon. Member for Hackney as to the source from which the cost should be defrayed. That certainly seems to me to be by far the most convenient course; and I cannot help thinking that if the Government will consider it they will agree with that view, and they may possibly be disposed to allow precedence to my hon. Friend the Member for Bedford.

MR. GLADSTONE: I rise to point out that the Parliamentary case does not appear to me to rest exactly as it was described by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The Chancellor of the Exchequer stated that it was in the option of Gentlemen on this side of the House to raise the general question on the Address to Her Majesty, and that, having voluntarily foregone that opportunity, there still remained to them the question of an Amendment to the Motion of my hon. Friend opposite, who represents the Indian Department. But I think, Sir, it escaped the recollection of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer that we have not yet done with the Address to Her Majesty, and that it is in the option of any person either to move an Amendment on the Report of the Address, or, if it is thought fit, to move the postponement of the consideration of the Address until Monday, when it would of necessity be taken as the first Business, and when, therefore, the Opposition in this House would be enabled to give effect to their view, which I understand to be, as expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Bedford and my noble Friend, that the general question of the conduct of the Government, and of their policy, ought to be discussed and disposed of before we come to consider the subaltern and collateral, although a most important, question, which is wholly distinct from that general question. I frankly own I do not know why Her Majesty's Government object to the proposal that has been made by my noble Friend. I cannot conceive what disadvantage they are to undergo if they should think fit to give way to it. I would also point out that the two questions not only are not the same in subject-matter, but are not the same in any degree as regards the opinions that hon. Gentlemen might be disposed to entertain. It is perfectly possible that there may be those on this side of the House who object to the policy of Her Majesty's Government, but, notwithstanding, who might be disposed to support the Motion of my hon. Friend opposite on the part of the Government; and, vice versa, it is perfectly possible that there may be those on that side of the House, or elsewhere, who may be prepared to give a strong support to the policy of Her Majesty's Government, and yet who may think that, under all the circumstances of the case, it is not desirable that the cost of these hostilities should be imposed upon the burdened finances of India. I would entreat Her Majesty's Government to consider that point, which appears to me to be undeniable. In truth, as I view the matter—although I can understand it arises without the slightest intention to perplex the Business of the House—the proposal of the Government that we should take the discussion on the Motion and Amendment now before the House would come to nothing more nor less than this—that, first of all, we should be compelled to debate together, and in hotch-potch, so to speak, two questions which are both of very great importance, even if not of equal importance, and which are perfectly distinct from one another; and then that, having so discussed these two questions together, we should go to a division, in which it would be absolutely impossible for anyone to know whether he was voting on the one side or the other. Now, Sir, that is a state of things in which it cannot be acceptable or desirable to Her Majesty's Government that the Business of the House should stand. I apprehend no one is desirous to interfere with the progress of the Report of the Address to-night. If we are driven to the alternative between making an attempt to discuss the policy of the Government upon the Report of the Address, where the discussion would undoubtedly be legitimate and in place, and discussing upon another occasion when it would not be legitimate nor in place, and where it would only throw the Business of the House into confusion, I know not what position my noble Friend might take; but I see nothing but inconvenience to the proceedings of the House in consequence. Then, also, I think Her Majesty's Government may do well to recollect that they are not now, as at the end of the Session, masters of all the days of the week. If it is insisted that the debate on Monday shall be the debate on the Motion of my hon. Friend opposite, and also that that Motion shall be the only occasion given us for considering the Amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for Bedford, the consequence will be that the debate will spread over several nights, and my hon. Friend the Member for Bedford would, I apprehend, decline to move his Motion as an Amendment. But suppose my hon. Friend the Member for Bedford, declining to move his Motion as an Amendment, should think proper to avail himself of his privilege to bring forward his Motion on Tuesday, what, then, will be the position of the House? That we shall begin on Monday the debate on the question of Indian finance with a considerable admixture of the other subject; that my hon. Friend, I apprehend, will not give way on Tuesday; and his debate will then commence and be continued during Tuesday night. But then the Government will retort upon my hon. Friend the disadvantage which it has been in his power to inflict upon them, and on Thursday we should resume the debate, and so go on on the Motion about Indian finance. I hope I have not appeared to put this question in a hostile point of view; I have only argued it in the interests of the general convenience, and I hope the suggestion of my noble Friend will be entertained.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I must confess, after listening to the speech which has just been delivered, I feel very much like the picture that was exhibited to us in a comic periodical the other day, of "John Bull in a Fog." After the number of suggestions made by my right hon. Friend as to the different modes in which those who oppose Her Majesty's Government may attack us, I feel the situation is perfectly bewildering. I should have thought that there was but one possible mode in which the Motion could be brought forward, and that that mode depended upon the formal decision of the Government; but after hearing the wealth of suggestions made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich, and considering how many arrangements might be made by Gentlemen opposite—who have only got to arrange amongst themselves in which particular way they would like it discussed—I do not think the case is strengthened by the speech which has been made to us. But what I wish to point out is this—we have taken the unusual course of advising Her Majesty to summon Parliament at this inconvenient season for a particular object, to fulfil the statutory obligation which is laid upon us to obtain the consent of both Houses of Parliament to the application of the Indian Revenues to certain military operations. I wish to point out, in passing, that that is a very different thing from saying we are asking Parliament now to agree to charge the whole of the expenses on the Indian Revenue. That is a point which has been raised in this Motion. I only point out that by the way; but at this time we are making an appeal to Parliament, asking it for the authority required by the Act. The proper time for making that proposal is the very first day of Business that we can command, and it is proposed to make that proposal on Monday next. Well, we are told, whether that proposal should or should not be assented to, it is desired to challenge the whole policy with regard to the war itself. But that might have been challenged on the Address, and it may still be challenged on the Report of the Address; or it might be challenged by some arrangement between the different Members of the Opposition—which obviously suggests itself, but which we are told cannot take place; or, lastly, it might be arranged, after a decision had been taken upon the questions which will be raised by the Amendment and Motion, a substantive Motion should be brought forward by the hon. Member for Bedford, which would raise the general policy as to the war. But I think the proper and most convenient course is that which the Government proposes to pursue, and that is that we should be allowed to take the opportunity which would naturally be afforded us, on moving for the statutory consent of this House to the application of the Revenues of India to those purposes, of stating our case. Our object is to explain our case, and to let such discussion arise as may be thought desirable. I really think that we are taking the most convenient course, not only for ourselves, but for the House generally. We have to consider the convenience of the House generally, especially upon such an occasion as this; and I am, therefore, very sorry that it is not in my power to comply with the request of the noble Lord and the hon. Gentleman opposite.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, there was one point on which he wished clearly to understand the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The Opposition had been, he would not say taunted, but it had been pointed out that they might have taken the course of moving this Amendment on the Address. Now, his noble Friend the Leader of the Opposition stated on the previous night the reasons which had induced him not to take that course, expecting, no doubt, at the time, that the Government would have made no difficulty with reference to a day for this Motion. ["Oh, oh!"] His noble Friend might have been wrong—and it would now appear he was wrong—at all events, he entertained that expectation. But his right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich had pointed out that the House had not yet done with the Address. The Report of the Address was still in the hands of the House; and he did not know whether the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for India was prepared to state the case of the Government that night, and if not, the best course to take would be the one suggested by his right hon. Friend, and that was that upon the Report of the Address, to move that it be postponed till Monday. They should then place the Government and the Opposition really in the position which the Government considered the latter ought to have taken up in the first instance. Therefore, he should like to know what the Chancellor of the Exchequer thought of this—that when the Report of the Address was moved that evening a proposal for an adjournment till Monday should be agreed to, and then the Government, on the Report, would state their case, and the hon. Member for Bedford would move his Amendment. He did not see that any time would be lost. The hon. Member for Bedford's Motion would then be an Amendment on the Report, and he should like to know whether the Government would assent to this.

MR. WHITBREAD thought the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not quite understood the position. ["Oh!" "Order!"] That was his opinion, and he begged leave to state it. The position of affairs was this: The Opposition desired to challenge the conduct of the Government in two particulars—those raised by the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, and by his (Mr. Whitbread's) own Motion—but the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed that the Government should state the whole of the Government case on Monday; and then, after that, that the House should go into a discussion on the particular point raised by the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett). Did the Chancellor of the Exchequer really think that the case of the Government could be dealt with in its entirety, having stated that the discussion would be confined to the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for Hackney?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I did not make that suggestion. I said the case of the Government would be stated on Monday, and it would be for those who opposed the Government to take what course they deemed necessary.

MR. WHITBREAD reminded the House that his hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, who had already given Notice to raise a particular issue, had declined to give way. He did not complain of his hon. Friend for taking that course, as the point he wished to raise was an important one; but the effect of it would be that they should have the general statement made by the Under Secretary of State for India, they should then have the particular issue raised by his hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, and, afterwards, a great many Gentlemen would reply on the whole case, while others would state their opinions of the Amendment, so that they should have a desultory debate, not dealing satisfactorily either with the particular point raised by his hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, nor brought to a point where the decision of the House would be taken on the whole question. The course proposed by the Government would lead to a long and desultory debate; and when the Opposition came afterwards to raise the questions involved in his Motion, complaints would be made from the Ministerial Benches of their going over the ground again, and prolonging the Sitting at this inconvenient time of the year. It was not in his power to press the Chancellor of the Exchequer further. In the course of his experience of that House—which was not a short one—he had generally found the Government anxious to provide every facility for bringing forward Motions which challenged their policy. Often last Session and the Session before they used this sort of language—"Why don't you bring your opinions to the test of a vote? If you disapprove the conduct of Her Majesty's Government, why don't you bring a Vote of Censure?" Well, he wanted to propose a Vote of Censure. But the way in which the Government proposed to deal with that matter was by postponing it. He had expressed his desire to enter the lists with the Government on the earliest possible occasion; but, of course, it was not in his power to compel the Government to accept that challenge sooner than they liked.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, that he was totally unable to understand the complaint of the hon. Member for Bedford, that the Government was unwilling to meet a direct challenge. As the question presented itself to him, the complaint of the Government was that the Opposition had hesitated and declined to make a direct challenge. There had certainly been plenty of time for all the Leaders, for all who wished to be Leaders, and for all who thought themselves Leaders of the Opposition to have arranged their plans of operation. Those various classes of Leaders might have assembled together; they might have squabbled together, and then made up their differences, and agreed upon some Amendment with which they could have appeared as the great united Party they were well known to be. It would have been both natural and easy for them to have arranged an Amendment to the Address, which in a crisis like this was the ancient and well-known course of procedure. But they were totally unprepared, and their bewilderment did not even stop here; they seemed totally to have forgotten that there was a Report on the Address. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, in his character of the good angel who sat watching aloft, the super-Leader or post-Leader of his Party—which he was it was difficult to know, for he always appeared after the Leader to supply the casual deficiencies in the Leader's speech—stepped forward to refresh their memories, and his suggestion that there was a Report on the Address seemed a sudden revelation to Gentlemen opposite. But the hon. Member for Bedford was much too experienced a Member to have forgotten that there was a Report; and why he did not give Notice of his Amendment last night was the one thing which he had not explained. His solicitation amounted to a confession that the Liberal Party had out-generalled themselves in taking up a defenceless position, and had to fall back upon an appeal to the Chancellor of the Exchequer to take the command of their forces and lead them out of their own difficulty.

MR. RYLANDS said, he thought there was one point in the present situation that ought not to be lost sight of by the House. It had been customary—and he believed the Government considered it a very convenient custom—that the Address in answer to the Speech from the Throne should be assented to unanimously. But there were exceptions; and he took it for granted that the noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition (the Marquess of Hartington) was actuated by a desire to meet the convenience of the House by not moving an Amendment on the Address. In taking that course the noble Lord had disappointed the expectations of some of those who followed his Leadership, and who would have been glad if the question had been raised at the earliest possible moment, as an Amendment on the Address. He could also say that the noble Lord had disappointed a large number of earnest members of his own Party throughout the country, who were watching the proceedings of that House with the greatest anxiety, and they were most desirous that the first opportunity should be embraced for entering a protest against a war which they believed to be one of the most infamous ever waged. He, and those who thought with him, would, at all events, have the courage of their convictions. The hon. Member for Cambridge University (Mr. B. Hope) taunted the Liberal Party with its divisions; but they were quite prepared, out of regard for the convenience of the House, and out of respect to the noble Lord who led their Party, to keep back for a time their protest, but how were they met? in such a way that he hoped that the dilettante mode of dealing with Addresses to the Throne would be done away with. He understood the Chancellor of the Exchequer to say that while the noble Lord had not, out of courtesy, brought forward the question on the Address to the Throne the Government would cheerfully give every opportunity for its full discussion. They had found out by a mere accident that the terms of the Address were most unusual, and if it had not been altered it would have committed the whole House to an approval of the origin of the war. If that Address had not been altered they would have challenged the opinion of the House. It was subsequently altered, for the express purpose of preventing the necessity for an Amendment. This was only on a piece with the conduct of the Government, who had been acting in the same manner for several months past, leading the House on by assurances in which they were afterwards disappointed. They had treated the House of Commons—or, at all events, the Liberal Party—with contempt; they had kept back information from the House—[“No, no!”]—the only opportunity they would have of raising the important Constitutional question would be on such a Motion as that of his hon. Friend the Member for Bedford, which the Government refused to give an opportunity of discussing. They hoped to have an opportunity for discussing, not only the war, but many questions relating to the war; and if the Government did not give the House an opportunity for discussing the Vote of Censure—from which they shrank—they would use all the Forms of the House which were in their possession with the view of discussing this Resolution of the hon. Gentleman on conditions which should ensure a fair and full discussion. Even now, he hoped the Government would give his hon. Friend Monday night for his Motion.

MR. NEWDEGATE perfectly understood the position of the Opposition, and in the circumstances of this war, the contingencies of which were so wide, it was to the credit of the Opposition that they should have been unwilling even to appear to refuse the means of carrying it on. He rejoiced that Her Majesty's Government had convened Parliament in deference to what he had always understood to be the requirements of the law with respect to the employment of Indian troops out of India. But now that Parliament was assembled, Her Majesty's Government had declined to afford an opportunity to the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread) to discuss a censure of their policy. [“No, no!”] That he understood to be the reply of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He had replied to the hon. Member for Bedford, the noble Lord the Member for Radnor, and to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, that there were opportunities at the command of the Opposition and at the general command of the House, and they must avail themselves of some of these. That was an answer which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had a perfect right to make; but inferences would be drawn from it which might not be agreeable. The answer might be given from a sense of duty; but, if so, the duty devolved upon the Opposition to avail itself of the privileges they possessed as Members of the House. He trusted that what had occurred would render Her Majesty's Opposition and the great body of the House careful how they parted with their privileges.

MR. GOSCHEN: The Government have not yet favoured us with their opinion as to the course which it has been indicated from this side must be necessary—namely, that unless the Government can make a satisfactory arrangement for the discussion of the Motion of the hon. Member for Bedford, the discussion on the Report on the Address ought to be adjourned, so that on that Report my hon. Friend the Member for Bedford may move his Amendment. I am sure the Government do not wish this discussion to close without giving us their views on that point; and I wish to know in what spirit the Government desire these debates on this most important issue to be conducted? The hon. Member for Cambridge University (Mr. B. Hope) indicated his views of the Opposition; but I trust the public will not be misled by pleasantries of that sort. The point of the case is this—that the Opposition desire a clear and unmistakable opportunity of debating the policy of Her Majesty's Government. The Government proposal is to this effect—that the discussion of the Vote of Censure is to be mixed up in an inextricable manner with another proposal which is only subsidiary. They charge us now with an omission in not moving an Amendment on the Address. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: Not "charge."] Not to the same extent in this House, perhaps; but in "another place" the charge was made in the most direct manner. To that charge we reply that the inexplicable delay in the issue of the Papers placed before us rendered it impossible to come to an adequate conclusion on the great issues involved in time to take that course. Hon. Members could not make up their minds without knowing the facts disclosed in that most important volume containing the Asian Papers. If they had known how the Government acted with Russia, and what weak remonstrances they made as to the advances in Central Asia, while they were making demonstrations against Afghanistan, it might have been possible to debate the subject without perusing the Papers. But, on this side at least, we feel there is an immense responsibility involved in the case; and we did not think it possible to debate it in the manner in which the country desired until those Papers had been thoroughly mastered. That is a fair and proper statement of the matter. The noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition placed that argument before the House, and it was not challenged by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I wish now to know whether hon. Members opposite and the Government do not desire that my noble Friend should continue to act in that loyal, patriotic, and Constitutional manner in which he discharged his duties to his Party and the country; or I should like to know whether they wish this side to have recourse to what they would be the first to call factious opposition the moment it was adopted, and if they, on their part, intend to disregard traditionary forms? The traditionary form is, that on Notice of a Vote of Censure the Government immediately postpone all other Business in order to take the opinion of the House upon that issue. In the first place, by delaying the Papers they have put us in a position that a debate upon the Address would have been too early and inadequate, and now they wish to reduce us to the position that the debate must be put off and be unsatisfactory. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer says "we must state our case." So far it is clear. What is to follow? The hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) will propose a Motion on a subsidiary point, and a general discussion will take place upon it. It is perfectly clear that in that case the issues themselves which it is desired to raise cannot be satisfactorily discussed; and the country will know, if you refuse to give us this adequate discussion upon your conduct, that you are attempting to confuse our challenge with other issues. I wish to know the opinion of the Government with regard to the adjournment of the Report on the Address.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: We all regret that in debates on such a serious question as we are going to be engaged in next week, proceedings should be begun by any heated arguments, on one side or the other, entirely on side issues. I understood from the noble Lord last night that nothing was further from his desire than that it should be the case; and when we are accused of having placed matters in an awkward position before the House, we are entitled to deny that that awkwardness originated with us. How did this matter come before us? Both Houses were called together for one special purpose. Of course, an Address had to be moved to the Crown. The natural course on such a question as this is not unknown to the noble Lord, for it was successfully applied in his case in former years, and he is therefore perfectly aware of it. It was to challenge the policy of the Government in an Amendment on the Address. The noble Lord declined to do that; and I think I am not wrong in saying that he declined to do it because he did not wish to do anything in the way of stopping Supplies absolutely necessary for the war.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: The right hon. Gentleman is somewhat under a misapprehension. What I said was that, in my opinion, an Amendment to the Address might have been a proper—perhaps the most proper—way of meeting the question; but that the conduct of the Government in keeping back the Papers until almost immediately before the meeting of Parliament rendered the adoption of that course impossible.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: And, at the same time, the noble Lord said he did not want there to be a semblance of opposing Supplies. If the course now suggested were followed, that would practically be the result. It was, however, open to those who challenged the policy of the Government to move an Amendment to the Address, which, in my opinion, would have been the most proper way of proceeding; or to have given Notice of moving an Amendment on the Report, or on the Motion which my hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for India proposes to submit to the House on Monday next. If the hon. Member for Bedford had announced it to be his intention to bring forward his Amendment on that Motion, I feel sure the hon. Member for Hackney would not have disputed his right to do so. The hon. Member for Bedford, however, has not chosen to take advantage of any of the three opportunities which were open to him. My purpose in rising was to make a suggestion that will, it seems to me, remove the difficulty, if hon. Members opposite will agree amongst themselves. Suppose the Report on the Address is taken to-day, and that on Monday the Under Secretary of State for India lays the case of the Government open on the withdrawal of the hon. Member for Hackney, no one will be injured. It is convenient that the course in both Houses should be the same. The Under Secretary of State could then be followed by the hon. Member for Bedford, and then we should go into the whole question, and it would be thoroughly discussed. If the hon. Gentleman succeeded in carrying his Amendment, the hon. Member for Hackney would, I have no doubt, be satisfied with the result; but if, on the other hand, the Amendment were to be defeated, then the Question put would be that "the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," and the Amendment of the hon. Member for Hackney, being a simple negative of the Resolution proposed by the Government, he would be afforded an ample opportunity of discussing the question which he desires to raise in the fullest manner. That, in my opinion, would be the simplest and best course to adopt.

MR. FAWCETT said, he would consult the convenience of the House in reference to his Amendment; but his Amendment was a very important one, and was totally distinct from the question raised by the hon. Member for Bedford. He had reason to believe that on both sides of the House there existed considerable difference of opinion as to the manner in which the financial burdens should be apportioned. If the war was Imperial rather than Indian in its scope and its results, it would be monstrously unjust to make the people of India pay for it; if, on the other hand, it was of the contrary character, its expense should be defrayed by India. That was, in short, the point raised by his Motion, which, as the hon. Member for Bedford would see, had no relation to his own Resolution. In the few remarks he would have to make he should avoid any consideration of the purposes of the war, beyond what was necessary to show that the charge should not be borne by the people of India. The Home Secretary had suggested a course which he must be well aware would place him (Mr. Fawcett) in a position of such absurdity as to his opportunity that he could not agree to it. There would be a debate of four nights, one of the greatest debates which had taken place for a quarter of a century, and the suggestion of the Home Secretary would lead to his rising at 3 o'clock in the morning when the division on the Vote of Censure took place to propose his Amendment. He would not further discuss that impracticable suggestion; but would only add that, in common with many hon. Members on that side of the House, he would have preferred the more direct and simple course of bringing forward the Motion of the hon. Member for Bedford on the Address. As, however, that had not been done, it seemed to him that the best remaining plan would be to bring it forward on the Report.

MR. A. MILLS confessed that he had been so much struck by the remarks of the hon. Member for Hackney, as to the necessity for keeping the discussion on the merits of the war distinct from considerations of finance, that he could not but agree with him in hoping that the Motion of the hon. Member for Bedford would be brought forward as an Amendment to the Report. He regretted that the traditional usage had not been followed; but it was necessary, at any rate, to preserve the distinction between the Motions of the hon. Members for Hackney and Bedford.

MR. RATHBONE remarked that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had thought it convenient that the plan he suggested should be adopted. He wished, however, to know to whom it was convenient, and for what reason? All the Opposition wanted was to have the question clearly and definitively debated, in the belief that the Government had a bad case; and, that being so, he could understand that it would be very convenient for them so to cloud and trouble the waters of the discussion that the country would not be able to judge between the two parties. That was a convenience they had no intention of affording.

MR. CHILDERS said, that it would probably now be admitted on all sides that his noble Friend had been right in not proposing any Amendment to the Address on account of the short time they had had for perusing 500 pages of Blue Book; but when it had been remarked that a different course had been taken by him on another occasion, he would remind the House that that was after the General Election of 1859, when the Reform question had been discussed for months. At the present moment they were at great disadvantage, because the usual methods for discussing the policy of a war had been deliberately taken out of their hands. Take the nearest analogous case—that of the summoning of Parliament on account of the Abyssinian War. On that occasion not one, but several distinct opportunities were afforded for discussing the whole question. After the Address had been adopted the entire case of the Government was stated, on the Motion for Supply, by the Leader of the House. That was followed by a Ways and Means debate, and then by a Motion as to the charge on the Revenues of India. Some objected, in the debate in Supply, both to the action of the then Government and to that of their Predecessors; but that debate had been concluded before the specific question of the charge on India for the expenses of the war had been discussed. In the present case, however, the question was simply the lesser and more specific one raised by the difference of opinion as to what share of the military burden should be borne by India. It would seem that the Government were disposed to take advantage of the fact that no Amendment had been moved to the Address, in order to preclude the Opposition from a general debate before the comparatively less important—though still very important—subject raised by the Under Secretary of State came before the House on Monday. The Home Secretary had suggested that when his Colleague came to move a Resolution relating to the payment of the expenses of the war by India, an Amendment might be moved by the hon. Member for Bedford; and that after this matter was disposed of the hon. Member for Hackney might satisfy himself by merely voting a negative to the original Motion. But why should the hon. Member for Hackney so satisfy himself? He might wish to qualify that opposition by language and a Resolution very different from a bare negative. He (Mr. Childers) did not think there was any precedent for such a proposal. It had been suggested that this question should be now raised on the Report. But this could not be done to-day, for it was not possible to propose an Amendment without Notice, and no Notice could have been given until to-day. The House would agree that the first available day ought to be taken; and he thought they had better adjourn the Report of the Address that night, and take it on Monday. They could then thresh out the whole question of the war on the important Motion of the hon. Member for Bedford. It would be time to consider the Motion of the hon. Member for Hackney after this subject had been discussed.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said that, having already spoken, he had no right to say anything further except by the indulgence of the House. He thought that the convenience of the House would be consulted by accepting the proposal that had just been made. The Government had, of course, no desire in any way to preclude discussion; but he thought the proposal made by the Secretary of State for the Home Department would have given the hon. Member for Hackney every advantage that he could have obtained by any other course. Whatever course was taken, he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) understood there would be a general discussion of the whole merits of the war in the first instance, and then a subsequent discussion would be raised by the hon. Member for Hackney as to how it was to be charged. According to the proposal made by his right hon. Friend, they would take the Motion of the hon. Member for Bedford first, and then take another night for the other. Nobody would ever have supposed they could take up the Motion of the hon. Member for Hackney at 3 o'clock in the morning. If it had come up at such an hour, it would have been allowed to stand over until the following day. The Government had no desire to force the matter forward upon the House. They would agree to the adjournment of the discussion on the Report of the Address till Monday. Before sitting down, however, he must take notice of the observation of the right hon. Member for the City of London (Mr. Goschen), that the Government had intentionally kept back the Papers. That was a remark that ought not to have been made. The Government had endeavoured until the last moment to bring about an amicable settlement. It was not until the Ameer declined to send an answer to the Ultimatum that warlike measures were found necessary; and then the Government took immediate steps to prepare the Papers and lay them on the Table of the House. He assumed that if the discussion on the Report and the Motion of the hon. Member for Bedford were resumed on Monday the House would be prepared to continue it de die in diem.

MR. WHITBREAD assented.

Motion agreed to.

House, at rising, to adjourn till Monday next.

QUESTIONS.

AFGHANISTAN—RUSSIA AND THE AMEER—GENERAL KAUFFMANN.

QUESTION.

MR. A. MILLS asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any official information has been received by the Government concerning the alleged presentation of an address by General Kauffmann on behalf of the Emperor of Russia, to the Ameer of Afghanistan?

MR. BOURKE: No information has been received on the subject.

AFGHANISTAN—REPULSE OF THE MISSION.—QUESTION.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU. asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, What is the authority for Lord Lytton's statement in the telegram of September 26th, 1878 (not contained among the facts which were given in his three previous messages), viz.:—

“Officer commanding fort said . . . but for personal friendship he would, in obedience to the Ameer's orders, have shot down Cavagnari and his suite;”

why neither the account given by the Indian Government on the same day (p. 239), nor that of October 3rd (p. 247), mention such a grave occurrence; if he could explain why Major Cavagnari, in his report of the affair, says—

“Faiz Muhammed Khan, from first to last, has behaved in a most courteous manner, and very favourably impressed both Colonel Jenkins and myself;”

and, why Sir Neville Chamberlain, in writing his demand on September 22nd, (p. 259) to the Commander of Ali Musjid, said—

“You declared that you had received no instructions to permit the British Mission to pass, and stated that you would certainly oppose it by force if it advanced?”

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, if my noble Friend will turn to the next page to that which he has quoted from the Blue Book I think he will find an answer to his Question. At page 249 he will find a Report from Major Cavagnari to Sir Neville Chamberlain, and the 11th paragraph contains a full account of what took place. It is there stated by Major Cavagnari that Faiz Muhammed Khan came down to meet them, and stated that he was not allowed to proceed, and then he makes this observation—

“That if he had not been friendly disposed he would not have consented to the present interview or have restrained his levies from firing on my party.”

At page 251, in the Report from Colonel Jenkins, who was present on the same occasion, there is the following passage:—

“Major Cavagnari then asked whether, under these circumstances, the Sirdar would oppose the passage of the Mission; and the Sirdar said that he would certainly do so. He further said ‘You may take it as a kindness, and because I remember friendship, that I do not fire upon you for what you have done already.’”

These are the grounds upon which the Indian Government spoke of the armed opposition by which they were encountered, and I think that is an answer to the Question. The noble Lord asks me, whether I can explain how it was that Major Cavagnari, in his report of the affair, said that—

“From first to last Faiz Muhammed Khan behaved in the most courteous manner, and very favourably impressed Colonel Jenkins and myself.”

No doubt Faiz Muhammed Khan had a very disagreeable duty imposed upon him in resisting the English Mission, and I presume that he discharged that disagreeable duty with courtesy, and like a gentleman, as no doubt he is. It is stated that he favourably impressed both Major Cavagnari and Colonel Jenkins. His restraining his levies from firing would favourably impress them.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU: I would ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, If he does not think such an interpretation of the words quoted is inconsistent with those other words quoted by Sir Neville Chamberlain; and whether the real meaning of them is not this—“You see how perfectly friendly I am to you. You see I still maintain my ancient friendship.” [“Order!”]

MR. SPEAKER remarked that the noble Lord was not entitled to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer for an expression of opinion on this point.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU: Then I will ask whether this is not the meaning of the words—“As a proof of my great friendship for you, I have restrained my levies from firing on you.”

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: That was not the impression that was made on the minds of our two emissaries. Colonel Jenkins, in his Report to Sir Neville Chamberlain, says that had it not been for the great courtesy and care exercised by Major Cavagnari a collision would probably have taken place. No doubt there was considerable danger; and if Major Cavagnari had not, with considerable dexterity and tact, changed the subject, it is extremely likely that serious consequences would have ensued.

THE EASTERN QUESTION—THE TREATY OF BERLIN—ARTICLE 24. QUESTION.

MR. W. CARTWRIGHT asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any Communications have been addressed to, or any Correspondence exchanged between Her Majesty's Government and France or any other signatory Power of the Berlin Treaty in respect of some proposed action in the sense of Article 24 of that Treaty, with the view of facilitating the rectification of the frontier between Greece and Turkey, as suggested in Protocol 13 of the Berlin Congress; and, if there has been any such Communication or Correspondence, whether Her Majesty's Government intend to lay it before Parliament.

MR. BOURKE: The subject mentioned in the Question is still under negotiation, and when these negotiations are finished the Papers will be submitted to Parliament.

AFGHANISTAN—RUSSIAN POLICY.

QUESTION.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, with regard to the following statement made by Lord Lytton and Sir Lewis Pelly on 10th October, 1876 (p. 188):—

"Our only interest in maintaining the independence of Afghanistan is to provide for the security of our frontier. But the moment we cease to regard Afghanistan as a friendly and firmly allied State, what is there to prevent us from providing for the security of our frontier by an understanding with Russia, which might have the effect of wiping Afghanistan out of the map altogether? If the Ameer does not desire to come to a speedy understanding with us, Russia does; and she desires it at his expense;"

to what negotiation or proposal did the Viceroy allude; and, whether, as Afghanistan is now not a friendly State, any understanding has been come to between England and Russia on the subject?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, that as he read the passage referred to by the noble Lord, and as it was understood by his noble Friend the Secretary of State for India, it simply conveyed the general impression which the Viceroy had derived from the conversation with the Russian Minister as to the action of Russia. There was no ground for interpreting it as referring to any formal proposals by Russia on the subject.

THE BOARD OF WORKS (IRELAND).

QUESTION.

MAJOR NOLAN asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If the Government intend to take steps towards the re-organization of the Board of Works in Ireland?

MR. J. LOWTHER: The Board of Works is under the control of the Treasury, and my hon. Friend the Secretary of that Department informs me that steps are being taken with a view to a re-organization of the Board. I, however, have no personal knowledge of the matter, which is not in my Department.

Mr. Cartwright

MAJOR NOLAN: I cannot say that I am satisfied with the answer which is given me by the right hon. Gentleman. Therefore, I give Notice that I shall repeat the Question to the Secretary to the Treasury, and shall also ask him if the Government intend to make any announcement on the subject before the adjournment of the House for the Christmas Recess.

PURCHASE OF LAND (IRELAND)—OCCUPYING TENANTS.

QUESTION.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce a measure for the purpose of giving greater facilities for occupying tenants of land in Ireland to become owners of their holdings by purchase in pursuance of the evidence and Report of the Committee of last Session on this subject?

MR. J. LOWTHER: The Report of the Select Committee referred to and the Evidence are now engaging the attention of the Government, and it would be premature for me to state now what the decision of the Government may be. In due time it will be communicated to the House.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I shall call attention to the subject again, and move a Resolution, when the House meets after the Recess, in case the course proposed by the Government should prove unsatisfactory.

INDIAN DESPATCHES—OPINIONS OF THE COUNCIL OF INDIA.—QUESTION.

MR. W. E. FORSTER asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether any opinions were given by any Members of the Council of India with respect to the Despatches from the Secretary of State for India to the Governor General of India, dated 22nd January and 19th November, 1875; and, if so, whether the Government will give the House their opinions; whether he can give the House Captain Grey's Letter to Noor Mahomed Shah, referred to in Dr. Bellew's Memorandum, dated Peshawur, 28th January 1877; whether there is any record of Sir Lewis Pelly's demand from the Cabul Envoy for an explanation of the reported hostility of the Ameer's language and conduct while engaged in friendly and pacific negotiation with the British Government, referred to in paragraph 33 of Lord Lytton's Despatch of 10th May 1877, and of the Envoy's reply to this demand, referred to in paragraph 34 of the same Despatch; and, if there be such record, whether it can be produced; and, whether the Native Agent, Nawab Gholam Hussein Khan, made any report of his Mission to Cabul on his return to Simla in October 1878; and, whether, if so, such report can be produced?

MR. E. STANHOPE: The letters of Captain Grey and also the letters which passed between Sir Lewis Pelly and the Envoy shall be included in the forthcoming Papers. The only official account which we have received at the India Office of the Report of our Native Agent is a very short telegraphic Report; but my noble Friend is in communication with the Viceroy on the subject. With respect to Lord Salisbury's despatches to the Governor General of India, dated the 22nd January and 19th November, 1875, no opinions by any Members of the Council are recorded in the proceedings. They were approved by the Secret Committee of the Council. [MR. FAWCETT: The Political Committee of the Council?] I prefer to call it by the name of the Political and Secret Committee. While under discussion notes were written by three of the Members for the consideration of their Colleagues and the Secretary of State. These notes were of a strictly confidential character, and it has never been the practice to communicate their contents, or, in fact, to make their existence known. If such notes were to be published, a Secret Committee would be useless, and I am afraid we cannot, therefore, undertake to produce them. The letter of the Native Agent will be produced with the rest of the Papers.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, that with reference to the Report of the Native Agent's Mission to Cabul there were three letters written by Nawab Gholam Hussein Khan, but only abstracts or extracts were given of the contents in the Blue Book. As the letters were written letters, he presumed they might be given as well as the telegraphic extracts.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Do I understand that we shall receive these Papers as early as possible on Monday?

MR. E. STANHOPE: They will be ready early to-morrow.

THE AFGHAN PAPERS.—QUESTIONS.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR asked the Under Secretary of State for India, If the Papers referred to at page 70 of the Afghan Papers will be laid before the House?

MR. E. STANHOPE: The Papers referred to by the hon. and gallant Member consist of voluminous Minutes relating mainly to the affairs of Quetta and Beloochistan, and should be produced together with the Papers relating to the subject. That is the reason why they have not been included among the present series.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR: Can I see them before the debate?

MR. E. STANHOPE: No, Sir.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR: I thought so. ["Order!"]

MR. E. STANHOPE: It is not usual to show Papers to any individual Member which have been refused to the House generally.

AFGHANISTAN (EXPENSES OF MILITARY OCCUPATION).—QUESTIONS.

MR. FAWCETT asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether the consent of the Council of the Secretary of State for India has been obtained to any of the expenditure hitherto incurred in connection with the Military Expedition against the Ameer of Afghanistan; and, if so, when this consent was obtained and whether it was unanimous; and, whether any opinions have been recorded by the Council as to the justice of throwing these charges upon the Revenue of India; and, if so, whether there will be any objection to lay the record of these opinions before Parliament?

MR. E. STANHOPE: On Tuesday last a proposal came before the Council of the Secretary of State for increasing the Native Army in India. It was agreed to by a unanimous vote of the Council. Since that time certain opinions and reasons have, I understand, been prepared, but have not yet been recorded in the proceedings of the Council. When they are so recorded, if the hon. Member likes to move for them, there will be no objection to their production.

MR. FAWCETT: I will move for them; but the Under Secretary of State has not answered my Question. It was, Whether the consent of the Council has been obtained to the expenditure which has been incurred in Afghanistan; and, if so, on what day?

MR. GOSCHEN: I would ask a further Question, and that is, whether the Council of India has been consulted on any single point connected with the outbreak of this war before Tuesday last?

MR. E. STANHOPE: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will be good enough to give Notice of that Question. With regard to the Question of the hon. Member for Hackney, as I understand it, the object was to know whether certain dissents of the Members of the Council had been made, and whether we knew of them. I have already told him that when such dissents are entered upon the records, if the hon. Member moves for them, they will be presented to Parliament.

MR. FAWCETT: I am extremely sorry to trouble the Under Secretary of State for India, but my Question is divided into two parts. The Under Secretary has answered the latter part of the Question; but the first part is absolutely distinct, and refers to the expenditure "hitherto incurred." What I want to know is, whether the consent of the Council of the Secretary of State for India has been obtained to any of the expenditure hitherto incurred in connection with the military expedition against the Ameer of Afghanistan; and, if so, when that consent was obtained, and whether it was unanimous?

MR. E. STANHOPE: I have to say that the consent of the Council has not been necessary in any case that has hitherto occurred. The only occasion in which any reference to past expenditure has come before the Council was on Tuesday last.

MR. FAWCETT: Then I will ask—and repeat the Question on Monday, if necessary—if the consent of the Council of the Secretary of State for India has not been obtained to the expenditure which has hitherto been incurred—considering it is distinctly provided by the 41st section of the Government of India Act that no expenditure of the Revenues of India, whether in India or elsewhere, can be allowed, except by the consent of a majority of the Council of the Secretary of State for India—by whose authority this expenditure has been incurred?

MR. E. STANHOPE: I think the House will at once see that that is an argumentative Question. At the same time, I may say that I do not at all agree with this reading of the statute; and I shall at the proper time be prepared to argue the matter at much greater length than I could devote to it now.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR asked, if it was the intention of the Government to lay Papers on the Table connected with the assumption of the Ameer of Afghanistan in respect to Quetta?

PARLIAMENT—COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC BUSINESS.—QUESTIONS.

MR. NEWDEGATE wished to know, whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer intended to submit to the House the Resolutions which had been agreed to by the Committee on Public Business last Session? No. 3 of those Resolutions was to the effect that no hon. Member should move for the second reading of a Bill which he might introduce a day later than one month from the date of the first reading. There were 51 Notices of Bills.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY wished to know, whether the hon. Member was not making use of the indulgence of the House in a very unusual way?

MR. SPEAKER said, he understood the hon. Member for North Warwickshire did not intend to raise any discussion. At the same time, he must point out to him that he could only put any Question by the indulgence of the House.

MR. NEWDEGATE thought it would have been competent to him to have raised the question on the first Bill; but that would be invidious, and therefore he had preferred to take his present course. There were 34 Wednesdays between now and the end of July.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is now going into matter which he is not entitled to go into.

MR. NEWDEGATE would not trespass on the House. There were 51 Notices; and he asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he would move the second and third Resolutions which he carried in the Committee on Public Business last Session?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he was afraid that he could not give a very full answer to the Question. Undoubtedly the Resolution was adopted by the Committee to which the hon. Gentleman referred; but he was not at the present moment able to say whether he would make proposals to that effect in the House. He would not do so, at any rate, in the present short Session.

CRIMINAL LAW—THE MURDER IN KENT.—QUESTION.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN wished to ask the Home Secretary a Question of which he had given him private Notice. It was, Whether the Government were in possession of information more detailed than that which had appeared in the newspapers in reference to the terrible murder in Kent; and also whether, considering the circumstances of the case, the Government had any intention of offering a reward for the discovery of the murderer?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, he had no information at all on the subject, but he expected to be in possession of some to-morrow. If it should appear desirable to offer a reward, he should do so; but, as his right hon. Friend knew, rewards were not offered by the Home Office until a verdict had been returned by the Coroner's Jury.

THE ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.

Report of Address brought up, and read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the said Address be now read a second time."

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be adjourned till Monday next."—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

Motion agreed to.

MOTIONS.

BURIAL LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

(In the Committee.)

MR. BALFOUR moved—

"That the Chairman be directed to move the House, that leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the Burial Laws."

MR. BERESFORD HOPE took that opportunity of giving Notice that, on the second reading of the Bill, and at any subsequent stage, he would give it every opposition in his power, as he believed it to be a measure eminently calculated to add infinite confusion to a question infinitely confounded already.

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported:—Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. BALFOUR, Lord FRANCIS HERVEY, and Mr. WAIT.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 10.]

CONSECRATION OF CHURCHYARDS ACT (1867) AMENDMENT BILL.

(In the Committee.)

MR. MONK moved—

"That the Chairman be directed to move the House, that leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend 'The Consecration of Churchyards Act, 1867.'"

MR. DILLWYN said, he thought it better to oppose the Bill—the object of which was to allow clergymen to set apart a portion of the graveyard for the interment of Dissenters—on the first reading, as it would save the time of the House, if the Bill was one which the House was likely to reject. He had long considered that the practice of introducing Private Bills as a matter of course should be put an end to. The Public Business of the House had become so enormous that something should be done to relieve the pressure; and he would commence by opposing this particular Bill, which, if introduced, would help to crowd the Orders of the House without a probability of its being carried.

MR. NEWDEGATE did not dispute the right to oppose the introduction of a Bill; but there was this difficulty in pursuing that course—that it was impossible for the House to know upon what it was voting. He had suggested to the Committee upon Public Business that a copy of the Bill should be deposited in the Public Bill Office three days before the Motion for introduction must be made, but the Committee did not adopt the suggestion. There were 51 Notices for introduction of Bills already on the Paper, and there would be only 31 Wednesdays down to the end of July, so that there would be something like two Bills for every Wednesday. Some private Members' Bills might, no doubt, be down for Tuesdays; but one effect of this would be that unless Government should consent to give exceptional privileges in favour of a Bill, that scarcely anybody wanted, most important measures might be strangled. Looking forward to the time when the Chancellor of the Exchequer would submit the Resolution to the House, he was not prepared to oppose the first reading of this Bill. He advocated the printing of Bills before they were read a first time.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN deprecated the premature discussion of Resolutions, some of them adopted only by a majority of the Select Committee on Public Business last year. He had put on the Notice Paper a Question, asking the Government what course they intended to take with regard to the Resolutions of that Committee? Without seeing the Bill, he was not prepared to oppose the first reading, although he should probably resist its further progress. For the present they had better adhere to the old Rule, under which all that was implied by a first reading was that the subject was one which it was fitting the House should consider.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, he must protest against the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) stealing a march on the other Members of the Public Business Committee by quoting from its Report at such length recommendations which were, after all, very likely to come to nothing. It was taking an undue advantage of those other Members who were just as able to do the same, but who refrained from such an irregularity. At the same time, he hoped that the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) would not persevere with his Motion. He was himself not averse from considering how the custom of dealing with proposed legislation at that stage might, with due precautions, be revived. After all, it had not been so long obsolete; for he had himself in the last Parliament, not so many Sessions back, defeated Mr. Auberon Herbert on a Motion for leave to bring in a Bill. But he did not think it quite fair on the part of the hon. Member for Swansea arbitrarily to select one out of many Bills, and, without Notice, attempt to strangle it.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN remarked, that if this Bill was the same as that brought in last year, it was about the worst measure ever introduced, and he should give it his most strenuous opposition. The hon. Member (Mr. Monk) was greatly mistaken if he thought it would satisfy the claims of Nonconformists. He hoped his hon. Friend (Mr. Dillwyn) would be satisfied with calling attention to the subject, and would not divide against the introduction of the Bill.

MR. MONK thought his hon. Friend might have given Notice of his intended opposition to the Bill, as he knew perfectly well that it had been read a second time in the last Session; and that, although it was then opposed, the opposition had not been carried to a division, the feeling of the House being almost unanimous in its favour. He should, however, be perfectly ready to meet his hon. Friend at the proper time.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I think it would be most undesirable at the present moment, and on a single question of this kind, to make a change in our practical system of proceeding. I think it open to very great doubt whether it might not be wise for the House to return to a practice which is perfectly legal, but has become almost obsolete—namely, to object to Bills on their first reading. It is a practice on which there is a great deal to be said; but it should be practised under the full understanding that the House had considered the proposal. I do not certainly think that on this occasion it would be proper to put it in practice without further investigation.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, there were occasions on which it was distinctly desirable that Bills should be opposed on their first reading, and he would give Notice that he would oppose the Licensing Bill that night, but he appealed to his hon. Friend (Mr. Dillwyn) not to oppose this particular Bill.

MR. ASSHETON supported the Bill.

MR. DILLWYN explained that his object had been to curtail the Business of the House by relieving the overcrowded state of the Order Book. He would give way to the appeal made to him, and not press his opposition to the introduction of the Bill.

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported: — Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. MONK, Mr. GRANTHAM, and Mr. FORSYTH.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 13.]

INTERMENTS IN CHURCHYARDS BILL.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

MR. RITCHIE moved—

“That the Chairman be directed to move the House, that leave be given to bring in a Bill to enable Incumbents of parishes or ecclesiastical districts, or Ministers in charge of the same, to permit Interments in Churchyards with a religious service other than that of the Church of England, or without any religious service.”

MR. DILLWYN said, that he had an objection to this Bill; but in deference to the feeling of the House he would not oppose its introduction, though he hoped that a different course would next year be taken in regard to the introduction of Bills.

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported: — Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. RITCHIE, Mr. GORST, Mr. WOODD, and Mr. SAMPSON LLOYD.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 24.]

LICENSING LAWS AMENDMENT BILL.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

MR. STAVELEY HILL moved—

“That the Chairman be directed to move the House, that leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the Licensing Laws.”

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that his objection to this Motion was that it ought to be made later. Last Session the Government recommended the hon. Member to wait for the Report of the Lords' Committee; he did not do so, however, but endeavoured to press the Bill. The Lords' Committee had not yet reported, and the Government would give no encouragement for carrying Bills of this kind until the Lords' Committee had reported.

MR. MUNDELLA hoped that the same privilege would be extended to the hon. and learned Member as had been afforded to every other hon. Member, and that the Bill would be allowed to be introduced and read a first time. All the magistrates in the country were in favour of it. It related to the important subject of grocers' licences, and it was very desirable that the subject should be discussed.

MR. STAVELEY HILL hoped the House would allow the measure to be discussed by giving leave for its introduction.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON pointed out that there were six drink Bills on the Paper, and that four had been allowed to be introduced sub silentio; and it would be rather hard upon the hon. and learned Member not to allow this Bill to be brought in at once, as the Lords' Committee might sit for ever.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, he did not think it fair that this measure should be singled out from a number of others for opposition. Until it was so decided by some Resolution of the House, it would not be well to subject Bills of this sort to opposition on the Motion for Leave to introduce them. The Bill would not be taken for second reading until after the Lords' Committee had reported, if that Report were made in sufficient time, and when it came on again the Government would state what they proposed to do.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN (for Sir CHARLES W. DILKE) said, that no division was intended to be taken at this stage. He submitted, however, that the question was one of very great importance, and required the urgent attention of the House.

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported: — Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. STAVELEY HILL, Mr. MUNDELLA, and Mr. RODWELL.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 25.]

CHURCH OF SCOTLAND BILL.

(In the Committee.)

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON
moved—

“That the Chairman be directed to move the House, that leave be given to bring in a Bill to make further provisions in regard to the Church of Scotland; to facilitate the re-union therewith of other Presbyterian Churches in Scotland; and for other purposes relating thereto.”

MR. M'LAREN wished to ask the Speaker, whether it was competent to a private Member to introduce a Bill which affected the Church of Scotland?

MR. SPEAKER said, there was no objection to the introduction of the Bill; but it could not be passed through the subsequent stages if it touched the interests of the Crown without the consent of the Crown being first given.

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported:—Bill ordered to be brought in by Sir ALEXANDER GORDON, and Mr. MACKINTOSH.

MARRIED WOMEN'S PROPERTY (SCOTLAND)

MEDICAL ACT (1858) AMENDMENT BILL.

HYPOTHEC ABOLITION (SCOTLAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. VANS AGNEW, Bill to abolish the Landlord's right of Hypothec for Rent of Land in Scotland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. VANS AGNEW, Mr. BAILLIE HAMILTON, Sir GEORGE DOUGLAS, and Colonel ALEXANDER.

CONVENTION (IRELAND) ACT REPEAL BILL.

On Motion of Sir JOSEPH M'KENNA, Bill to repeal “The Convention (Ireland) Act,” ordered to be brought in by Sir JOSEPH M'KENNA, Mr. P. J. SMYTH, and Mr. DOWNING.

VOLUNTEER CORPS (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. O'CLERY, Bill to authorise the enrolment of Volunteer Corps in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. O'CLERY, Major NOLAN, Lord FRANCIS CONYNNGHAM, and Major O'BEIRNE.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 5.]

PERMISSIVE PROHIBITORY LIQUOR BILL.

(In the Committee.)

Resolved, That the Chairman be directed to move the House, that leave be given to bring in a Bill to enable Owners and Occupiers of Property in certain districts to prevent the common sale of Intoxicating Liquors within such districts.

Resolution reported:—Bill ordered to be brought in by Sir WILFRID LAWSON, Sir THOMAS BAZELEY, Mr. RICHARD, Dr. CAMERON, Mr. DALWAY, Mr. DOWNING, and Mr. CHARLES LEWIS.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

THE LORD WINDSOR—Sat first in Parliament.

ROLL OF THE LORDS.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR acquainted the House that the Clerk of the Parliaments had prepared and laid it on the Table: The same was ordered to be printed. (No. 1.)

QUEEN'S SPEECH—HER MAJESTY'S ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS.

THE LORD STEWARD (The Earl BEAUCHAMP) reported Her Majesty's Answer to the Address as follows:—

MY LORDS,

I THANK you sincerely for your loyal and dutiful Address.

You may rely on my hearty desire to co-operate with you in all measures calculated to increase the security of all parts of My Empire.

AFGHANISTAN (EXPENSES OF MILITARY OPERATIONS).—RESOLUTION.

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: My Lords, I very much regret that it should have fallen to my lot, as Minister for India, to be the person whose duty it is to bring before the House of Lords the question of war in that part of Her Majesty's Dominions. I occupied for some years the office of Minister for War; but I am happy to say that while filling that office it was my good fortune to be a Minister of Peace, though during the whole of that time the Department with which I was connected was occupied in making preparations for war, in case war should be necessary; and I believe that the best way of preventing war is to put a bold face on the matter—to say what you mean and do what you have said. My Lords, the Motion I have to make is in these terms—

My Lords, in 1858 a short Act (the Government of India Act) was passed, with the view of putting a check, to a certain extent, on the powers of the Indian Government, but in a different way from the way suggested by the noble Earl (Earl Grey), who moved the Amendment to the Address. The noble Earl assumed that it was essential when the subject of war was under discussion that the Cabinet should be entirely precluded from going to war until a preliminary notification of its intention to do so had been given to Parliament. I am not now going to argue whether or not in other kinds of war there is or should be such a principle; but I do say that by the Act of 1858 Parliament sanctioned the principle that Her Majesty's Government may make war in India without any previous notification to Parliament. Nay—that Act provides that the Government may do so if within three months after they have done so should Parliament be sitting, or within one month after the next assembling of Parliament, should Parliament not be sitting at the time, the Government announces the fact to both Houses. That is provided by one clause. Another clause provides for the obtaining of that consent of Parliament to the application of the Revenues of India which my Motion asks this House to accede to. Now, my Lords, in reading a statute the proper rule to be observed is to read it as a whole; and I think that, taking the former clause, under which if Parliament should not be sitting the Government is not bound to acquaint it with the declaration of war for three months after it meets—and the Government might wait a number of months without advising the Queen to call it together—I think, taking that clause in conjunction with Clause 55, it is clearly contemplated that power is given to the Home Government to declare war without previous communication of its intention to Parliament, and it follows, of necessity, that the application to Parliament in respect of funds must be made subsequently. The declaration of war cannot precede the communication, for, otherwise, such notice would be given of our intention as might preclude the war from being efficaciously undertaken. The fact is, then, as stated the other night by my noble Friend (the Marquess of Salisbury), we are taking Parliament into our confidence with greater rapidity than is required by the Act of Parliament. We called Parliament together as soon as there was a certainty of the war. Up to the 20th of November there was not that certainty; we were up to that date unaware of what would be the reply of the Ameer to our Ultimatum; but when the circumstances occurred with which your Lordships are familiar, and there was no longer any uncertainty that our Frontier must be passed, we resolved to call Parliament together. You cannot, however, in such a case wait and stay your hand until you have had the opportunity of consulting with Parliament. And I think I may now say that the acting with such promptitude as the Government did, tended materially to the success of the operations which have already been executed.

Now, my Lords, as to the question of the use of the Indian Revenue, I do not know that much need be said. If the House consents to the Revenues of India being applied to defray the expense of these operations, it will not follow from such consent that Parliament would be prevented from contributing to the cost of those operations; but I am bound to say, after looking very carefully into the financial condition of India and the circumstances of this war, I believe it will not be necessary—at least in the initial steps—to call on the Revenues of England. I am in possession of facts which, I think, will convince your Lordships that, without unduly pressing on the Revenues of India, there will be no necessity to call on the English Revenue—at least, during the present financial year. It was announced by my hon. Friend (Mr. Stanhope), in “another place,” that, including the £1,500,000 of new taxation for famine insurance, the surplus of Indian Revenue was estimated to amount to £2,156,000. The Revenue has actually exceeded the Estimate. In opium alone the increase is £1,245,000. But some of the charges have been increased, reducing the estimated surplus to £1,800,000. Looking into the different calculations made on the subject, the supposition of the Indian Government is that during the present financial year the cost of the military operations will not exceed £1,100,000 or £1,200,000. Take it at £1,250,000, and there would remain then a substantial surplus of about £550,000 after the payment of the charges for the Expedition. If it should be necessary, in answer to any remarks on the subject, I will go into this question again; but for the present I shall pass from it, as the Amendment of the noble Viscount opposite (Viscount Halifax) is not addressed to this particular branch, but to the general question. I shall pass, then, at once to political matters.

My Lords, for at least half-a-century great interest has been felt in Afghanistan by those who have devoted any attention to Indian affairs. It has been considered as one of the entrances to India from the North-West; its relations towards Great Britain have always throughout that period been regarded as very important to the Imperial interests of England—it has been considered that without proper relations between British India and Afghanistan our Frontier could not be regarded as secure. This has never been a question of Party politics. The opinion to which I have just referred has not been that of any one Government or another; but an opinion expressed by all statesmen of every Party. Everyone will admit that statesmen of all Parties have agreed in the necessity of a strong Afghanistan on friendly terms with this country. And so long as we could trust the Rulers of Afghanistan, and so long as they were true to us, we were content. We desired nothing else and nothing more. I do not think I should wisely occupy the time of your Lordships by going back to the time of Dost Mahomed; but, in fact, Afghan policy was very much affected by what took place in the war with that Ruler. I may make one remark in reference to occurrences in Afghanistan which at the time of those occurrences painfully affected the mind of this country, and of which unpleasant memories still remain. I may say that the sufferings sustained by our troops in the war to which I am referring did not happen because this country was too weak to maintain her rights and unable to vindicate her position in Afghanistan by the sword; but we were unfortunate. We were unfortunate in our political negotiators; we were unfortunate in our generals. The commonest precautions were neglected; and from those miserable complications and neglect, and not from any want of valour in the field, resulted those disasters which we all regret. But, my Lords, those occurrences did not permanently affect our relations with Dost Mahomed. Being our pensioner, and being well affected towards us, when he returned to Afghanistan he was not influenced by any hostile feelings towards England; but circumstances obliged him to maintain an appearance of “sullen reserve.” He had to consider not only himself, but his country; and he felt obliged to maintain that attitude until he saw that his people had forgotten what they had suffered in the war. He then became a firm Ally of the British Government. He felt our power, our position, and resources, and he had learnt that what we promised we would assuredly undertake, and in 1855 he entered into that Treaty which is so well known to your Lordships. As showing how implicit was his trust in the British Government, it is remarkable that while he by that Treaty bound himself to regard “our friends as his friends and our enemies as his enemies,” there is no reciprocal declaration from us that we will regard his enemies as our enemies and his friends as our friends.

And here, with respect to the Papers in which this Treaty has been printed, I wish, in answer to charges which have been made as to these Papers, to say that no such Papers were promised or asked for last Session. In reply to a Question put in the other House, the Papers relating to Central Asia were promised by the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, but these Indian Papers never were promised; but as soon as we saw that the complications between this country and Afghanistan were likely to become serious, and it was clear that official information would be required, we saw that those Papers would be important, and I gave directions that they should be prepared with all possible speed. I am satisfied that effect was given to those directions. I will add that though there remain unprinted some Papers which some persons may wish to see, nothing whatever has been kept back; and I believe there are in the Papers on your Lordships' Table everything necessary not only for explaining the question, but for enabling anybody who has been concerned fully to explain his own conduct, should he think it necessary to do so.

My Lords, the next Treaty to which it is necessary to allude is that of 1857. It was essentially a temporary measure, and I need not treat it further than to observe that in connection with it there again arises proof that when we are at war with any of our Western neighbours the importance of Afghanistan comes into peculiar prominence. We were at war with Persia when that Treaty was made, and it became necessary to secure Dost Mahomed as our Ally—and that was done. When Dost Mahomed died in 1863, and Shere Ali as his successor ascended the Throne, he notified his accession to the Viceroy of that day. But during six months Shere Ali waited in vain for an acknowledgment of that announcement. I am not blaming anyone for that. In consequence of the illness of Lord Elgin there may have been delay—in consequence of the death of Lord Elgin there may have been still further delay; but, as a matter of fact, six months elapsed after Shere Ali announced his accession before he received any communication from the Indian Government. I think we must admit that that circumstance was, at least, unfortunate. It must have rankled in the mind of a man of the Ameer's peculiar temperament, and the feeling to which it gave rise was perhaps intensified by events which followed. Struggles and complications followed. There were wars between Shere Ali and members of his family at the time, and one succeeded another in different parts of the country. At that time the noble Lord opposite (Lord Lawrence) was at the head of British affairs in India; he pursued a policy of recognizing de facto Governments of Afghanistan, and not only of Afghanistan as a whole, but of parts of Afghanistan. The noble Lord, though one of those who maintained the necessity, in the Imperial interests, of a strong and friendly Afghanistan, signaled his Viceroyalty by recognizing de facto Governments in the several parts of that country. So matters went on until 1868. When Shere Ali, though partially unsuccessful, retained a pre-eminence at Herat, the noble Lord recognized him as the de facto Ruler of Herat; while he, at the same time, recognized as de facto Ruler of Cabul and Candahar Ameer Mahomed Ufzul Khan, his brother, to whom he wrote a letter congratulating him on his successes over Shere Ali. It was not until the latter was again on the Throne of Cabul, and seemed to be permanently seated there, that the noble Lord wrote to him offering him that assistance which would have been so useful to him when he was struggling for that Throne. As I have said, a strong and friendly Afghanistan had been the object of all British Governments; but I ask your Lordships whether it is a likely plan of conciliating the Ruler of a strong and friendly Government to acknowledge the persons who succeed in establishing themselves in different parts of his dominions immediately upon receipt of their letters, but not to acknowledge the Ruler himself until he had been six months firmly seated upon his Throne, and no longer needed our assistance? So thought Shere Ali; but he was prudent in his generation. He accepted the acknowledgment of the Viceroy. Why? Because the first thing which he, or any person who aspired to the rule of Afghanistan, wished to obtain was the acknowledgment and recognition of the British Government.

That recognition gave the title of the Ruler of Afghanistan a validity which he could not otherwise obtain for it. That was the position of the Ameer just before the noble Lord left India; and Shere Ali, though he felt sore, and was much vexed at what had been done in respect of his brother, proposed to meet the noble Lord and to enter into a Treaty with him. But the noble Lord refused to enter into any Treaty engagement with him. He would give him what he had so much recommended for many years—"present assistance," for the purpose of consolidating and strengthening his Throne. Shere Ali was engaged in trying to establish his dynasty, and wished that our Government should recognize the successor of his choice. The noble Lord conveyed to him that so long as he was content to maintain friendly relations with Her Majesty's Government so long might he rely on our assistance and friendship. No doubt that was valuable; but it was not what the Ameer wanted; he desired to secure the succession of his family, but not to enter upon the general question of foreign relations. But the noble Lord was succeeded by my noble Friend Lord Mayo; and let me for a moment turn to something which occurred, and which has reference to that policy which has been before alluded to. There was at this time no question of Party feeling or Party politics; but there was a very general impression among all at the time to which I have now come that it would be very undesirable to enter into any Treaty binding ourselves in any way to the Ameer in the future, and that policy was supported by many who held very different views on other public questions. But in 1867 there was a paper written by Sir Henry Rawlinson treating of Russian advances in Central Asia, and which everyone will admit to be a paper of great ability, and almost prophetic in its character. In that paper the writer called attention to the measures which, in his judgment, were necessary for maintaining for England a dominant position in Afghanistan. The proposition that England should have such a position has, I think, remained unchallenged, although it has been made the subject of much writing, and the paper to which I allude has been reviewed in a great many other papers. One says—

another says—"We must use conciliatory measures;" but all look forward to a state of things when we must forbid any further advance, if it should be attempted; and not a few were prepared, to use the words of the noble Lord near me (Lord Lawrence), if a certain line is passed, we must be prepared for war with Russia in all parts of the world. But when Lord Mayo arrived in India questions with regard to the Ameer's foreign relations did not arise. The question uppermost in the mind of the Ameer was that of his dynasty. This appears from despatches sent home by Lord Mayo, and by the despatch of the Duke of Argyll, in which fault was at first found with what Lord Mayo had done. But that was not the case outside the Conference which took place between the Ameer and Lord Mayo. You find by the Papers that outside the Conference conversations passed on various subjects, and at that time the Ameer would have raised no difficulty to the residence of British officers in certain parts of Afghanistan, excepting Cabul. These things are, I repeat, to be gathered from what took place outside the Conference. In the latter the Ameer was concerned about his dynasty. The noble Lord who preceded Lord Mayo had urged the Home Government of that day, in strong language, to lay down a course of action, and to get rid of these questions which were constantly arising. My Lords, I look in vain among the Papers for any instructions to Lord Mayo on those points. The noble Lord (Lord Lawrence), who had taken his seat in this House, spoke on the 19th of April, 1869. He and the Duke of Argyll, the Secretary of State for India, addressed the House on that occasion, and the noble Duke said—

"I think it would be an extremely dangerous thing to govern by telegraph, or even to reply in Parliament upon telegraphs; but I have every reason to believe that Lord Mayo has consistently pursued the same policy of non-intervention and of the avoidance of entangling engagements, which was pursued by my noble Friend the late Governor General of India (Lord Lawrence). So far as my own instructions to Lord Mayo are concerned, they certainly have been to avoid all entangling engagements for the future with Afghanistan, and to maintain the British Government and the Government of India perfectly free in regard to that and other conterminous States."—[3 Hansard, cxcv. 1087.]

Then Lord Lawrence, in reference to the Ameer's proposal to enter into a Treaty as his father had done, and to maintain friendly relations, said—

"I thereupon wrote to the Ameer and told him what were my views—that I was willing to help him still further in a moderate way; that I could not bind myself by any Treaty which would involve obligations on the part of Her Majesty's Government to assist him."—[Ibid. 1094.]

Those distinct statements show that the policy of the noble Duke and the noble Lord was one of distrust and isolation, of independence of Afghanistan in respect of any entangling engagements. Lord Mayo had instructions not to enter into any entangling engagements for the future; but Lord Mayo obtained, by his frank and genial intercourse and character, an extraordinary influence with the Ameer. He wrote in the most friendly manner to the Ameer:—and it is a remarkable thing that though through the whole period of his administration Lord Mayo gave but one rather vague promise in writing, Shere Ali appeared to regard the simple promise of Lord Mayo as stronger than the more solemn engagements of the Government offered to him at a subsequent time—indeed, he evidently considers that what has been subsequently done tended to vitiate and weaken Lord Mayo's promises. Evidently the Ameer believed in Lord Mayo's sincerity; and, no doubt, a man like my noble Friend was such a one as would have impressed one with the erratic, but still, to some extent, chivalric mind of Shere Ali. Lord Mayo wrote him a letter asking him to be reconciled to his son; and that letter was received without displeasure—a circumstance which, I think, was owing to its tone and the manner in which it was worded. With the lamented death of Lord Mayo a great change occurred. My Lords, I cannot but think that in the not taking advantage of what might then have been done a great opportunity was lost. During the period that had elapsed great progress had been effected by the colossal power which is overshadowing Asia. Advances were made by that Power to the Ruler of Afghanistan, and he was impressed with those occurrences more than were those who ruled British India. He saw his neighbours disappearing one after the other, and he concluded that the time had arrived when he must put his own house in order, and prepare for any emergencies that might arise. The letter written by the Ameer in 1873 opened the way to a complete understanding. Now, it appears that in 1873 the noble Earl (the Earl of Northbrook) requested Shere Ali to receive a British Envoy at Cabul. That was a very important step. The Ameer did not refuse to receive the Envoy; but he desired that they should first come to an understanding as to the objects of the Mission and the questions to be discussed, and he proposed to send an Envoy to Simla to hold a Conference with the Viceroy. This was accepted; and on the 12th of July, 1873, the noble Earl (the Earl of Northbrook) held his first Conference with the Cabul Envoy, Syud Noor Mahomed Shah. The Ameer then wanted much; but in his view he got nothing, and, in my opinion, a great opportunity was then lost. In alluding to what then occurred I will do so without personal references. I am quite content to take those occurrences as they stand on the Papers, or even to take them as the noble Earl himself wishes them to be accepted. When, the other night, I entered into a consideration of them, as recorded, I did so in vindication of myself from attacks which, I venture to think, went somewhat further than they ought to have done; but I submit that we have had enough of personal squabbles—the events with which we are engaged are too great to allow any place for personalities. Well, then, as it appears on the Papers, I say that in 1873, when Shere Ali pointed out the danger which had arisen from Russian advances, the time had come for a change in our policy towards Afghanistan; the time had come when we were bound to say that we would protect the Ameer, and protect him for the safety and security of the Empire. What had occurred? From his rocky heights he watched the irresistible tide advancing, submerging Kingdom after Kingdom and filling every valley, and approaching his own dominion. He asked you to aid him to set up a sea-wall to keep out the enemy, and you gave him—what? You first of all gave him incredulity, and then promises of assistance so vague, so ambiguous, so obscure, that Syud Noor Mahomed said, in 1877, that neither in writing nor in speech did Lord Northbrook inform him what help he might hope to obtain. But the time had come when Mrs. Partington, with her diplomatic mop, could no longer keep out the tide, and when verbal promises here and there were ineffectual. There was the inevitable pressure. The waters were getting higher every year. Shere Ali saw what India did not see—that the danger which was approaching was inevitable, and that the time had come when we ought to have stretched out our hands and helped him. He wanted you to say you would not only help him under certain contingencies, but that an unprovoked aggressor on his dominions should be your enemy. But you would not say it. He asked you practically that you should engage yourselves to resist unprovoked aggression by Russia. You declined. Syud Noor Mahomed Shah said that whatever specific assurances Russia might give, the people of Afghanistan could place no confidence in them, and would never rest satisfied unless they were assured of the aid of the British Government. The Ameer said—

“My anxiety which I feel on account of the Russians will never be removed unless the British Government adorns the Afghan Government with great assistance in money and armaments of war for the troops, and unless great aid is given for the construction of strong forts throughout the northern Afghan border. And, further, if an emergency arises for the Afghan Government to oppose the Russians, such opposition cannot take place without the co-operation of the disciplined troops of the British Government.”

Again, he said—

“Should the British Government intentionally overlook this matter with a view to temporizing for a few days, it is their own affair, but I will represent my circumstances in a clear form in detail without time-serving hesitation.”—[Afghanistan, No 1, pp. 110-111.]

My Lords, the Ameer represented his views through an influential Minister at great length to the noble Earl (the Earl of Northbrook) at their interviews; but he only got the same indefinite promise, and he took it for what it was worth. It did not conciliate Shere Ali, who considered it weaker than the promises of Lord Lawrence and Lord Mayo. He considered that they did not in any degree tend to secure to him the assistance he wanted. Whoever may be to blame for it—and I do not now say that anyone was to blame for it—from that time the Ameer distrusted England, and began to look somewhere else. We have several proofs of the change in his mind. Take that letter, in which he ironically speaks of his delight at the arrival of that time when there is no danger of the peace being broken, and therefore no necessity for precautions against such an occurrence. We have it on the authority of the noble Earl himself that the Ameer took no notice of the request made of him in respect to British officers, though he was quite ready to accede to that proposal in 1873. He did not let Mr. Forsyth pass through the country, and he did not communicate to the Viceroy his choice of a successor till that choice had been made. As the noble Earl admitted, his language was unsatisfactory, his letters not civil. In 1874, when he had imprisoned his son, against whom even in his latest letter he has expressed such inveterate hostility, he complained of the conduct of this country in interfering between him and his son. His complaint is not so much, however, of the interference, but of the manner in which it was effected. I admit that for the Ameer to have promised his son a safe conduct, and then to have seized him and cast him into prison, was a dastardly and a wicked thing; but what the noble Earl did was not that which Lord Mayo did in reference to the Ameer's son—address him in a private letter. The noble Earl directed our Native Vakeel to go to Shere Ali and read the message to him in his presence. Pride and haughtiness are characteristics of Shere Ali; and one can imagine that to such an Eastern Ruler there could not have been a more disagreeable thing than to have a lecture read to him on that subject, and that, too, without any previous inquiry as to whether anything had occurred to change the circumstances under which a guarantee of safe conduct had been given to his son. That the affair has rankled in his breast is clear from the last communication of his which has just reached this country. We do not know with accuracy, since the time that written message was sent to the Ameer, how many friendly letters have passed between Russian generals and Shere Ali. Some of what passed since then we may know; but I believe we do not know all. After these events, negotiations began to be conducted on a different footing; and whereas we knew everything before that time, we begun to know very little after. There is another thing on which the Ameer has laid great stress—the fact that a present and complimentary message was sent direct to the Chief of Wakhan by the noble Earl without having been sent through him as Suzerain over that Khan. Well, in 1874 the present Government came into office; and, my Lords, about the policy of the present Government there is no concealment in these Papers. They fully and freely state the truth, and there is no question about what that policy is. In 1875, after a year's experience, my noble Friend (the Marquess of Salisbury) complains of the scantiness of information on what was passing in Afghanistan in the hands of the Indian Government; and no one can read the Native Envoy's news letters without arriving at the same conclusion as my noble Friend. In January, 1875, after a year's reading of these precious Papers, which did give us all that we could get about Afghanistan, my noble Friend, dissatisfied with the imperfect ideas which could be formed on such materials, wrote to the Viceroy that it was desirable we should have a resident British officer, not, my Lords, at Cabul, but at Herat, who should furnish us with fuller information, especially of what was passing near the Frontier. I should have thought that nothing could be more advantageous to the Ameer as well as to ourselves. The time had come when Europeans were acquiring power and influence in those parts, and it was essential that the movements of Europeans should be watched by Europeans. The duty of watching them is one which Asiatics are incapable of performing. It is essential that the duty should be performed by civilized Europeans. I shall read on this subject the opinion of one who is capable of forming a judgment on the point. Sir Bartle Frere says—

“ I judge them only from the abstracts of their correspondence, which are, I conclude, weeded of much extraneous and trifling matter before they are printed and sent home; but even in the shape in which these abstracts reach us, I find a vast portion of durbar gossip in proportion to the important items of intelligence, &c. I find no scale of proportion by which to estimate the relative value and probability of the important and unimportant, the undoubted, the doubtful, and the mere hearsay; . . . still less do I find any discriminating description of persons such as may assist the Viceroy and his advisers in judging of men and events. A man in the Ameer's position knows well that he can trust almost any English officer who comes to him as a representative of the English Government.”

Well, the noble Earl as Viceroy, in the exercise of his discretion, did not think the time had arrived when the demand for the admission into Afghanistan of such officers should be made. The question was one of time, of degree, of how long we ought to wait, for he said that if the Russians were at Merv the time would have come. The noble Earl thought that the Russians had not approached near enough to cause any danger. If they had been at Merv—that is, within 12 marches of Herat—I have no doubt that the noble Earl would have thought it a good thing to have a British officer there—in time, perhaps, to receive them. Herat is called the key of India. Without going so far as to adopt that phrase, it is a place which must exercise a considerable influence in Central Asian affairs. But the noble Earl apparently wished to follow his own way, and the time passed. My Lords, there is such a thing in politics as “Too late.” British officers might have been received into Afghanistan before the Conference in 1873—after the Conference it was “too late.” My Lords, I am astonished at the way this matter is argued out-of-doors. I hope that here, at least, it will not be argued as it has been argued elsewhere. I hope it will not be argued as if we were dealing with the state of things which existed 10 years ago—as if within the last 10 years nothing had taken place—as if the world had stood still. Events are crowding upon each other in Europe and Asia; and to speak of the policy of 1868 as the policy of 1878 would be what, if it were not for those who do argue so, I should describe as childish. Again, the noble Earl was appealed to by my noble Friend, but he did not think the time had come; which shows me, begging the noble Earl's pardon, that he had not realized the state of Afghanistan, and the condition which surrounded it.

Well, the noble Earl (the Earl of Northbrook) left in 1876, and the present Viceroy (Lord Lytton) succeeded him. The Instructions with which he set out are contained in these Papers. I venture to say this for him, since so many accusations on the point have been made — that the steps taken by Lord Lytton have been taken in strict accordance with the Instructions given to him. The Government accept the responsibility of those Instructions. They do not desire to throw on Lord Lytton the burden of sins that do not belong to him. The Government are here to answer for themselves; and they say that the policy which he was instructed to carry out was a just, right, and true policy for the interests of Afghanistan, the interests of India, and the interests of the Empire; and when Lord Lytton was thwarted in carrying it out, it was not from any fault on his part. It was, I regret to believe, because the opportunity had passed. It was "too late." My Lords, it was a most unfortunate thing that it was too late; because I must say for myself—and I know I can say it for my Colleagues and for the noble Viceroy—that anything more repugnant to our feelings than to be obliged to coerce Afghanistan, instead of being able to enter into intimate and friendly relations with her, cannot be imagined. I cannot help saying that he would be a madman who, if he were able to keep a united and friendly Afghanistan in union with him, would do anything to break up the strength and force which that state of things would place at his disposal. That was not our intention, nor is there a sign of it to be found in the Papers—and when our policy was rejected by the Ameer, how as told that we regretted that rejection. Well, in May, 1876, Lord Lytton applied to the Ameer to receive a Mission for the purpose of consultation—a friendly Mission to announce Lord Lytton's accession to the Viceroyalty, and to announce that Her Majesty had assumed the title of Empress of India; and, further, to invite the Ameer to attend the great celebration on the 1st of January on that subject. A fitter subject for such a friendly Mission cannot possibly be conceived. It was opportune, too, as it would have given Lord Lytton the means of ascertaining what was going on in Afghanistan; what the feelings of the Ameer really were towards us; and of communicating to him what our feelings were towards him, and of assuring him in friendly Conference that some better understanding could be arrived at. The Mission was rejected. Why was it rejected? There had been nothing in the conduct of Lord Lytton to cause the Ameer apprehension. He had taken no step to weaken the friendly feeling which had before existed between the Ameer and the Indian Government. No preliminaries to the reception of that Mission were demanded. Some have said that our occupation of Quetta displeased the Ameer, but it had not taken place; and as to Khelat generally there was only what had been done — and rightly done — by the noble Earl (the Earl of Northbrook), with a view to get Beloochistan into something like good order. The Ameer now tells us, in his letter of the 19th November, that it is customary to receive friendly Missions as a matter of course. Yet he rejected this one, and why? Because there was rankling in his mind all that had taken place in 1873, and to which I have referred, and he said so. He was written to again by the Commissioner at Peshawur as to the folly of such a course, and he then suggested that he should send to the Viceroy our own Native Envoy in order that he should state what was the real condition of things in Cabul. My Lords, I cannot conceive anything more conciliatory than Lord Lytton's reception of that message—of which it might be said that it was not very complimentary that the Ameer, who had refused to receive our Mission, should suggest that he should send our own Envoy to confer with the Viceroy. But Lord Lytton did not object; he concurred in the suggestion in the most conciliatory manner. My Lords, the noble Earl the other night complained of the language of Lord Lytton; but that language was used to his own confidential officer—it was spoken in confidence, and was only an expression of his own feelings. Well, our Native Envoy came down. He was one of those capable gentlemen who were relied on for information; but it was found very difficult to squeeze information out of him. It could only be obtained by degrees. It was manifest, however, from more than one piece of evidence, that nothing had been sent by him from Cabul but what the Ameer wished; that the Native Envoys were obliged to show what they were about to send; that they were under duress—in point of fact, one of these Agents says, in effect, that he spoke with the voice of the Ameer, and not with his own. But, at any rate, the grievances alleged by the Vakeel sent from Cabul were all prior to the arrival of Lord Lytton in India. Finally, it was agreed that the Prime Minister of the Ameer should come and confer with the Indian Government, and he came; but nothing could be more unfortunate than the state of mind in which that unfortunate man approached the carrying out of his mission. He trembled at the probable result to himself. This, however, he said not to the Viceroy, but to an intimate friend of his, Dr. Bellew—"The Ameer now has a deep-rooted mistrust of the good faith and sincerity of the British Government, and he has many reasons for this mistrust. The Ameer himself has written of his aversion and apprehension." He, therefore, anticipated that there was very little chance of any satisfactory conclusion being arrived at. Accordingly the Conference brought about no satisfactory conclusion, and it came to an end through the death of the Envoy. An attack has been made upon Lord Lytton for closing it, when he knew that another Envoy was coming. His action was approved of by my noble Friend (the Marquess of Salisbury) on the grounds on which it took place. In the first place, the Ameer's Minister had never expressed his assent to that which Lord Lytton laid down as the essential condition to the very beginning of the Conference; and Sir Lewis Pelly said to the Envoy—

"The acceptance of the principle that British Officers may reside in Afghanistan is absolutely necessary as a preliminary to the commencement of negotiations."—[Afghanistan, No. 1, p. 196.]

It was, indeed, supposed to have been accepted when the Envoy was deputed to meet Sir Lewis Pelly. But throughout those long debates and discussions he continually evaded giving any promise on the subject. Although he did not actually say it, he used language that what was required was not possible; that everything was against it; and that he would be in danger of his life if he agreed to it. Therefore, my Lords, the very basis of the negotiation was at an end; for after the death of the Minister his colleague, the Mir Akhor, admitted that he had no instructions and no power to go on with it. I say, without hesitation, that it would have involved the dignity of this country; it would have involved the dignity of the Government of India, if the Viceroy had not at once put an end to that Mission.

But you will remember, my Lords, that it was still open to the Ameer to make any proposal he thought fit, and my noble Friend near me referred to that fact. Writing to the Viceroy, in reference to the Peshawur Conference, he said—

"In the event, therefore, of the Ameer, within a reasonable time, spontaneously manifesting a desire to come to a friendly understanding with your Excellency on the basis of the terms lately offered to, but declined by, him, his advances should not be rejected."—[Ibid. p. 224.]

And added words to the effect that if he will not approach us, if he rejects our approaches, then he must be responsible for that which he will bring down upon his own head. My Lords, I say that the transaction on the part of Lord Lytton is defensible from beginning to end. It was straightforward. There was no concealment about it—no device to conceal his intention. He told the Ameer what he would do and what he would not do. He said—"I must be supported by Political Officers of my own on the Afghan Frontier, who will tell me what is going on." That there might be no mistake Lord Lytton told the Ameer the terms on which he was prepared to assist him—to acknowledge his dynasty, to be the friend of his friends and the enemy of his enemies. The noble Earl (the Earl of Northbrook) has said that his terms were as large as those in which Lord Lytton made a part of his promises as to assistance in case of attack. But a Treaty does not consist of one clause, but of many which went far beyond the noble Earl's suggestion; but anyone who would indicate to an Afghan Ruler that he would be responsible for his foreign policy without having a voice in that policy would undertake a grave responsibility; and therefore Lord Lytton took means to provide that that policy should be in harmony with his own. The consequence would otherwise have been that you would have pledged your honour to a Potentate who did not understand the limits and conditions imposed upon him, and the time would come when he would be in distress, and you could not, without in his eyes forfeiture of your honour, fail to assist him ; for by dallying about promises which he considered you had made, he might well have cause to conclude that you did not mean to comply with them. So things remained at the close of the Conference, and for a certain period there was no intercourse between Lord Lytton and the Ameer. There was no hostility on our part. Lord Lytton merely said to the Ameer—"What is offered you is as much to your advantage as ours ; we press nothing on you ; you are left to yourself." Now, my Lords, what happened ? The Ameer did not remain by himself. He began more frequently to hold communication with Russia. He began to send, himself, I think, emissaries. Moreover, during the period of the negotiations he was actually attempting to incite the tribes against us—that is to say, he was actually engaged in hostile operations against us. Well, we pardoned him. "We will leave him," we said, "till he is in a better frame of mind." But, instead of getting into a better frame of mind, what did he do ? He waited till a time when hostilities appeared probable between this country and Russia, and then he, who had made it an excuse for not receiving a Mission from us, that he should be compelled, in such case, to receive a Russian Mission, received a Russian Envoy with ostentatious pomp and ceremony. The Duke of Argyll, in his published letter, says he had reason to believe the Ameer had received the Russian Mission with reluctance. I am bound to say we have received no official information to that effect. Private letters which I have seen, and Russian newspapers, tend to show, on the contrary, that the Russian General was treated with actually embarrassing ceremony—more like a King than an Envoy. He was received with Royal salutes and attended by what was really an army, and everything was done by Shere Ali to show the general that he was most welcome. It has been set forth in the Russian papers, as from correspondents who were present, that his reception was of a magnificent character. So far, therefore, from this Russian Mission being forced on the Ameer, the Russian Envoy was accepted and entertained to the best of the Ameer's ability. Well, my Lords, I do not hesitate to say that if the Indian Government had said that that conduct on the part of the Ameer was a distinct declaration of hostility against us, she would have been perfectly justified. The Ameer had all along been aware of Russia's pledge not to interfere in the internal affairs of Afghanistan, and that Afghanistan was without the scope and sphere of Russian influence. Yet, knowing this, he refused our Mission without any reason, except, perhaps, this—in order that a Russian Mission might come. The noble Duke in his letter says he is one of those who would never allow Afghanistan to be subordinate to Russia. No ; there may be room for Russia and England in Central Asia ; but I say distinctly there is not room for England and Russia in Afghanistan. The noble Earl (Earl Grey) who, when a Russian Mission is actually at Cabul, can anticipate the lapse of 50 or 100 years before the question of danger to India can arise is, indeed, a consistent disciple of masterly inactivity. Were we to blind ourselves to facts, as he does, we might hear when it was "too late" the warning cry—"The Philistines be upon you ;" and although we might, in our giant struggles, then bring ruin upon others, we should also bring it certainly upon ourselves. The Russian Mission having been received at Cabul, the Viceroy sent a message to the Ameer demanding the admission of a friendly Mission, coupling with it a letter of condolence couched in the most proper terms on the death of his Highness's son and heir, Abdoollah Jan. My Lords, there is in the East no greater insult than to delay an answer to a letter of condolence. But it was long before that letter was answered ; and to the Native mind in India the delay was an insult of a character which would in itself have justified hostilities. ["Oh, oh !"] I say in the Native mind of India. I do not mean to say it would have justified hostilities from the European point of view, nor was it so regarded by us. Anybody who has been connected with India, even so short a time as I have been, knows how differently from ourselves the Eastern mind views transactions of this kind. Well, my Lords, we demanded the admission of a friendly Mission ; we insisted upon it ; and we have been told that this was an outrage to the Ameer. It so happens, however, that this is not the first time Viceroys have insisted upon demands on the Ameer. The noble Earl himself on one occasion—the Mission to the Chief of Wakhan—thought proper to insist upon the admission of his Envoy through Afghanistan. A great deal has been said in this country about the “independence” of Afghanistan; but the word on English lips as applied to Afghanistan is absurd and misleading. Afghanistan has constantly been asking our protection. The noble Earl himself has admitted that it is impossible to interpret neutrality in a strict sense in relation to Afghanistan. And how did he view the question of “insistence” when it arose? He writes—

“When we had reason to suppose that Shere Ali intended to demur to our reasonable request, that our Envoy should pass through Afghanistan with a communication from us to the Meer of Wakhan, we insisted upon compliance with our wishes. We should adopt the same course again under similar circumstances.”—[Afghanistan, No. 1, p. 135.]

To “insist” means, if necessary, to resort to force of arms, and this is what the noble Earl who has been held up as the advocate of masterly inactivity was on the occasion referred to prepared, I presume, to do in the event of a passage being denied to the British Envoy through the Ameer’s dominions. The step we have taken is, therefore, not so very different from that which the noble Earl opposite—that great advocate of masterly inactivity—was himself prepared to take in similar circumstances. We asked for the admission of a friendly Mission. It was refused, and refused by force of arms and with threats. Sir Neville Chamberlain, of all men, was the least disposed to interfere in the affairs of Afghanistan. “No man”—to use his own words—“was more desirous than I to preserve peace and secure friendly relations.” Yet what does he add? That it was plainly the Ameer’s intention to drive them into a corner, and that they had either to obey all his behests or to stand upon their own rights. Nothing could have been more distinctly humiliating to the dignity of the British Crown and nation. “But for the tact displayed by Major Cavagnari at one period of the interview,” writes Sir Neville Chamberlain, “even the lives of the British officers and of their small escort would have been endangered,” and “the Mission failed because of the Ameer’s indifference to any indignity imposed by him on the British Government, while he himself would not tolerate anything which could be strained to bear even the appearance of a slight to his kingly privileges.”

My Lords, we now come to the time when everyone in India thought an actual declaration of war necessary. On the other hand, Her Majesty’s Government at home, though they thought it would be justifiable, felt so keenly the importance of the occasion that they resolved to make one last attempt to bring the Ameer to a proper frame of mind and show him where his true interests lay. The Ultimatum was accordingly sent. Having arrived at this point it was no longer for us to talk of unknown and unascertained friendly relations. It was absolutely essential that we should inform the Ameer of the minimum we should insist upon. That minimum was, first an apology for the repulse of the Mission. The noble Lord opposite (Lord Lawrence), in one of his letters to the newspapers, said that no doubt Shere Ali would have made us an apology if we had consented to withdraw the Mission. But, my Lords, that would not have been an apology by him, but by us. We required an apology from the Ameer for having stopped by force of arms a friendly Mission. The Mission was not accompanied by an armed force. So careful, indeed, was Lord Lytton to avoid the appearance of a movement of troops when proposing the Mission, that he even held back the change of reliefs. The Mission was escorted by a force of little over 200 men, which was not so many as the Ameer had himself brought to the Conference at Umballa. Such a body of men could not have threatened the integrity or independence of Afghanistan; it was no more than sufficient as a protection for our Envoy. Accompanying the Mission were Native gentlemen, to show the Ameer that India practically was represented by us, and that it was not merely a British Mission, but that we came with the assent of those in whom we take so deep an interest in India. And, my Lords, let me here say, by the way, if any one imputes unfriendliness to the Native Princes of India, let him look at what these Princes have offered us. They have offered to be at our side in the campaign; and shame ought to cause a blush to rise to the cheek of any man who imputes disloyalty to them at such a time and on such an occasion. Why should the Afghan Representative, who was a soldier, and bound to have obeyed orders, have said that but for his friendship for Major Cavagnari, he would have fired on the Mission? Why should he have had such orders? Your Lordships may suppose that the Mission was at the time in Afghanistan, but that is an absolute delusion—Ali Musjid does not belong to the Ameer—it belongs to the Kyberees tribes, the Afredees and others; and therefore the Mission had not entered the Ameer's territory when this hostile action was threatened against us. The Mission, as it was directed, immediately withdrew, and the Viceroy was informed of its withdrawal. When we are spoken of as making an unnecessary war, it must be remembered that there was something more involved than our own honour as affected by the affront we had received; we had pledged our word to the Kyberees tribes that if they gave us a safe conduct to Ali Musjid we would hold ourselves responsible for their safety; and it appears that the house of a Chief had already been burnt. The Kyberees called upon us to fulfil our pledges, and even if they had not, it was our duty to take such steps that they should not be placed in danger. Therefore, when you talk of the non necessity for war, we say that it became necessary on account of our obligations to them, as I think it was also necessary on account of the affront which had been offered to ourselves. The Ultimatum is sent, and the 20th of November is fixed upon as the date before which the Ameer's reply must be received. The term allowed left eight or nine clear days to the Ameer to prepare his reply before despatching his messenger. No reply came by the 21st, and, of course, the troops had by that time advanced to the Frontier to fulfil the duties imposed upon them. How they have fulfilled them has been admirably described by the noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville) on a former occasion; but I should ill discharge my duty as Secretary of State for India if I did not add my tribute to that which has been already paid by saying that praise is well merited by those who have achieved such great results with such small loss of life and with such moderate means. We might have sent large armies and have been involved in extravagant expenditure; but the officers made only such demands as they thought necessary for the purpose. India has had all our resources placed at her disposal; but she has been content with what she had; and Indian soldiers have added another laurel to the Crown which Indian soldiers have so well supported.

My Lords, since these events a long letter has come from the Ameer; something has been said by anonymous slanderers that the Government were in possession of this letter before Parliament met on Thursday last. My Lords, that is an absolute fabrication. It is stated, and reasoned upon, as if it were an ascertained and known fact; and I think it is only my duty to give that absolute denial. The Government had received notice that a letter had been addressed to Major Cavagnari, and was waiting for him—that the messenger was waiting for him to give it to him; and, as it will be remembered, we had announced in the Papers that we had heard of it, and therefore there was not the least concealment on our part. The telegraphic summary was received on the Thursday night; it was deciphered by about 1 o'clock on Friday morning; and it was delivered to me early that morning with an intimation that the full text would follow rapidly afterwards. Therefore, we determined—and I think justifiably—that we would wait for the full text before publishing anything, and the full text arrived yesterday. It was a very long business to decipher it; I did not receive it until about 3 o'clock in the afternoon; and I lost no time in making arrangements for its being in your Lordships' hands and in the newspapers this morning. I think this is a complete answer to the fictions circulated in order to discredit the Government.

My Lords, that letter is no answer to the Ultimatum. If it had come on the 20th of November, according to the instructions which my Colleagues and I had given to the Viceroy the troops must have advanced. It is an evasive reply; it makes no apology; it does not give any undertaking with respect to the Kyberees; it says nothing with regard to admitting a permanent Mission; it is in character such a letter as would not be sent by one friendly authority to another. We read these things too much with European eyes; but this must be read by Eastern eyes, because it is only in that way we can discern the real meaning which underlies these apparently friendly expressions. We have arrived at this point; and I say the time has gone by for "masterly inactivity." The time has gone by for verbal engagements; the time has come for distinct, definite, perfect understandings, whether it be with those West of Afghanistan, or with Afghanistan itself. I wish—as everyone would—to speak with respect of one of the great countries which forms part of the concert of the nations of Europe; I would not say anything that would be offensive or disrespectful to that country or its Government. It has been driven on by events I dare say, and by necessity, to effect larger seizures of Asiatic territory than it originally contemplated; and with its advances it has continued to give us assurances, solemn pledges reiterated again and again, and not even denied now; and it has admitted that this particular Russian Mission was sent to Cabul because of the apprehension of war between us. Be it so; it proves this—that the weak point in our armour was considered to be Afghanistan; it proves that they thought if they could turn our watch-dog, the Ameer, into a bloodhound against us, it would be a great advantage to them—and, therefore, my Lords, I say that if you have a faithless porter at your door you must dispose of him, and take the charge of your door from him. We are driven to this step.

My Lords, it is no light matter that will make any man carry the country into a war; but, my Lords, our honour, our safety, and our interests alike impelled us to this course. We have been driven to it step by step; and the day has come when there can be no paltering with our duty. I admit that within these Eastern nations you may be compelled from time to time to make further advances than those that were originally contemplated. Be it so, but let us now enter into some conditions about which there can be no mistake; let us say distinctly that in Afghanistan we must be paramount and supreme; that in Afghanistan, holding the doors of India, we must either have a friendly porter or we must take the keys ourselves. The objects of this war, then, are those of justice and security. It is a just war, because we are not bound to wait attacks until an enemy shall come upon us in force at his own time; when we see what is coming upon us we have the right to make preparations and act so as to avert it. Such is our course, my Lords; and I am sorry that an Amendment should be moved on this occasion by my noble Friend. He has on all occasions said that he has endeavoured to avoid giving a Party aspect to Indian questions, and when India becomes a Parliamentary question in that sense the day of our Empire will be drawing rapidly to a close. You must have a despotic Government in India; you must make the Executive Government responsible for India. I am far from saying that Parliament shall not exercise its right to speak of what we have done; I am not complaining of it. I only say I deeply regret that in the midst of a war it should be thought that any occasion had arisen for it. I ask you—our opponents—what you would have done if you had known that a Russian Mission had been received with honour at Cabul? Would you have asked the Ameer to let you send a friendly Mission to explain what the relations between him and you ought to be; or would you have submitted, with the retiring modesty which a noble Lord exhibited on a former occasion, when he wished the banner of England to retire behind the Indus? That is not the way in which India was won, or the way in which India is to be held. My Lords, India was looking on. The people saw us at the gates of Afghanistan demanding admittance; they saw us repulsed; what would be, what was, the effect on the Indian mind and Indian feelings? That is a matter of some importance to us who have to govern the country. They thought that we were hesitating too long, and that we were afraid; that there was something behind Afghanistan we durst not meet. This was in their minds, and if we had retired they would have been justified in supposing that such fears were entertained. We call upon you, as we call upon the country, to support us in the policy we have adopted for the honour, safety, and welfare of Her Majesty and Her Dominions. The noble Viscount concluded by moving his Resolution.

Moved to resolve, That Her Majesty having directed a military expedition of Her forces charged upon Indian revenues to be despatched against the Ameer of Afghanistan, this House consents that the revenues of India shall be applied to defray the expenses of the military operations which may be carried on beyond the external frontiers of Her Majesty's Indian Possessions.—(The Viscount Cranbrook.)

VISCOUNT HALIFAX*: I am anxious, at the outset of the observations which I shall address to your Lordships, to express my satisfaction that the debate of Thursday last will have cleared off all questions of a personal or Party character, and I am glad to hear from my noble Friend who has just sat down his wish to avoid anything of the kind. He has only done me justice in saying that I have always disclaimed the introduction of any Party views into Indian questions; and although he is inclined to attribute a Party view to the proceeding of this evening, I can assure him that I have been influenced by no such feeling. The question of the Frontier policy of India is one of such importance, and the recent change in that policy may lead to such serious consequences, that it is above all Party considerations. I agree with my noble Friend that it is of the greatest importance to us that a strong friendly Government should be established in Afghanistan, and that we should have a paramount influence at Cabul; but there is a serious difference between us as to the course of conduct on our part by which that result can best be attained. My noble Friend commenced his review of past transactions from the Afghan War of 1839, which I well remember, as well as himself. It originated in an apprehension of the danger to our Indian Empire which might result from the possible consequences of the presence of two Russian officers at Cabul. We undertook to set up a Ruler there on whose friendship we could depend. It was a great mistake, for which we paid dearly in the greatest disaster which ever befell our arms in India. The only permanent result of the war was an intense hatred of the British name, and jealousy and fear of the British power in the mind of every inhabitant of Afghanistan. From that time forward the object of every Viceroy of India, up to the time of the present Viceroy, and supported by every Indian Minister, has been to endeavour to remove all such feeling from the minds of the Afghans, to conciliate their Rulers, and to make them our firm and steadfast friends; and the result has been that for 35 years peace and a fairly good understanding have been preserved. Soon after the time, however, when the noble Lord now Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs assumed charge of the India Office, directions were given to my noble Friend (Lord Northbrook), then Viceroy of India, to raise what has always been 'a burning question in Afghanistan, and to press on the Ameer of Cabul the residence of British officers in that country. My noble Friend remonstrated, and during his Viceroyalty nothing was done. In 1876, however, Lord Lytton proceeded to India to carry out a new Frontier policy. It would be easy to show that this was so, if it were needful; but we have a statement to that effect in words of his own in a despatch of March, 1877, which will be found in the Khelat Papers. Lord Lytton says in that despatch—

"The present Viceroy, having had the advantage before leaving England of personal communication with your Lordship on the general subject of our Frontier relations, was strongly impressed by the importance of endeavouring to deal with them simultaneously, as indivisible parts of a single Imperial question, mainly dependent for its solution on the foreign policy of Her Majesty's Government."

The Frontier policy of the Indian Government was no longer, it seems, to be a policy for the interests of India, but was to depend on the general foreign policy of Her Majesty's Government. This new line of policy was initiated by Lord Lytton, and it has resulted in war. The old line of policy gave us 35 years of peace; 30 months of the new has plunged us into war. Surely, my Lords, such a change of policy and such results are well worthy of the consideration of Parliament; and I may be justified in bringing them to your Lordships' attention without being supposed to be actuated by Party motives. We are now at war. Why are we at war? I will take "in succession our alleged causes of complaint against the Ameer, none of which—indeed, not all of which together—seem to me to afford any sufficient justification of our invasion of his territory. I have said, my Lords, that the question of the residence of British officers in Afghanistan has been a burning question with the Afghans, not with the Ruler only, but with the Chiefs and the people, for years. My noble Friend has alluded to the Treaty of 1857, concluded between Dost Mahomed and my noble Friend, then Sir John Lawrence. At that time Dost Mahomed had agreed to receive a British officer even at Cabul; but on going back to his camp and meeting his Chiefs, they were so violently opposed to it that he was compelled to retract his consent, and my noble Friend was satisfied with his reasons. But, with the consent of the Ameer and his Chiefs, British officers were allowed to reside temporarily at other places. Amongst others, the present Sir Herbert Lumsden resided for a time at Candahar. Now, he went there with the full consent of the Afghan Rulers; he went there to dispense money provided by us for the pay of the Afghan troops—and how were the British officers treated? In a Minute of Sir John Lawrence's, some time afterwards, he says—

“Our officers were all this time in a most precarious position—scarcely for a day were their lives safe. Under plea of taking care of them, from their first arrival they were surrounded by spies, and could not move a stone's throw from their house without an escort, who watched and denounced any man who might speak to them. At last matters got so bad that they were glad to leave Candahar. General Lumsden, who was at the head of this Mission, more than once assured me, after his return, that he had better means of gaining information on Afghan and Central Asian affairs at Peshawur.”

If such was the position of British officers when residing with the full consent of the Afghans, what would it be if they were forced on an unwilling people? We learn, too, that the objection is not that of the Ameer alone, but is as fully entertained by his Chiefs and people; and that it is unjust now to hold Shere Ali as solely responsible for refusing assent to the residence of British officers in Afghanistan. At the time of the Umballa Conference with Lord Mayo the question was again discussed, and Lord Mayo again acquiesced in the objections stated by Shere Ali. So the matter remained till the receipt by Lord Northbrook of Lord Salisbury's despatches in 1875, to press the question on the Ameer. On the receipt of those directions Lord Northbrook assembled the Frontier officers, who from their knowledge of the dispositions and feelings of the Afghans had the best means of forming an opinion. They unanimously agreed that it would be most unwise to press the question on the Ameer. Lord Northbrook brought the question before his Council, and with their unanimous concurrence remonstrated against Lord Salisbury's directions. There are two paragraphs of this despatch which state so clearly the objections to the course enjoined by Lord Salisbury, that I will take the liberty of reading them to your Lordships. Lord Northbrook says—

“It is in the highest degree improbable that the Ameer will yield a hearty consent to the location of British Officers in Afghanistan which the Mission is intended to accomplish; and to place our Officers on the Ameer's Frontier without his hearty consent would, in our opinion, be a most impolitic and dangerous movement. Setting aside the consideration of the personal risk to which under such circumstances the Agents would be exposed and the serious political consequences that would ensue from their being insulted or attacked, their position would be entirely useless. They would be dependent for their information on untrustworthy sources. They would be surrounded by spies under the pretext of guarding them or administering to their wants. Persons approaching or visiting them would be watched and removed; and though nothing might be done ostensibly which could be complained of as an actual breach of friendship, the Agents would be checked on every hand, and would soon find their position both humiliating and useless. Such was the experience of Major Todd at Herat in 1839 when his supplies of money failed. Such was the experience of Colonel Lumsden when he went to Candahar in 1857 as the dispenser of a magnificent subsidy. A condition of things like this could not exist for any length of time without leading to altered relations and possibly even in the long run to a rupture with Afghanistan, and thereby defeating the object which Her Majesty's Government have in view.”—[Afghanistan, No. 1, p. 155.]

This was the last act of Lord Northbrook's Government; and so the matter rested. Up to that time an uniform course had been pursued of not pressing the residence of British officers in Afghanistan. Not that it was not a measure desirable in itself, but that it would be useless without the consent of the Ameer, and ought not to be pressed upon an unwilling Afghan Government. My noble Friend opposite has taken great pains to prove that the alienation of the Ameer is owing to various steps taken by Lord Northbrook. I venture to think that there is no sufficient reason for such an opinion; and in confirmation of this view I will read an extract from a letter of Sir Henry Norman's, which has just appeared in the public papers. Sir Henry Norman is an Indian officer with a great knowledge of Indian affairs, both military and political. He served in the Mutiny and on the Frontier, and he closed his career in India as Member of the Governor General's Council, and is now a Member of the Council of India. He says—

"My opinion was, and is, that up to the time of Lord Northbrook's departure the Ameer had no feeling of hostility to us, though he was somewhat out of temper, and was disquieted by writings which more or less pointed at measures distasteful to him. Any real resentment he may have subsequently shown is entirely due, according to my belief, to measures taken from April, 1876, to the present time."

Such, my Lords, was the state of matters at the close of what I venture to call the conciliatory policy. Lord Lytton took a different tone, and we are now witnessing the results. On his arrival he despatched a Native officer to Cabul to propose to Shere Ali to receive a Mission at Cabul, which the Ameer declined; and after some correspondence and communications which the noble Lord opposite has partly stated, and to which it is unnecessary to refer further, the Native Agent of the Indian Government who resides at Cabul, met the Viceroy at Simla, to communicate to him the views of the Ameer and to receive those of the Viceroy, in order that they might be communicated to the Ameer. This meeting took place in October, 1876. I must say, my Lords, that the tone adopted towards the Ameer was such as must have been intolerable to a Ruler who considered himself entitled to be treated as an independent Prince. The assent of the Ameer to the residence of British officers in Afghanistan was declared to be a preliminary sine quâ non to any further negotiations; and I now quote the Viceroy's own words to the Agent, as reported in the official account. The Viceroy regretted the view which the Ameer took of his own position, and went on to say—

"The moment we cease to regard Afghanistan as a friendly and firmly allied State, what is there to prevent us from providing for the security of our Frontier by an understanding with Russia, which might have the effect of wiping Afghanistan out of the map altogether? If the Ameer does not desire to come to a speedy understanding with us, Russia does; and she desires it at his expense."—[Afghanistan, No. 1, p. 183.]

And a little further that—

"If the Ameer became our enemy we could break him as a reed."—[Ibid.]

There are other expressions still more insulting which were quoted by my noble Friend (Earl Granville) on Thursday night, but which I will not repeat. This was on the 10th of October. My noble Friend opposite (Viscount Cranbrook) talks of this as a sort of confidential conversation between the Viceroy and the Agent. It was nothing of the sort. At a subsequent interview three days later, on the 13th of October, the Viceroy said to the Agent that—

"He had treated the Vakeel confidentially, and had stated, without reserve, all that he had in his mind. He had no doubt that the Vakeel would convey this faithfully to the Ameer."—[Ibid. p. 185.]

We do not, of course, know how much of this conversation the Agent did really communicate to the Ameer; but, at all events, he sent his Minister, Syud Noor Mahomed, to meet Sir Lewis Pelly at Peshawar. At this Conference it was again declared that the Ameer's consent to the residence of British officers in Afghanistan was a preliminary sine quâ non to all further proceeding. It seems as if at one time the Ameer was not indisposed to give a reluctant assent, yielding to necessity and pleading his helplessness, but the old hereditary Afghan feeling was too strong, and it is touching to read the appeals of the Envoy. One of our officers at Peshawur was a Dr. Bellew, who had been associated with Syud Noor Mahomed in the Seistan arbitration, and was his personal friend. He was a medical man also, and it would appear that the Syud was almost on his death-bed. He appealed to Dr. Bellew as his friend on the 28th of January, 1877, in the following terms:—

"He (the Ameer) is now convinced that to allow British officers to reside in his country will be to relinquish his own authority, and the lasting disgrace thus brought on the Afghan people will be attached to his name, and he would sooner perish than submit to this."—[Ibid. p. 195.]

Again, on the 7th of February, he said to Dr. Bellew—

"You must not impose upon us a burden which we cannot bear, and if you overload us the responsibility rests with you."—[Ibid. p. 202.]

Dr. Bellew interposed here, and asked the Cabul Envoy what the burden was which he alluded to?

"He at once replied, 'The residence of British officers on the Frontier of Afghanistan.'" — [Ibid.]

And on the 12th of February, at an interview with Sir Lewis Pelly, he said—

"In the first place, the people of Afghanistan have a dread of this proposal, and it is firmly fixed in their minds, and deeply rooted in their hearts, that, if Englishmen or other Europeans once set foot in their country, it will sooner or later pass out of their hands." — [Ibid. p. 208.]

It was all in vain; there was no relaxation on the part of the Indian Government, and it was ultimately declared that all promises and assurances of support and assistance were withdrawn; that the Treaty of 1855, of the adequacy of which the Ameer had frequently complained, was the only engagement between India and Afghanistan; and, further, that the Viceroy would take steps for the rectification of the North-West Frontier without reference to the Ameer. The Cabul Envoy died at Peshawur; and though Lord Lytton knew that his successor was on his way, and that it was reported that the Ameer was prepared to concede everything, he directed Sir Lewis Pelly to close the Conference and to leave Peshawur. An insulting letter was written by Sir Lewis Pelly—which I believe may be taken as being, in fact, from the Viceroy to the Ameer, in which occurs a most extraordinary passage, which I can only understand as a piece of bitter irony. Your Lordships will remember how the residence of British officers had been pressed; and I think your Lordships will be as much surprised as I was at reading the following sentence in that letter:—

"The proposal of this arrangement was regarded by the British Government as a great concession; and that the British Government will most assuredly not allow its officers to undertake duties on behalf of Afghanistan involving a residence in any part of that country, unless their presence there is specially invited and cordially welcomed by the Ruler of it, whoever he may be, and their personal safety and comfort solemnly guaranteed by the same authority." — [Ibid. p. 216.]

So ended the Conference at Peshawur. The Native Agent who represented the Government of India was subsequently recalled from Cabul, and all the accustomed and ordinary means of diplomatic intercourse with the Ameer were closed.

Viscount Halifax

I come now to the rectification of the North-West Frontier referred to in the later communications to the Ameer. It is not explained in the Papers; but it received an explanation in the speech at the Mansion House of the noble Lord at the head of Her Majesty's Government. He stated that it was requisite to obtain a scientific Frontier, and that the unsatisfactory character of the existing Frontier had been a source of anxiety to former Viceroy. I am sure that the noble Lord would not make such a statement unless he believed that he had good authority for it; but I confess that I am at a loss to imagine what such authority can be. Our present Frontier is what was the Frontier of the Sikh Kingdom under Runjeet Sing; and when in the time of Lord Dalhousie we annexed the Sikh dominions, the Sikh Frontier against Afghanistan became ours. This, of course, was the case under Lord Dalhousie. Now, I was in constant and confidential communication with Lord Dalhousie, with his successor, Lord Canning, with Lord Elgin, and with my noble Friend near me (Lord Lawrence), four successive Viceroys, and from none of them did I ever hear a word upon the subject. I have never heard that any anxiety was expressed by Lord Mayo, and my noble Friend (Lord Northbrook) has never expressed any. Unless, therefore, the noble Lord opposite has some authority for his statement of which I, at least, have never heard, I must be permitted to believe that no such anxiety has been felt or expressed by any Viceroy since our Frontier has been what it is. I come now to the military authority in favour of advancing our North-West Frontier. The only one given in these Afghanistan Papers is the opinion of Lord Napier of Magdala. It was not his original opinion. He had recorded an opinion in the opposite sense. But, my Lords, on looking carefully at this opinion now given, it seems to refer almost entirely to the Frontier of Scinde and the occupation of Quetta; and I am inclined to think that his previous recorded opinion referred to the same question, when a proposal from Bombay on this matter was submitted to the Government of India, but not concurred in by them. But in 1867 this whole question was formally brought before the Government of India, in the time of

Lord Lawrence, and Minutes against any extension of the Frontier were recorded by himself, Sir Henry Norman, Sir Henry Durand, Sir George Yule, and Sir William Mansfield, then Commander-in-Chief in India, three of them being experienced military men. In addition to these authorities we have recently seen the opinions against any extension of the Frontier entertained by Sir Herbert Edwardes, whose military talent and intimate knowledge of the Frontier no one can doubt; of General Sir John Adye, a Queen's officer of high character, and who himself served on the Frontier in the Umbeylah campaign; and I find, somewhat to my surprise, that Sir Henry Green, one of the foremost advocates of the extension of the Frontier of Scinde, is opposed to the extension of that portion of the Frontier which borders on Afghanistan. With this preponderance of military opinion, so far as we have the means of knowing, against any extension of the North-Western Frontier, it seems now, however, that, regardless of the rights of the Ameer, we are prepared to take possession of part of his territory. It appears to me that any annexation of territory in Europe which has been condemned by universal public opinion—that of the Frontier of the Rhine, the taking possession of Sleswick, or any other such proceeding—may be equally justified. But, indeed, the case is worse against us in this proceeding in India; for by the Treaty of 1855, which we acknowledge still to be in force, we are bound to respect the territories of the Ameer. We have repeatedly given the assurance that we wanted nothing from Afghanistan; even in the last proceedings we declared that we should take nothing over which the Ameer had jurisdiction; and if, in spite of all these engagements and assurances, we commit such an act of unjustifiable and unprincipled spoliation, what becomes of our character for good faith, on which our position in India so essentially depends? My noble Friend opposite, indeed, asserts that Ali Musjid is not in Afghan territory. Whose officer commanded, whose troops garrisoned Ali Musjid? Shere Ali's. And when occupied, as my noble Friend said, by the Khyberees, it has been only at times, and then under the authority of the Ameer of Cabul. Who occupy the northern side of the Pass? The

Momunds; and when a British officer was murdered by some of them a few years ago, to whom did we apply for redress?—to Shere Ali. Surely that is recognizing his jurisdiction. Whose troops are we fighting in the Koorum Valley? Those of Shere Ali. The inhabitants [of that valley are undoubtedly subjects of the Ameer. The intermediate tribes—Afreedeas and others—do not pay much obedience even to their own Chiefs; but their allegiance is due, such as it is, to the Chiefs of Cabul, whose dominions, till the conquest of the Sikhs, extended to the Indus and beyond it. I cannot suppose for a moment that the Afghans, or indeed any persons in India, will consider our annexation of territory beyond our North-West Frontier as anything but an encroachment on Afghanistan. I will now advert to the complaint made of the presence of Russian Agents, and of the reception of a Russian Mission at Cabul. In former years it has been the custom for letters to be exchanged between the Russian officers in Turkestan and the Ameer. It was constantly done in Lord Mayo's time, and Lord Northbrook's. Sometimes the Indian Government was consulted as to what answers should be sent from Cabul, sometimes they were not; but no objection was ever entertained to this Correspondence, and on one occasion, if I remember rightly, Lord Mayo expressed his approbation of it. It would seem, however, as if, latterly, the arrival of persons claiming to be Russian Agents had been more frequent, and their presence at Cabul more constant than heretofore. We must, however, be cautious in placing too much confidence in these reports. Not only the Russian Government, but the officers in Turkestan have denied having sent such Agents; and in such an atmosphere of intrigue and deceit as surrounds an Eastern Court it is impossible to be sure of the truth, which, indeed, we shall probably never know. The Ameer's Envoy stated at Peshawur that at that time their presence had been a source of embarrassment to the Ameer. In 1878, however, a formal Mission was undoubtedly sent from Turkestan to Cabul; and perhaps we might have had reason to complain that this was a breach of the engagements of Russia, and of her assurance that she considered Afghanistan as beyond the sphere of her influence. But had we not given Russia some justification for her course? I will only allude to what appeared in an Indian newspaper, supposed often to represent the views of the Government there, in which it was said that "It was now no longer a secret that if war had broken out between England and Russia we should not have remained on the defensive in India."

At any rate, it is undeniable that we brought Indian troops to the Mediterranean, with the view of taking part in the struggle with Russia if war, as at one time seemed not improbable, had broken out. Was it unnatural that the Russians should take measures with a view to finding employment for the Indian troops at home? The Mission did not leave Turkestan till there had been ample time for orders to be transmitted by telegram from St. Petersburg for its departure after the arrival of the Indian troops in Egypt. The Indian troops arrived, I think, before the middle of April, and the Mission did not leave Samarcand till the 10th of June. Explanations have been asked for from the Russian Government, which has stated that the Mission was despatched under circumstances which happily no longer exist, and it appears by the Central Asian Papers that Lord Salisbury is satisfied with their explanations. But this cause of complaint, whatever it may be as to the Russians, does not apply to the Ameer. He had not entered into any such engagements. And how did we stand with him at the time when their Mission was received? I have already stated that long before this we had withdrawn our promises of support, broken off all intercourse with the Ameer, and withdrawn our Agent from Cabul. There was, besides, another circumstance which we know weighed heavily on his mind—the occupation of Quetta. In 1875, Sir Henry Rawlinson, a Member of the Indian Council, had written a Memorandum on Afghan and Russian affairs, in which he advocated the occupation of Herat and Candahar—leaving him in undivided authority only over Cabul and the Northern and Eastern portions of Afghanistan, and the first step to this occupation was to be the taking possession of Quetta. Lord Salisbury thought it necessary to state, in one of his despatches to Lord Lytton, that English newspapers and books on Indian affairs were rapidly translated and forwarded for the information of the Ameer, and it is well known that the Ameer had seen the translation of Sir Henry Rawlinson's book. Now, was it not most natural that the Ameer should consider this occupation of Quetta as the practical commencement of the scheme which would deprive him of about one-third of the best part of his dominions? Lord Northbrook had refused to occupy Quetta. One of the earliest steps, however, of Lord Lytton, coming out fresh from England, and who might, therefore, fairly be supposed to be imbued with the notions of the India Office in England, was to direct the occupation of Quetta; and in November, 1876, an Engineer officer was employed in laying out sites for barracks and public buildings, and it was actually occupied by troops before the meeting with Sir Lewis Pelly at Peshawur. Is it very surprising that after the language held, and the conduct of the Indian Government to him at the close of Sir Lewis Pelly's Conference, and with the threatening of this apparent danger to his territories, which was paraded and magnified by the Indian Press, that the Ameer should not have turned a deaf ear to the Russian Envoy? Is there no excuse for a man whom we had so treated? I do not propose to say a word further as to the justice or fairness of our conduct, or of the war. I am anxious only to deal with considerations affecting India; and I ask, would it not have been more politic and wiser on our part to have endeavoured, even then, to re-establish friendly relations with the Ameer than to throw him into the arms of Russia? If Russia is so hostile and so formidable to us in Asia; if it is necessary to take such precautions to guard against the danger of her action against us; can there be greater insanity on our part than to alienate the Power which would be our best Ally against her? What could Russia, for her own interest, wish more than that we should engage ourselves in hostilities with the Afghans, and waste our strength and resources in a struggle from which military honour would be the only gain? How truly applicable to such conduct on our part is the line of the Latin poet—

"Hoc Ithacus velit et magno mercentur Atridæ."

Sir Neville Chamberlain's Mission, as to the reception of which at Cabul no answer had been received, was, as might have been expected, stopped at the mouth of the Pass, but without any insult, as was stated by the noble Lord who moved the Address. An Ultimatum in no very courteous terms was sent to the Ameer, and before any answer was received, with what I should term precipitate haste our troops entered Afghanistan. Conciliation has ceased. Coercion has begun. Where will it end? We have had military success, as was sure to be the case. I have never entertained the least doubt of our being able to go where we chose—to drive Shere Ali from Cabul, to occupy Candahar and Herat; but, my Lords, when we have obtained the military success, wherever and whenever we may stop, our real difficulty begins. I approach with some hesitation what may be called a military question, and so in part it is; but it is also a political and a financial question. Our present Frontier in the plain being deemed insufficient, we are to go into the hills, and amongst them to occupy some line as a "scientific" Frontier. Now, my Lords, I can understand if we were dealing with a single line of mountains—such as the Pyrenees or the Balkans—that by occupying the Passes in such a chain we might obtain what military men would call a scientific Frontier. But there is no such single range beyond our present Frontier. The country is described by a most competent military authority as a vast tract of mountains of the most rugged and desolate character, sometimes attaining the height of 10,000 feet, running down in successive ridges from the great mass of the Hindoo Koosh, intersected by narrow valleys and defiles, with difficult Passes between them, and across which it is impossible to lay down a clear and definite line of Frontier. To whatever line we choose to advance, we must occupy and govern the country behind it. If our posts and the escorts which bring up their supplies—all of which must come from the rear—are weak, they will be liable to be cut off. If they are strong, the expense will be very considerable. If our posts are in the valleys in order to command the water and such roads as are there, they will be overlooked from the surrounding heights, and if on the hill sides, the supply of water may be deficient and the communications will be difficult. All this was experienced in the operations at the Umbeylah Pass in 1863; and, indeed, the experience of that operation is a warning against engaging in this mountain warfare. It was at that time desirable to punish a band of plunderers known as the Sitana fanatics, who had established themselves at no great distance from our border. A force was despatched for this purpose, and in order to reach them it had to pass through some territory belonging to the Bonairs. We had no hostility to them, and they were told so; but, nevertheless, they, and the neighbouring tribes, rose in force as soon as we had entered their district, and held us in check for a considerable time in the Pass. At last, fortunately for us, they assembled in force in the valley, and we attacked and defeated them. So little real hostility was there, that they actually aided us in the object of our expedition; but so inveterate was their feeling against the foot of the foreigner on their soil that, as we retired, they destroyed the traces of the route by which we had advanced. If such was the feeling against us for our temporary presence, what will it be if we advance for the purpose of permanent occupation? The country surrounding the Khyber Pass is inhabited by the Afreedees and other tribes, numbering about 100,000 men, of the fiercest, most intractable, and semi-barbarous of the Afghans. They live in a constant state of feud. Robbery and murder are of daily occurrence. How will you punish such crimes, which you cannot permit in the districts which you govern? The guilty persons will escape into the next valley, will be aided by its inhabitants, and there will be frequent incursions of these people, who are admirably fitted for mountain warfare, and being bigoted Mahomedans will be animated by an intense fanatical hatred of the infidel foreigner who seeks to reduce them to obedience, to law and order. You will be compelled to advance from valley to valley, much in the same way as I understand is now going on in the hills on your North-East Frontier against tribes much less formidable than the Afghans. Now, my Lords, assuming that, even in spite of our annexation of part of his territory, friendly relations have been established at first with the Ameer, such proceedings as these will render it impossible for him to maintain relations of friendship, or to avoid supporting the tribes whom you attack. The national feeling of his people and their religious fanaticism will force him to do so. You will be brought into collision at Cabul. What may be the result cannot be predicted; but whatever it may be, anarchy, a puppet Ruler supported by us, or actual annexation, will equally involve us in further difficulty, and we shall be again compelled to go forward. I do not see that amongst all the advocates of advancing our Frontier anyone has even suggested where we can stop; and depend upon it that if we once commence advancing into Afghanistan, instead of taking the first ridge, we shall never stop till we have taken the last, which looks down upon the plains of Balkh and the Oxus. But this is an occupation of Afghanistan, the folly of which Sir Charles Napier said only equalled that of attempting to conquer it. Against whom do we require a scientific Frontier? Not against the Afghans; against them our present Frontier has sufficed for the last 28 years. Bands of plunderers are the only persons who have crossed in hostile form. It is not against Afghans, but against Russians that a scientific Frontier can be needed. But nobody expects the Russians to advance for the purpose of assailing India by Cabul and the Khyber. Look to Sir Henry Rawlinson's book, who certainly understands the subject. He tells you that it is upon Herat that they must advance, and I believe that all military men agree in this opinion. In order to meet their possible advance, he proposes to erect a great fortress at Herat, a second at Candahar, with a line of forts and fortified posts at Quetta and elsewhere, in order to maintain the communications along a line of 800 miles, from the Indus to Herat. In this view he is corroborated by a great military authority, General Hamley. If on military grounds this be necessary, then here arises the important question of finance. Herat will have to be defended, not against Persian or Afghan attacks, but against the forces and military skill of the Russians. It must, so near the Frontier, be made a second Metz. I do not presume to say what the first cost of constructing such a fortress, of that at Candahar and of those at the other posts, will be, but it cannot be less than £3,000,000 or £4,000,000. As regards the permanent defence of the country, an estimate was made in the time of Sir John Lawrence's Government. The minimum number of men required was put at 30,000, of whom one-third were to be Europeans, and the annual cost was taken at between £3,000,000 and £4,000,000. But it was supposed that the necessary force would in all probability be, not 30,000 but 50,000 men, and no allowance was made for keeping down a hostile population, or for the Civil Government of the country. Whatever the whole force required for all these purposes may be it must be in addition to what there is now in India, where there is not a man too much. It would be a low estimate to put the annual sum required for all this at less than from £4,000,000 to £5,000,000. Now, my Lords, little or nothing is to be obtained in Afghanistan. It is a country which, as Dost Mahomed expressed it, produces only men and stones. The whole expense must be defrayed from other sources. It is impossible to impose such a charge upon the Revenues of India. In spite of the favourable account which my noble Friend opposite gave of the amount of the opium duty this year, the Revenue of India, one year with another, barely covers the expenditure. Some of the Revenue is precarious. The expense of the Civil Administration is steadily and inevitably increasing, and nobody has suggested how much additional taxation can be imposed on India. If such expense is to be incurred it must fall upon the taxpayers of this country; and that is a prospect which may well make the boldest statesman pause. Her Majesty's Government may ask me what I would do. Fortunately, as I think, the winter months render a pause in our military operations inevitable. I would endeavour during this interval to revert to the policy of conciliation. We have done much of which the Ameer has, I think, good reason to complain; but Dost Mahomed had more, when we had deposed and driven him into exile. Nevertheless, Sir Herbert Edwardes and Sir John Lawrence so far conciliated him that he became our fast friend; and during our worst necessity during the Mutiny, in spite of the urgency of his Chiefs, he allowed no Afghan to cross the Frontier to our detriment. Call such policy by what name you please—backward policy, or masterly inactivity—it has succeeded in preserving peace and a good understanding with the Afghans. We ought to abandon all notion of permanent occupation beyond our present Frontier; we ought to satisfy the Afghans that we covet no portion of their territory. We ought, if communications are opened—as I hope they may be—endeavour to conciliate them. We should be patient, forgiving, and generous, and require nothing but what is absolutely necessary for the honour of the country. We have, in truth, no cause of quarrel with the Afghans but what we have made ourselves. There is no difficulty as to our Frontier. It is not so on their Northern Frontier, where they are almost coterminous with the Russians, or with States under Russian influence. Bokhara and Balkh are in near proximity; and looking to what has been the progress of Russian advance, it is more than probable that ere long some cause of difficulty or cause of quarrel will occur on this Frontier, and on the occurrence of which the Afghans will naturally look to us for assistance. That is the relative position in which we ought to stand with Afghanistan, not offending their national feelings; respecting their independence; always ready to afford them friendly aid. Such a state of things I hope and trust may be established; and with the Afghans our friends, though we may not have a scientific Frontier, nevertheless, with a friendly and warlike population holding an almost inaccessible country, and the British power behind them, we shall have an unassailable bulwark to our Indian Empire. The noble Viscount concluded by moving the Amendment of which he had given Notice.

Amendment moved,

To leave out from the word ("House") to the end of the motion for the purpose of inserting ("whilst ready to consent to providing the means necessary for bringing the war in which we are unhappily engaged to a safe and honourable conclusion, regrets the conduct pursued by the Government which has unnecessarily engaged this country in the contest.")—(The Viscount Halifax.)

LORD LAWRENCE*: My Lords, the noble Earl who moved the Address to

Her Majesty on the evening of the 5th (the Earl of Ravensworth) took occasion to quote a sentence from one of my letters, written some years ago when I was Governor General, to the effect that if the Russians got possession of Afghanistan it would be the cause of much trouble to us in India. I quite admit that this quotation may be correct, for in a despatch of the 3rd of September, 1867, I expressed the same view. I considered then that we should do all in our power to avert such a condition of things, and I urged on Her Majesty's Government that some understanding should be at once come to with Russia on this matter. I think, now, if Russia will not enter into satisfactory arrangements with us about Afghanistan, or, having made them, allow her officers in Central Asia to violate them, that ulterior measures should be taken in England to protect India. But, though I entertain these views, I hold—and firmly hold—that it would be an unwise policy for us to go beyond our present boundary on the North-West Frontier of India, and thus to anticipate the attacks of Russia. The policy which England for the last few years has adopted towards Russia is of a very doubtful character. We distrust her—we are continually questioning her as to her intentions and movements—and then profess ourselves satisfied with her explanations. For instance, in the Correspondence recently published regarding affairs in Central Asia, we accept all she says as to the circumstances which have led her to make the recent diversion in Afghanistan; and while we do this, and resume friendly relations with her, we wage war with the Afghans because they received a Russian Mission; and further are about to rectify our Frontiers in the hope of strengthening ourselves against Russian advances. This is not a very magnanimous policy, and I doubt it adding to either our strength or prestige in India. I will not say very much about the policy which we have pursued towards Afghanistan since the war of 1842, except that, after punishing its people for their treachery, our endeavour has uniformly been to make amends to them for our first invasion of their country. The noble Earl taxed me in severe terms—which, however, I view with indifference—on account of my successive recognitions in 1864 of Shere

Ali and his brothers. I confess that I did this; and cannot help thinking that if the noble Earl had been in my place, and had possessed a knowledge of Afghanistan, in all probability he would have acted as I did. For many years the state of things in Cabul had been one of constant change and struggles for the Throne, one Chief ousting another, as their respective parties gained supremacy. Ameer Dost Mahomed was himself a usurper of the Throne he sat on; and we at one time drove him from it in favour of a de jure King, and afterwards re-instated him, to the general satisfaction of the Chiefs and people. On his death, Ameer Shere Ali, his son, who had previously been appointed heir-apparent, succeeded his father, and would probably have retained possession of the Kingdom if he had only acted prudently; he, however, was not the rightful heir, either by Mahomedan law or by custom of the country, and his brothers were among his bitterest enemies. Sirdar Afzul Khan raised the standard of revolt in Balkh; Sirdar Azim Khan intrigued in Cabul; and a third brother attacked him from Candahar; it was, in fact, an internecine struggle between the members of one family. Why, then, should we interfere to uphold Shere Ali against his elder brothers? On what principle were we to pronounce that Shere Ali was the de jure Ruler of Cabul? Had we maintained his cause, and upheld him on the Throne, we might have found that we were helping a man whom neither the Chiefs nor people of the country desired to rule over them. I affirm, then, that the policy then pursued of dealing only with the de facto Ruler of the day was the right one. When, however, Shere Ali had subdued his enemies and recovered his power, and was willing to renew friendly relations with us, I judged that the time had come when we could with safety afford him aid; and my opinion was fully concurred in by the Secretary of State for India, Sir Stafford Northcote. I promised the Ameer, therefore, a considerable sum of money—part of which was given him at once, and the remainder in Lord Mayo's time; I also presented him with a number of arms, to which Lord Mayo added, including in his gift 12 guns. The interview with the Ameer which I had arranged previous to my departure from India was carried out by Lord Mayo in right Royal fashion. But it is an entire mistake to suppose that the Ameer consented at the Umballa interview to receive British officers either in Cabul or in other parts of his country, or that we desired that he should do so. The evidence of Mr. Seton-Karr, who was Foreign Secretary of the Government of India in 1869, is conclusive on this point. I was very glad to find among my papers a letter of his, written on the 5th of April, 1869, in which, with the approval of Lord Mayo, he gave me information on this point, which confirms fully his recent statement. What the Ameer really wanted was a Treaty of Reciprocity, whereby the friends and enemies of the one country should be deemed the friends and enemies of the other, and that this Treaty should be made with him and his own family. Lord Mayo refused both of these requests; but gave him strong assurances that in case of foreign invasion, if we were satisfied that the Ameer had not acted aggressively beyond his Frontier, he might rest assured of help in time of need. Lord Mayo likewise pledged himself that we would never send British officers to reside in his country—a point which we shall see was of the utmost significance to the Afghans. Shere Ali returned to Afghanistan expressing himself on every occasion as highly pleased with his reception at Umballa. In 1872 Lord Northbrook became Viceroy of India, and shortly afterwards Ameer Shere Ali sent his Minister, Syud Nur Mahomed Khan, to pay his respects and make certain representations to him. These consisted in the Ameer's desire for a reciprocal Treaty (as in Lord Mayo's time), and for the formal recognition of his son, Abdoolla Jan, as heir-apparent. Lord Northbrook, of course, did not accede to these requests, but gave him similar promises to those of Lord Mayo; the only addition to them being that troops were more specifically mentioned than before. This subject has excited especial interest, because it has been supposed that the Secretary of State for India, the Duke of Argyll, had not responded to the Viceroy on this point; but it is clear that this was not the case, for the Viceroy acted on his construction of the Secretary of State's telegram, which he understood as giving him the sanction for which he had asked. It may be said that from the time of Lord Ellenborough, in 1843, down to April, 1876, a period of 33 years (when Lord Northbrook returned to England), an uniform policy of peace and conciliation had been acted on with regard to Afghanistan. When any unreasonable demands were made they were firmly and quietly refused; on the other hand, if we wished to introduce changes which the Afghans objected to, our wishes were never pressed on them: and this policy was approved of by the Home Government. It is worthy of note that the two points, one of a personal Treaty with the Ameer of the day and his heirs, and the other of a reciprocal Treaty, have been, from 1855 to the time Lord Northbrook left India, subjects of the greatest interest to the different Ameer of Cabul. Sirdar Hyder Ali, in 1855, desired that the Treaty should be made with his father, Dost Mahomed, and himself as heir-apparent individually, and not as Rulers of Afghanistan; we did not comply with this, or the other request; explaining that our Treaties were simply to be made with the Rulers of Cabul, as such; and that in the matter of reciprocity, we could only give full assurance of help in time of need, did we approve of the Ameer's conduct. In one instance, to which I will now allude, the Home Government did not agree with Lord Northbrook. In 1875 the British Government desired to make a material change in the policy hitherto adopted towards the Rulers of Cabul. They desired the Viceroy to press upon Ameer Shere Ali the reception of a Mission at Cabul as a temporary measure, with the view of urging him to agree to British officers being placed at different parts of his dominion, such as Balkh, Herat, and Candahar, and eventually, if possible, at Cabul. This change of policy was more than once pressed on the Viceroy—who, however, firmly resisted. He stated in one of his despatches that all the officers of standing and experience in the Punjab, and elsewhere, were of his opinion, and that no dissentient voice had been raised in his Council. When, however, Lord Northbrook gave up the Viceroyalty, instructions still more definite to the same purport were again issued; and several letters appear to have been sent to the Ameer which produced great irritation on his mind. It is known that three of the Governor General's Council — Sir William Muir, Sir Henry Norman, and Sir Arthur Hobhouse — strongly deprecated both the new Instructions and the way in which they were carried out; but, on the retirement from the Council of these gentlemen, no obstacle then remained to the pressure of this measure on the Ameer. Shere Ali was next asked to attend the Durbar on the 1st of January, 1877; but the invitation was declined—which is not surprising if it be borne in mind that he was an independent Ruler, and that his presence at the Durbar might have been construed as an admission of dependence; moreover, he could be ill-spared from his duties in his own country. Later on, the Ameer was requested by the Viceroy to receive Sir Lewis Pelly at Cabul for a short time, to explain the views and wishes of his Excellency; he declined this also, but, after some hesitation, agreed to send down his confidential Minister, Syud Nur Mahomed, to meet Sir Lewis Pelly at Peshawur. The Syud was labouring under a severe form of disease, and came by slow stages from Cabul. On his arrival at Peshawur he was courteously received by Sir Lewis Pelly and Dr. Bellew. His first interview with the latter officer was of a very pathetic character. The Syud deplored the nature of the Viceroy's wishes, and concluded by saying — "Matters have now come to a crisis, and the situation is a grave one. This is a last opportunity for a settlement, and God only knows the future." Sir Lewis Pelly had received instructions to insist on the principle that British officers might be placed in Afghanistan, except, in the first instance, at Cabul; indeed, this condition was to be the basis of the Conference, and without its acceptance no other point was even to be discussed. The Syud entreated, again and again, that the matter might be postponed until later in the proceedings; but Sir Lewis Pelly was inexorable, and the Conference consisted of a consideration of this single subject. The Syud, among other questions, was asked why the Ameer had refused a temporary Mission, and what were the misapprehensions which had led him to such a step? He evaded an answer as long as he could; but at last alluded to the settlement of the Seistan boundary, Lord Northbrook's intervention on behalf of Yakooob Khan, and other minor points. But it is evident from a perusal of the proceedings that the Envoy was on the defensive, and had no real desire to prefer any other complaint than the one under discussion—namely, the reception of British officers in Afghanistan, in which, the Syud said, the Ameer, the Chiefs, and the people were all of one mind, and were all in the highest degree alarmed at the idea of its being forced on them. Every other consideration appears to have been merged in this one anxiety, and to the last moment of the last day of the Conference the Syud refused to admit that the Ameer would ever accept such a measure. The Conference was obliged to end on account of Syud Nur Mahomed's illness; but a letter was sent him by Sir Lewis Pelly (under the Viceroy's directions) still demanding an answer on this point. But no answer was ever sent, for the Syud died without giving any consent to this cardinal condition. On the news of the Envoy's death the Viceroy directed that the Conference should be terminated, though it appeared that the Ameer was about to send down a second Envoy, who was authorized to submit to all the conditions demanded by the Viceroy, including the reception of the officers. The Native Agent who had represented the British Government at Cabul, and had accompanied the Envoy to Peshawur, was not allowed to return to Afghanistan, and the Viceroy sent no one to take his place; and so it came to pass that all diplomatic communications with the Ameer ceased, and the Government of India received no reliable information, but had to depend on the news picked up in the bazaars of Peshawur and elsewhere. But to return briefly to the Conference, the proceedings of which ought to be read, in order to realize fully the genuine feeling of alarm and apprehension that was expressed by the Syud in deprecating the sending of officers into his country. And another circumstance worthy of note is, that in these discussions the Envoy expressed himself as thoroughly satisfied with the manner in which Afghanistan had been treated in the days of Lord Northbrook, Lord Mayo, and myself. He seems to have looked back to the time when we governed India as one of assurance and security to the Ameer of Cabul. I would observe here, that the unsuccessful result of the Mission to Candahar in 1857 was one of the reasons which led me to conclude that the time had not arrived for the Afghan Government to be required to accept our policy in this matter. Ameer Dost Mahomed had absolutely objected to receive British officers at Cabul; and though when relieved from this anxiety he had with seeming willingness agreed to their residence for a time at Candahar, yet they were not received with the consideration that ought to have been shown them. The officers chosen were Colonel H. Lumsden (Sir H. Lumsden), Lieutenant P. Lumsden (now Adjutant-General), and Dr. H. W. Bellew; none better, in every way, were to be found on the Frontier. I cannot trace in the Correspondence communications of any kind between the Ameer and Viceroy from March, 1877, to July, 1878. We may, therefore, reasonably conclude that it was during this period that the Ameer turned to Russia for help, and that those communications took place with her which led to negotiations with the Turkestan authorities, and finally to the Mission to Cabul. In July, 1878, the Ameer was called upon by the Viceroy to receive Sir Neville Chamberlain's Mission, and before an answer could arrive its advance guard was sent on to Ali Musjid, where it met with the rebuff which is one of the reasons of the present war. Telegrams of an exciting nature, describing the conduct of the Ameer's officer at Ali Musjid as violent and insulting, were sent to England, and are still officially uncontradicted. They contributed much to the anger of the people of England against the Ameer. On referring to the Afghan Correspondence two different versions of the mode in which the Mir Akhor received our Mission on the 21st of September will be found. Major Cavagnari, the head of the party, says distinctly, that though told he would be resisted by force if he proceeded, he was treated courteously from first to last. Colonel Jenkins states, however, that the Mir Akhor said that but for former friendship he would have fired on the party. As Major Cavagnari was the principal officer, we are justified in taking his account in preference to that of Colonel Jenkins. But be this as it may, the difference is not of much importance; for if the Mir Akhor believed that our Mission was about to force its way through the Pass, it was only natural that he should intimate that he was prepared to resist. Bearing in mind the rough character of the Afghans, the action of this officer at its worst was no more than a rebuff, which, for want of common prudence, our people had brought on themselves. We now come to the Ameer's answer to the Viceroy's letters, which constitutes the gravamen of the charge against him. It is very difficult in the absence of a copy of the exact expressions used by the Ameer in the original Persian to estimate fairly the importance to be placed on its contents; and this difficulty is increased, as we have neither of the four letters of the harshness of which the Ameer complains. However, taking the translation as it stands in the Correspondence, I declare as my deliberate opinion that the words therein used do not amount to an insult. The Ameer was clearly angry, and under great apprehensions when he wrote. His answer is evasive, and to a certain extent, perhaps, defiant; but as little so as could be expected consistently with a resolution to resist receiving the Mission. He also complains of discourteous and inconsiderate treatment on the part of the British Government; and it would be well for us not to forget the provocations which in many instances he had received from us, if we wish to judge justly in this matter. The so-called affront from the Ameer was certainly not one that deserved to be wiped out in blood. I see in the Correspondence in August of this year that the Governor General telegraphed that "the safety of India depended" on our establishing a preponderating influence in Afghanistan, and to that end would insist on the reception of British officers into that country; and, this condition being accepted by the Secretary of State for India, we have been plunged into the present war. It is my firm and unbiassed opinion that the war now raging in Afghanistan is a most unjust one, and that its political consequences will be exceedingly damaging to us. We have already been victorious in the fight; but in the minds of most educated Natives in India the war will be considered—and considered rightly—as an oppressive and high-handed proceeding. It is vain for us to say that the war is with the Ameer and not with his people;

they will be one in their desire to resist our aggression. All the good results of the policy of more than 30 years have been cast to the winds, and the suspicions and enmity of the Afghan nation have been revived with four-fold intensity. Thus have we played the game of Russia; for rest assured that, if the day should ever come when Afghan influence would be of any value, it will to a certainty be thrown in the balance against us, and we shall have nothing to blame for such results except our own folly and injustice. Now as to our present action. In my opinion, the war ought to be brought to as speedy a conclusion as can with honour be done—the victorious party in a conquest has never any real difficulty in treating with the vanquished. I would exact nothing from the Afghans. I would take no territory from them on any pretext whatever. I would arrange that bygones should be bygones. I would place no British officer in their territory. If they were willing to make a friendly and reasonable Treaty with us I would meet their wishes (still, of course, adhering to the old principles of refusing to bind ourselves absolutely to defend and protect them). I would give them the strongest assurances, provided we were satisfied with their conduct, of help in case of foreign invasion. I would agree, on the same conditions, to give them periodical grants of money—not as a regular subsidy; for by keeping the power of giving or withholding in our own hands our hold over them becomes stronger. The Ameer is very poor; his revenues are small, and the legitimate expenses of maintaining his Government are very considerable. He has never had sufficient means at his command to pay his troops, whose allowances are scanty and always some months in arrear. I have said that I would take no territory from the Afghans; neither would I extend our North-West Frontier over what are called the independent Border Tribes; in every respect we are much better without them than with them. If we annex any of them—more especially those of the Pathan race—we shall sooner or later be forced to subjugate them, disarm them, and keep them down. This would necessitate a considerable addition to our Native Army, and, for political reasons, to our European force also; the consequent increase of expenditure would be a great drain on our resources. We might with advantage give some of these tribes moderate retaining fees, and employ more of them than at present as levies on the border; we might establish posts of small size in suitable positions in the Khyber Pass, to be held by them. Should a day of invasion ever come, we shall have ample time to make such preparations with them as circumstances may suggest, and having respected their independence, and treated them kindly but firmly, we should have some reason for calculating on their assistance. They would, with a few English and Native officers to look after them (not to drill them), make good guerilla troops wherewith to annoy the flanks and rear of an invading enemy. With the consent of these tribes, field-works might then be constructed within the mountains, our own forces would be ready in the plains and valleys east of the Passes, and would be near their true base, the sea-coast of Scinde, and would be able to concentrate rapidly at any point by means of our lateral communications. We could keep a considerable portion of our European troops in the adjacent hills in the rear, or in the most healthy parts of the plains, until they were wanted; and then, when the enemy appeared, we should be able to array against him an army, European and Native, fresh and well-found, which would prove irresistible. Now, as regards the present Motion. Of course, in the first instance, the Revenues of India must defray the expenditure; but England alone ought to bear all the costs of the war, as a matter of justice. Unless this be done the general feeling in India will be one of indignation and despair—particularly if additional taxation is laid on an already burdened people. If we borrow the money we shall add indefinitely to the financial difficulties of India, and when troublous times come shall be proportionately overweighted. One word, before I sit down, as to another point. What is the cause of the mystery and secrecy with which everything of importance to India is carried on, both by the Government there and by the Secretary of State for India in England? In 1877 the Duke of Argyll and other noble Lords endeavoured, in this House, to find out if there was any important change in the policy towards Afghanistan. An answer in the negative was given to all our inquiries. We now know, as we then surmised, that the policy which has since brought on the war was being vigorously pursued. The Correspondence also recently published is not compiled in an impartial spirit, for there are many omissions which, were they filled up, would show strong reasons against the course pursued by the Government; for instance, not a word is said of three dissentient opinions in the Governor General's Council to the present policy. Those omissions have led to much of the public anxiety, and ought to be at once remedied. Again, the mode in which affairs are at present conducted in the India Office requires immediate reform. Criticisms which Councillors desire to make are not allowed to appear—it is always too soon or too late. If they are eventually published, the time has passed in which they might have done good. Whilst maintaining the authority of the Secretary of State, the Councillors should have perfect freedom to make known their opinions; and the people of England would then have some chance of benefiting by their knowledge and experience, and of seeing for themselves in some degree how matters were going on in India. The noble Viscount the Secretary of State for India, in order to disparage the weight of my opinion on the present war, has alluded to a proposal made by me in the Mutiny, to give up the Peshawur Valley and retire across the Indus; and no doubt the noble Earl, in moving the Address to Her Majesty's Speech, on the 5th instant, had the same object in view when he made a similar allusion. I have hitherto been unwilling to refer to what actually occurred in 1857, because to do so satisfactorily would have necessitated my bringing to light the state of things which induced me to entertain this idea. I will only point out now that the proposal was prospective and conditional, subject to a state of things which might have occurred, and which was likely to occur. If ever openly and fairly challenged, I shall be prepared to show grounds for the line on which I then intended to act. Sir Herbert Edwardes concluded, by mistake, that I had decided to abandon Peshawur at once; but this was not the case; I, in the first instance, only wished that preparations should be made, by the withdrawal of the English women and children to a place of security—cis-Indus; so that, should the necessity arise which I had anticipated, our soldiers might be free and untrammelled. In 1858, after all danger from the effects of the Mutiny had passed from the Punjab, I discussed this question with Sir Herbert Edwardes and Sir Neville Chamberlain, when the latter officer expressed an opinion that, under the circumstances in which I had proposed to act, he thought I had resolved advisedly; that had the force before Delhi been compelled to give up the siege and fall back, we could not have continued to hold Peshawur. My views may not have been correct, and Sir Herbert Edwardes's may have been the right judgment; but while he only knew how we stood at Peshawur, I was behind the scenes and knew also the state of things at Delhi. Sir Neville Chamberlain had this advantage also; for he had barely left Peshawur a month or six weeks when I made the suggestion now under consideration to Sir Herbert Edwardes—and he was subsequently Adjutant General of the troops before Delhi. Whatever may be the views of impartial men on this subject, on knowing all the circumstances which in 1857 beset our position in the North-West of India, it was solely the desire of economising our English troops, and thus to enable them to be used in the most effective way in stemming the tide of misfortune which surrounded us, that led me to advocate the abandonment of Peshawur; and as for those who use the resolution I then formed with the object of damaging my reputation, I can only regard their conduct with feelings strongly akin to contempt.

THE EARL OF DERBY: I do not intend to follow the noble Lord (Lord Lawrence), who has so extensive and so practical a knowledge of the question of Afghanistan in all its phases, nor the noble Viscount who moved the Amendment, nor the Secretary of State for India, in the able and exhaustive accounts which, from their respective points of view, they have given of the question now before us. I rise not very willingly, and I shall not trouble your Lordships long; but having been concerned in some of the earlier stages of these transactions, and standing in the unfortunate position of finding myself unable, on the one hand, to support the Resolution of the Government, and, on the other hand, unable to agree with a large part of the arguments adduced by a majority of those who oppose it—believing, as I do, that the policy of the Government in 1876 was sound and defensible, but that the proceedings in 1878 are not such as this House ought to support—standing in that isolated and unfortunate position, I do not feel it consistent with my duty to give a silent and unexplained vote. The Secretary of State for India commenced by taking credit, on behalf of the Government of which he is a Member, for having called Parliament together at the earliest convenient date. He had a perfect right to do so; and that, probably, is the only part of these transactions on which the opinion of your Lordships will be unanimous. I think, however, it is impossible not to feel that there is something unreal and unsatisfactory in the state of things with which we have to deal. We are discussing—and we know we are discussing—an issue over which we have no real or practical influence. When a war is begun, to withhold Supplies which are necessary to carry it on, and thereby to expose a British Army in the field to disaster and defeat, is a course outside the limits of what is allowable or possible. We are, therefore, placed in this position—we are bound to support in action a policy which in opinion we may wholly disapprove. The other evening the noble Duke who sits on the Opposition benches (the Duke of Somerset) made a sarcastic comment on the speech of a noble Earl then sitting below him (Earl Granville), because that noble Earl, while disapproving the general policy of the war, yet expressed a hope that nothing would be left undone to press it to a conclusion. Well, that is the sort of language which a great many others of us are holding. It is an inconsistency if you will; but an inconsistency which is forced upon us by the peculiar position in which Parliament is placed. And, my Lords, it is not only to the case of a war that this practical helplessness of Parliament extends. Take the case of a concluded Treaty. If the Government has pledged the faith of the nation to this, that, or the other—no matter how imprudently—we are asked, how is it possible for us to repudiate an obligation undertaken in the face of Europe? My Lords, let me say, in passing, that any remarks I may make on this subject are not meant by way of censure upon the Government. They have acted simply in accordance with many precedents. I do not contend that the Government have exceeded Constitutional limits, nor do I even affirm that they have strained them; but I do hold that a country professing to be self-governed, and which supposes at least that it manages its own affairs, is in a very peculiar position when twice in the same year Parliament—once in July and again in December—is called upon to consider decisions of national importance—decisions which may affect the future of the country for many years—those decisions having been taken on the responsibility of the Executive Government without a possibility of any Parliamentary opinion—or, indeed, any opinion at all—being previously expressed upon them—thus rendering all criticism merely retrospective and historical in its character. Most of us believe that before long the nation is to be consulted as to the policy it will sanction. When that time arrives there will be a question to be asked and answered—a question quite apart from Party politics—Can a country be said to be really self-governed which may at any moment find itself engaged in a European or an Asiatic war—not necessarily a defensive war—or which may be committed to some engagement, inevitably involving war in the future; the decision in each case having been taken without anyone knowing anything of it outside the small number of persons who constitute the Cabinet of the day? I do not think it is any answer to say—“You have Ministerial responsibility.” What does Ministerial responsibility mean? We all know it means that if a majority of the electors disapprove what has been done, the Government is changed, and the power will pass from one set of men to another. But that result is not a remedy. It does not get us out of the quarrel in which we have been involved, nor does it disengage us from the obligations which we may have hastily and rashly incurred. This question, my Lords, is one upon which I will say no more, but which I think you will find become more and more prominent. My Lords, there has been a great deal of controversy, and much has been said and written by members of the two political Parties, as to which Administration must bear the responsibility of having originally alienated the Ameer from us. My Lords, I have examined the Papers; I have read most of what has been written on this subject: and the only conclusion to which I can come is, that it would be utterly impossible, and that even if it were possible it would be utterly useless, to try to single out any one special and exclusive cause for that feeling of jealousy and distrust on his part with which we have undoubtedly to deal. I believe the mischief may be traced back in its origin to a cause for which no one now living is responsible—to the first Afghan War. Everybody now admits that war to have been a folly, and there are a good many who think it a crime. To us it is now mere matter of history—it has almost faded from our memories. But we cannot expect that it shall have equally passed from the recollection of those who suffered from it. The Afghan Rulers and the Afghan people probably know very little of any change of opinion which may have taken place here. What they do know is this—that in the memory of living men their country was invaded by a British Army without cause or provocation; that it was occupied for a considerable time; and that when at last evacuated, its evacuation was accompanied by severities not usual in English war. It seems to me, therefore, that if we were in the position of the Afghan Chief, or of those about him, we should be disposed to look with considerable suspicion and distrust on the proceedings of neighbours who had these antecedents. It may be argued, no doubt, that in 1855 the quarrel was made up and a Treaty signed between the Indian and the Afghan Governments, which was in force up to the late declaration of war. But on looking at that Treaty the other day, it struck me—as it struck the noble Earl who moved the Address the other night—that it was not altogether a satisfactory Treaty to one of the parties concerned. The Treaty consists of three Articles. The first is a declaration of perpetual peace and friendship. The second is a declaration that we will respect the Ameer's territories, and not interfere therein. The third gives the same pledge on behalf of the Ameer, with the important addition that he agrees to be the friend of our friends and the enemy of our enemies. That amounted to an alliance offensive and defensive with us on the part of the Ameer, while we on our part incurred no corresponding obligation. I know that a few years later it was modified, as the Secretary of State for India said, for a temporary purpose; but this Treaty at least helps to explain why the present Ameer, who succeeded to those obligations, should have assumed towards us that very peculiar tone which is observable in his correspondence—the tone, not exactly of a friend, nor exactly of an enemy, but of a man who feels himself ill-used and has a grievance. I will not go through the history of our past relations with the Ameer. As far as I can judge, the root of the misunderstanding between us and him appears to have been this—that while we offered him occasional help in money and arms and promised him a certain support in his difficulties, the kind of support which he has asked us for, and at various times has endeavoured to obtain, was such as with our ideas of responsibility it would have been impossible for any English Ministry to give. He wanted a pledge that his dynasty should be supported by us against all rivals. The Secretary of State for India (Viscount Cranbrook), in referring to that subject to-night, seemed to treat that claim of the Ameer as not altogether unreasonable, and to contend that he had some cause of complaint against us, because we only recognised him as de facto Ruler of a part of his country, and also recognized another Prince who held certain other districts. My answer is, that the Ameer appears to have required from us that which would necessarily have involved our continual interference in the domestic affairs of Afghanistan, and possibly the employment of British troops to put down insurrection against him. The granting of his request would have led to the exercise of constant control over his acts; because if we were to be bound to give him support, we must have taken care that he did not abuse his power. No concession of that sort could, therefore, reasonably have been made. No doubt other questions had their influence—such as the Seistan arbitration and some minor matters—which it is not worth while to mention; but I think that to which I have ad-verted was the principal grievance of the Ameer, and the one which raised the strongest feeling of resentment in his mind. Well, in 1873 came the Russian advance on Khiva. The Ameer was naturally alarmed, and a long series of communications passed between him and the Indian Government. What I understand the Ameer to have then wanted from us was an unconditional guarantee of protection from external attack, he making no stipulation in return. The British Government was willing to give him assurances of protection if he was attacked without provocation, such protection to be conditional on his placing himself in our hands. The difference between what was asked for and what was promised appears to have mainly, if not entirely, turned on the conditions upon which the protection should be afforded; and I am bound to say, from a study of these Papers, that I do not draw the conclusion that there is a very marked difference in the attitude of the Ameer to the British Government, before and after these transactions. He is represented to have been jealous, suspicious, and mistrustful after what took place in 1873; but it appears to me that he was jealous, suspicious, and mistrustful before that date, and that there is no apparent change in that respect. Well, in 1874 the present Government came into Office. I am not careful to argue the question of how far, and how soon, they diverged from the policy of their Predecessors. I do not think the divergence was very marked in the first year, because I myself had, early in that year, to state the views of the Cabinet on the subject; and I did so after consultation with the then Secretary of State for India. What I said is on record; and I do not see in it any marked difference from the recorded opinions of the India Office in the preceding year. No doubt, later on, steps of a different kind were taken. But is it necessary to assume, as a matter of course, that either the policy that prevailed before 1873, or the policy that prevailed after that date, must necessarily have been erroneous because they may have differed? My Lords, I do not take that view. I say that you must allow for the lapse of time and for the change of circumstances. You must admit that the establishment and consolidation of Russian power in Central Asia introduce a new element into the question. It may have been wise and right—I believe it was—to have taken precautions after that event, which before its occurrence would have been premature, and possibly mischievous. What were the steps then taken? One of them—the occupation of Quetta—was recommended by various considerations of local security; it violated no right of the Afghan Government; and we had a Treaty right to take it, although it may, no doubt, have tended—and I am afraid it did tend—to increase the irritation and the jealousy of the Ameer. That was no sufficient reason for not taking it; but the feeling is intelligible, and I think its existence, and the cause of it, ought to have been borne in mind when we dealt with him as we have done in the last few months. Then came the attempt to place Agents at Herat and Candahar. My Lords, whatever the result may have been, I am bound to say that in that attempt, so long as nothing more was done to press it than the making of friendly representations, I see nothing that, in principle, was open to objection. It was, and is, eminently desirable that we should know what is passing in Afghanistan. The geographical position of that country, the conditional protection which we had promised, and which, whether we had promised it or not, we could not help giving, in case of foreign attack;—the very fact of the suspicion and distrust with which we were met, were all reasons to make it desirable to render our relations with the Ameer more close and intimate. I think, therefore, the Government was quite right in making the attempt. But, obviously, it was one which had to be made cautiously and temperately. Every Asiatic Prince knows how an English Resident, once stationed in his dominions, is apt to acquire influence, and sooner or later to become his virtual master. Moreover, an Agent who is imposed by force on a Prince who is unwilling to receive him is in a position essentially and thoroughly false. He may be treated with all the outward marks of courtesy and respect, and yet he may be allowed to see and know little of what goes on, and without a word said or a thing done on which a quarrel can be fixed, he may be shown, in a hundred ways, that he is neither wanted nor trusted. I hold, therefore, two things to be proved. First of all, that in the circumstances of 1874 it was desirable to establish English Agents in Afghanistan if it could be done by friendly means; and, next, that if it were done by other than friendly pressure—by force, or by pressure equivalent to force—it would fail in the very object which we had in view. In 1876 I held office, and, though not personally cognizant of the details of Indian Frontier diplomacy—for other matters pressed heavily at that date—I, of course, accept fully the responsibility for what was done. I do not think that the Instructions then given to the Indian Government conflict with anything that I have put before your Lordships, or tended to bring about the war in which we are now engaged. The negotiations which were attempted failed and the result was reported home, and the Secretary of State commented on them in due course. The despatch appears in the Blue Book. The substance of it is, that the negotiations showed that the Ameer now knew clearly what we wanted, and might be left to reflect for a time on the knowledge he had acquired, and that it was not desirable to put pressure on him in a hostile sense. The despatch of October 4, 1877, says—

“The independence of Afghanistan is a matter of importance to the British Government, and, as an essential part of arrangements for its protection, Her Majesty’s Government would still be glad to station Agents upon whom they could rely at Herat and Candahar. In the event, therefore, of the Ameer, within a reasonable time, spontaneously manifesting a desire to come to a friendly understanding with your Excellency on the basis of the terms lately offered to, but declined by him, his advances should not be rejected. If, on the other hand, he continues to maintain an attitude of isolation and scarcely veiled hostility, the British Government stands unpledged to any obligations, and, in any contingencies which may arise in Afghanistan, will be at liberty to adopt such measures for the protection and permanent tranquillity of the North-West Frontier of Her Majesty’s Indian dominions as the circumstances of the moment may render expedient, without regard to the wishes of the Ameer Shere Ali or the interests of his dynasty.”

No doubt, the last sentence is open to various constructions; but, taking the despatch as a whole, I think there is nothing in it to which anyone can reasonably object. It appears to be a fair view of the situation temperately stated; and I believe that if subsequent despatches had been conceived in a similar spirit we should not now find ourselves in our present position. What was the situation, then, at the end of 1877? We were on terms of coldness and estrangement from the Ameer, but not of actual hostility. He distrusted us. He was afraid of us. He thought he had reason to complain of some things we had done and of other things we had not done; but, my Lords, there is nothing to show that he loved Russia any better than he loved us. It was not in the nature of the case that he should. Considering what had happened in Khiva and Bokhara, it is simply impossible to believe that he really wished well to the Russian cause, or desired the success of the Russian armies. Well, then, at last, when a Russian Mission went to Cabul, why did he receive it? Surely the answer is plain—he did not dare to do anything else. We must remember that he was the head of a feeble State, scarcely master of his own dominions; that he was constantly liable to be held responsible for the actions of tribes over whom he had little control—that he felt himself placed between two aggressive military Empires—for we have been aggressive in India. He was not upon friendly terms with us; he knew that he had offended us; and he probably thought that if he offended Russia as well, he would have made two enemies instead of one. And so—very unwisely as the result has shown, quite unjustifiably considering the agreement by which he had bound himself to us, but still in circumstances, of very strong pressure and very great temptation—he took this unfortunate step of receiving the Russian Envoy. Well, my Lords, what, in the circumstances, ought we to have done? I do not contend for a moment that we ought to have allowed the attitude taken by the Ameer to be permanently maintained; but to hold him primarily responsible for what had passed I think was a very harsh mode of dealing with him. No doubt, he had broken his agreement with us. But had no one else broken an agreement with us? Had Russia held to the undertaking she had given? Has not Russia pledged herself, again and again, not to interfere in Afghanistan? And what was the language we held to her? It was courteous; it was friendly. It was a remonstrance, no doubt;

but a remonstrance framed in the most amicable terms, expressing a hope that the Mission to Cabul would be at once withdrawn, but making no grievance of its having been sent. I am not here, my Lords, to find fault with either the substance or the style of that document. I think the Government were right in holding the language they did. But we all know that the question which has arisen is the result of the strained relations which existed between the two Governments during the present year. In this country military men freely speculated upon the possibility of our attacking the Asiatic possessions of Russia from India; and I have no doubt Russians speculated equally on the possibility of at least disturbing our Indian Empire by an expedition sent from the North. If such a war had broken out the combatants must have passed through the dominions of the Ameer. The Mission was, therefore, a preparation for war; it was a counter-move to our despatch of Indian troops to Malta. But when the questions which arose were settled at Berlin, the object of the Mission to Cabul ceased; and, in the circumstances, I think the Government were quite justified in simply requesting its withdrawal, and not making a grievance of its having been sent. But what I cannot understand is, why the two parties concerned in this transaction are to be dealt with in so entirely opposite a spirit. Surely, if an offence had been committed against us, Russia was the greater offender of the two; and if reasons of prudence and policy, against which I have not a word to say—which, on the contrary, I altogether uphold—made us determine to condone the offence on the part of Russia, I ask whether simple justice ought not to have led us to deal in a like manner with the party who was immeasurably the less guilty of the two? But we turn round upon the Ameer, saying—"You are in our power; whatever Russia may have done, we cannot reach her—but we can deal with you, and you must pay the penalty for both." Well, my Lords, on the Russian part of the question I shall not say another word—the answer of the Russian Government is vague enough—but when we are told by them that their Mission was of a "provisional" nature, and was one of simple courtesy, I presume we are to read the word "provisional" as "merely temporary," and that we may take it, if not as a pledge, at least as an intimation, that in a very short time the Mission will be removed. But look, my Lords, at the position of the Ameer. I do not myself think that there is any great advantage in forcing a Resident upon a Prince unwilling to receive him, however desirable it may be that he should receive him even in his own interest. But if we thought otherwise, look how entirely the matter was in our own hands. We had a claim upon him such as we never had before. We could now say—"You have received a Mission from Russia; in justice and fairness you cannot do less for us." Suppose, my Lords, that we had held that language and given him time to consider it. The Ameer is no fool. He may be irritable and suspicious; but no one who reads the letters of his which are interspersed in the Correspondence will say that he is not a capable and able man. He knows quite well that he cannot fight the British Empire by himself; and if he had received a warning couched in proper terms, is it likely he would have resisted? Probably he would, in the first instance, have consulted his Russian friends. He would have gone to them and said—"A demand has been made upon me. I am threatened with war if I refuse compliance. Do you mean to stand by me or not?" We know perfectly well the answer they must have given—certainly they did not intend to fight for the Ameer, and they must have told him so. Then, disappointed in the hope of foreign help, which he undoubtedly entertained, and knowing perfectly well his own weakness—knowing, too, that by his own act he had placed himself in a false position—is it credible that he would have resisted? Would he not, on the contrary, have embraced the opportunity for effecting a reconciliation, if freely and frankly offered? Of course, I may be told that the Russian Agent would have given advice in the contrary sense to what the Ameer supposed, and so have encouraged him to persevere. I do not believe it; and I will tell your Lordships why. It cannot be imagined that Russia would have promised to stand by the Ameer, and then when the occasion arose have deserted him. Nothing could be more disastrous to the influence of Russia than such a course. And, therefore, I say that she would not have given such advice. She would not have urged the Ameer to resist if she did not mean to support him. She would, on the contrary, have advised him to give way, making the best terms he could. But instead of friendly overtures being sent, what happened? The Viceroy telegraphed on the 2nd of August that "the present situation required immediate correction;" that he proposes to insist on the reception of a British Mission; that the Ameer would probably welcome it—if he believed that after all that had passed, it says more for his poetical imagination, of which we heard the other night, than for the shrewdness with which he has also been credited—and he adds, what is more likely, that the Ameer was well aware that we were in a position to enforce our demands. The Government, in reply, approve of his insisting on the reception; but they appear to have left all details to the Viceroy. And here comes the extraordinary part of the transaction. Anybody would expect, if merely as a matter of form and courtesy, that when this question of receiving a British Mission had been for years in dispute, even if it was meant ultimately, and in case of need, to enforce the demand, at least that notice would have been given of the intention sufficient to admit of correspondence on the subject; so that the Ameer, while yielding, in reality, to pressure, should at least seem to exercise his option as the Sovereign of a free State. But the Viceroy gives him no such notice. He appears bent, not merely on forcing the Mission on the Ameer, but on making all India see that he did so force it. He does not leave him the semblance of an option. He selects his Envoy—a very distinguished officer—surrounds him with an escort of 250 men, makes the fact public to all the world, and sends him to the Frontier to demand admission at once. What is, then, the situation of the Ameer? If he admits him, he makes it plain to his own people that he is yielding to coercion. If he refuses, it is war. Surely it might have occurred to the Viceroy that a high-spirited Chief—the head of a warlike race—could not afford to be humiliated, and might prefer to die fighting. If the object were to pick a quarrel—which I do not impute—then, and only then, the measures taken were well suited for their purpose. We have heard it said in this House by the Secretary of State, and it has been said out-of-doors—and I think the worst enemies and severest critics of the British Empire in India have never said anything so disparaging—that we could not afford to give a little time for reflection and re-consideration to a Prince who had put himself in the wrong. We, the rulers of the great Empire of India, could not afford to give an Afghan Potentate a little time for consideration, lest the people of India should jump to the conclusion that we were actuated by fear of his military power! I do not contend that this is a war undertaken on our part wholly without provocation. I do not for a moment deny that the Ameer has deprived himself, by his own acts, of the sympathy which we might otherwise have entertained for a Prince in his position. But it is a war which, if there had been any real wish at Simla to avoid it, might have been avoided. You might have had your Mission received at Cabul, and you might have had “peace with honour.” But in that case there would have been no chance of what is believed in some quarters to be so desirable—the rectification of an inconvenient Frontier. I hope that that question is not at the bottom of a good deal of these transactions. It is a very old saying—and one which applies to Governments as well as individuals—that when they adopt confiscation as a means of punishment they are very apt to end by punishing as a means of confiscation. But even from the point of view of an advanced or rectified Frontier, I doubt the expediency of this war. It will be very easy for us to overrun and conquer Afghanistan; but what is to come next? To make the Ameer refrain from intriguing with Russia or putting himself under Russian influence is a perfectly fair and reasonable object; but are we likely to secure the confidence and friendship of the Ameer by a march upon Cabul? Probably, if we could ascertain the real feeling of the Ameer we should find it to be one of very impartial dislike, both of the Russians and of us. Now, if we are to establish ourselves at Jellalabad, as has been suggested, while the Russians are hundreds of miles away, it needs no great acuteness to see that we, being nearer, shall be the more cordially detested of the two. That is on the supposition that it is intended to leave the Ameer his independence, together with the greater part of his territory. The net result of the war in that case would be that we should be a little more feared and a good deal more disliked than hitherto. If, on the other hand, Afghanistan is to be subdued as well as overrun—and recollect it is not always in your power to stop the war at the precise moment you please, because despair does not reason, and men often fight on when there is no hope of ultimate success—the undertaking will be one of a very serious character. There is not a more difficult country in the world than Afghanistan. It is a complicated mass of mountain ranges, inhabited by warlike tribes constantly at feud with one another, but always ready to unite against a foreign enemy. They do not care for or value peace. They are quite willing to tolerate anarchy, but they will not endure servitude. That we can hold Afghanistan I do not doubt; but the question is, whether we should not hold it at an expenditure of money which, if otherwise applied, would secure to us the goodwill of every Afghan Chief for many years to come? I have only one word to add on the financial aspect of the question. I must confess I heard with some surprise the statement of the Secretary of State for India as to the cost of the campaign. Of course, I speak with respect, and with every wish to accept as conclusive the estimate formed by those most competent to give it; but I remember—and the Secretary of State for India must remember—our last experience of a little war. The cost of the Abyssinian War, it was hoped, would be £2,000,000 or £3,000,000; but it turned out to be not much less than £9,000,000. I hope the same will not be the case now; but if the anticipations of the Government with regard to the present campaign are realized, it will be the cheapest campaign ever undertaken. In connection with this subject I must say I look with some alarm on the present and prospective condition of the finances of India. In my opinion, the danger to our Empire comes from that quarter much more than from any foreign intrigue or threat of invasion. Look at the state of things in that respect. You have there a population of 200,000,000 of people, all except a very few of whom are practically trying the experiment on how little food it is possible to keep body and soul together. The great bulk of the people consume nothing but necessities, and it is on these necessities that new taxation must fall, because there is nothing else to tax. The Revenue is far from having the elasticity which belongs to our home Revenue in normal times. You have a standing increase of Debt—I do not say from year to year, but from 10 years to 10 years; you have had an enormous increase of expenditure during the 20 years that have elapsed since the East India Company was done away with; you have a people on whom you do not know how to lay fresh burdens to any considerable extent. And, my Lords, this is not all. The Secretary of State for India referred with peculiar satisfaction to the flourishing condition of one part of the Revenue—that derived from opium. Now, that is exactly the most precarious of the whole. Once let the Chinese people take to growing their own opium, or let the Chinese Government make an earnest attempt to put down its importation—public opinion certainly would not allow us to make a second opium war—and by the cessation of that one branch of Revenue there would be at once £6,000,000 or £7,000,000 struck off the Indian Revenue—a loss which could not be replaced, and which would lead not merely to embarrassment, but to insolvency. My Lords, I do not ask you to accept the, it may be rather despondent, views I hold on that point. I only ask you to remember that the financial position of India is grave. If we are to encounter danger, I believe there is less to be apprehended from beyond our Frontier than from the discontent which would ensue upon a greatly enhanced taxation. The burden is already heavy; and what would happen should any unfortunate combination of circumstances require it to be increased? But that is a matter I only touch in passing. On the question before us I have come to the conclusion which I have endeavoured to express. I see nothing to condemn in the policy of 1876—on the contrary, I should have been ready to defend it were defence from me necessary. But with the Russian Mission matters took a new turn. I repeat it; I do not contend that there has been no provocation; but I cannot but believe that the Viceroy and his advisers have precipitated a war which, by a little more patience and forbearance, might have been avoided. And if I am to express my opinion upon the matter in a word I would say that, in my judgment, this war on which we have entered is unnecessary, and that, being unnecessary, it cannot be either wise or just.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, he could not agree with the noble Earl who had just spoken (the Earl of Derby) that their vote could not possibly have any effect on the policy of the Government, for the Amendment must be viewed in connection with a Motion which was made in the other House, and he could not look upon the two as anything but an attempt to displace the Ministry. He had been in Parliament, in one House or the other, for 40 years, and he had known many attacks made by the Opposition on existing Governments; but he did not remember one occasion on which the usual arrangements for the consultation of the Party had led to the proposing of such a Resolution as this Amendment. The noble Lord who moved the Amendment did not care to call his Party together; but it seemed that a few noble Lords must have met in a closet and settled on the Amendment. For what did the Resolution imply? It spoke of bringing the war in which we were engaged to “a safe and honourable conclusion;” and what he complained of was that the opponents of the Government went with one voice to the country and came to this House with another. They excited the country by saying that the war was contrary to all the precepts of morality and all the principles of religion; and yet they came to this House and talked of bringing it to “a safe and honourable conclusion.” Of course, the Government wish for nothing else but to bring it to a safe and honourable conclusion; they did not want the assistance of the Opposition to do that. As to the question on which so much discussion had been raised—Who caused the war? the Opposition referred to the taking of Quetta and to the domineering style of Lord Lytton to the

Ameer, as having been the causes of the war. But that morning they had seen the Ameer's own opinions, and it was that some of our Viceroy's had entered into a family quarrel, and had given him some advice and lectured him about his conduct towards his son, Yakooob Khan, who was heir-apparent and a very promising youth. He had murdered with his own hand one or two people, including the Commander-in-Chief, and he was the terror of the country. The Ameer had induced him to visit Cabul, and then, in true Afghan style, took hold of his promising relation, and kept him prisoner at Cabul; and then his followers became indignant, and made a great disturbance in the country. Complaint had been made of the manner in which he condemned the conduct of the noble Lord (Lord Lawrence) in reference to the agitation in this country. He did not wish to have used a discourteous word, for he appreciated the great services of that noble Lord; and, looking at the report of his speech next day, he could not find that he had used a word which should have given offence. He praised the noble Lord for his former conduct in reference to his administration of Indian affairs; but he regretted the course his noble Friend had taken in reference to the affairs of Afghanistan. He felt that he had as much right to express condemnation as to express approbation. Then they were told that the present Government had caused all this disturbance in the minds of the Ameer and his people. The Afghan Papers did not justify that assertion. Those Papers showed that in 1875, in 1873, and before that, the Ameer was only looking to see where he could make the best bargain. He said he must be supported on one side or the other; he wanted to be supported by us or by Russia; he was determined to get some support, for he could not stand alone; and, in the meantime, Russia had advanced to Khiva. What was the good of saying that the Government had departed from the policy of former Viceroy's? Circumstances had altered, and we must adapt our policy to those altered circumstances. It was clear enough from the Papers that, when we brought the Indian troops to Malta, Russia regarded that as a menace, and moved towards Cabul and Merv as a counter menace; and that had opened the eyes of the country to the dangers by which we were threatened. The question was how that danger was to be met? He was aware, from having heard the Frontier question discussed 40 years ago, that it was one surrounded with enormous difficulties. We must have a safe Frontier. It was of no use saying it would cost a great deal of money. No doubt it would; but was not India worth it? Could India be constantly threatened? We had a duty to its people, and that duty was to protect them. These wide dominions were obtained very often by stratagem and violence; we had to compensate the people of India for former wrong; and the best way was to give them tranquillity and peace. We had done that to a great extent, and he believed we had governed the country to its great advantage. We relieved them in their famines; we continually prevented war within their borders; and we had a further duty, which was to protect them against war from without their border. For these reasons he could not support the Amendment, which did no credit to the noble Lord who had moved it.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: I shall only detain the House a few minutes. The question on which we have to vote divides itself into two parts, one being the financial, the other the general policy which has resulted in this war. Of finance I will say no more than to express my hearty concurrence in every word that fell from my noble Friend on the cross-benches (the Earl of Derby). The general policy is the real question on which the vote will be taken; and I do not disguise from myself that this vote takes the form of a condemnation of the policy pursued by the Government of which I have been a Member. I hope your Lordships will believe that I am extremely reluctant to join in a vote condemning the policy of those with whom only a year ago I acted as a Colleague, and that I would most gladly, if it were possible, avoid the necessity; but it is not possible. At the same time, as it seems to me, under the circumstances, to be unnecessary and painful to discuss in full the details which lead to such a conclusion, I hope I shall not be misunderstood if I venture for once to give the conclusions at which I have arrived without stating the reasons by which I am quite ready to justify them. They are conclusions which have been arrived at as the result of much thought. I cannot, then, in the first place, reconcile this war with any notions or ideas of justice. Adopting the distinction between the policy pursued before 1876 and afterwards, I think the policy which led to the war was erroneous, and that the policy which is the object of that war is unsound, dangerous, and delusive. I believe the expense will be very much larger than the present estimate. I doubt very much what is said about the rectification of Frontier, when I find military authorities differing so largely about it. I hate the word rectification; it seems to me to savour of some of the worst traditions of the worst periods of the French Empire—it is a word borrowed from an evil school; it is a word which has been too often used to conceal wrong and robbery, and that system of stratagem and violence which, to my astonishment, my noble Friend opposite (the Duke of Somerset) just now seemed to eulogize, and against which I, for one, must with my whole strength protest. If wrong and robbery had been the foundation of our Indian Empire, I should look back with shame instead of pride upon those who founded it. To sum up, then, my principal objections to the policy which has been pursued—first, I think the morality and character of the country has been lowered by the recent transactions; and next, with regard to India, for the policy which has so long been adopted by successive Governors General, and which has already borne no insignificant fruit, you have substituted one which is sown with the seeds of hatred, distrust, and future foreign difficulties. It has taken the lifetime of a generation to efface from the Native mind the recollections of the former Afghan War—these transactions will inevitably revive them. And what is the policy you have substituted? I admit it is a showy, an ambitious, and, to many people, an attractive policy; but I believe it has neither substance nor reality, and sooner or later—probably soon rather than late—it must issue in disappointment and failure. It is at variance with the promises originally given to the Ameer; it is at variance with the patient, and conciliatory, and consistent policy which Lord Mayo pursued; and the only compensating merit I can discover in it is that it is an open—I think a cynical exhibition of power, which for a time may have, if successful, an effect on the wavering dispositions and doubtful allegiance of Native Governments. But even this is very uncertain. I have but one word more to say. I can, if I rightly caught his meaning, accept the view of my noble Friend the noble Earl who sits on the cross-benches (the Earl of Derby) with regard to Ministerial responsibility. I, like him, was a Member of the Government at the time these despatches were written, and I would be the last to shirk my fair share of responsibility. But I will say this—that, assuming every one of the despatches to be sound, right, and reasonable, I can see nothing in the Correspondence, as far as I remember, which constitutes a just and legitimate cause of war. Certainly, when the Ameer was urged to establish a British Agency in Afghanistan, the Government never contemplated that that demand was to be enforced at the point of the sword. In that lies the whole difference—between representing, and even urging upon the Ameer what was desirable, and in forcing it at the point of the bayonet. Such being the case, though I can honestly and unfeignedly say that I never gave a vote with more reluctance, I shall vote for the Amendment of the noble Viscount. It is very likely I shall be in a minority—perhaps a small minority; but to anyone who knows the history of this country that is not a very serious trial. There is nothing in it which need dismay any man. It is far more important, when one feels the honour and morality of the country at stake—whether the numbers be few or many—irrespective of Party discipline, that we should be content to record our opinion, in the face of an adverse Parliament, it may be also of an adverse Party—I am not prepared as yet to say in the face of an adverse country.

LORD NAPIER AND ETTRICK said, he was very glad to hear the account which had been given by the noble Viscount the Secretary of State for India (Viscount Cranbrook) with reference to the surplus of £2,500,000 on the present Indian financial year. The estimated expenditure of the war was about £1,200,000, so that there would still remain a substantial surplus. He thought, however, after a period of so much distress in India, that surplus ought to have been devoted to those works of national improvement of which that country stood so much in need. After the admirable spirit which India had recently displayed, the Government ought to have shown more generosity than charging the whole expenditure of the war on the Indian Exchequer. He hoped the Government would reconsider this matter. What India desired was to co-operate with England; certainly, the whole burden should not be thrown on India. He approved very much of the able and logical speech of the noble Earl who spoke from the cross-bench (Earl Grey). He contended that although Afghanistan had given some provocation, the main quarrel lay with Russia, and it was to Russia we should address our principal remonstrance. He also said, if the Ameer of Afghanistan had given us a certain amount of provocation, we had acted with undue precipitation, and that if we had given him more time for reflection the quarrel might have been pacifically adjusted. No doubt we had some reason for complaint against Russia—especially at an earlier period in the transaction; but, considering the relations that then existed between England and Russia, and the strong probability of a war between the two countries, he could not say that the sending by Russia of a Mission to Cabul could be found much fault with. Russia did only what we should have done in similar circumstances. Besides, from the first Russia cut off almost all grounds of expostulation or remonstrance on our part, for on the 2nd of July the Russian Assistant Minister for Foreign Affairs denied absolutely that any Mission had been sent by his Government to Cabul, or that there was any intention on the part of the Russian Government or of the Governor of Turkestan to send a Mission. The Russian Government could, therefore, always say that the Mission had been sent by the Governor of Turkestan without their knowledge. Further, the Mission was now represented to be simply one of courtesy and compliment. In these circumstances, it was not possible to address any serious remonstrances to the Russian Government. What did our Government do on a similar occasion? In 1840 the Government of Egypt, instigated by

France, placed the dominions of the Sultan in serious jeopardy. Lord Palmerston, with the greatest secrecy, formed a coalition of the European Powers against France; but did he lead them against France? Not at all. He brought them to bear against Egypt, and by a judicious employment of their forces they expelled the Egyptian army from Syria, and destroyed the policy of France by which Egypt had been set in motion. The refusal to receive a British Resident at Cabul, or the reception of a Russian Mission there, were not the grounds of this war. The grounds were that when a Russian Mission had been received at Cabul with distinguished honour, the Ameer, though repeatedly requested, obstinately refused to receive a similar Mission from us with the same honour. That refusal practically amounted to an act of menace and hostility to Her Majesty's Government. It was always difficult in this country to justify a war not of defence but of policy; but a war might be justified on grounds of policy, and this was such a war. If we had shrunk from action on this occasion we might in a year or two have been placed in a position where we should have to incur far greater expense and suffering. But though the Government had just cause of war, he held that the circumstances were such that, having shown ourselves to be perfectly in earnest and absolutely powerful for the objects we had in view, we ought to take the first opportunity of granting favourable terms to the Ameer. And now a word as to the general question of policy. He found that the successive Governors General aimed at the same policy, though differing as to the means by which that policy was to be executed. The policy on which they were agreed was the maintenance in Afghanistan of a strong and independent Government, having aims consistent with our policy. But one party said that was to be secured by a general system of negotiations and assurances to the effect that the Ameer was to be assisted with money and arms, and, in cases of extreme necessity, with troops. By others it was argued that these assurances ought to be put into the form of a definite Treaty. The advocates of the general system of assurances admitted that, in certain circumstances, it would be desirable to sign a Treaty. The only advantage he had ever heard alleged in favour of general assurances as compared with Treaties was, that under the former system we avoided the danger of entangling ourselves in distinct and onerous obligations with Afghanistan which it might at some future period be inconvenient to fulfil. He maintained, however, that this advantage was a great deal more apparent than real; for under the system of assurances the Representatives of Her Majesty in India had made arrangements defining the boundaries of Afghanistan and engaging to defend those boundaries, in certain circumstances, by force of arms. Could it be said that after doing this the Government had remained really free, and had incurred no serious or binding obligations? On the contrary, he ventured to say that even if no Treaty should ever be signed, this country was bound, in honour, and in equity by the obligations it had successively undertaken; and that the only liberty it had retained for itself under this system was to violate its engagements and to retire from its obligations with disgrace. In his opinion we had, under this system of assurances, practically incurred the obligation of preserving, in certain circumstances, the integrity of Afghanistan, and of interfering in the internal affairs of that State. We had said that we wanted a strong and an united Afghanistan in which we should have exclusive authority, and in which the influence of Russia should have no exercise. How could this object be attained if we suffered the present State of Afghanistan, which we had created and defined, to go to pieces? The policy pursued by his noble Friend (Lord Lawrence), the Viceroy who preceded Lord Mayo, by Lord Mayo himself, and by Lord Northbrook, virtually established obligations towards Afghanistan from which this country could not escape. The Russians were a great people, with the consciousness of a great past and a greater future, and their Sovereign was by nature in the highest degree humane, liberal, and sincere. But the Russian Government was moved forward on the back of national sympathies and national aspirations. With a Government and a country so constituted we had every reason to maintain relations of amity and alliance. But in order to realize that result it was necessary that our Government should employ judicious means and expedients; and the best means and expedients which they could employ were an absolute plainness and a perfect frankness, so that there might exist no doubt or uncertainty as to our relations with the various States with which we were brought into contact. With regard to Central Asia, the experience of the past proved that that effect could not be produced by vague and indefinite assurances and declarations, but only by formal Treaty and guarantee. Another reason why it was requisite to make a binding Treaty with Afghanistan was that such a course would impart an element of permanency and consistency to the policy of this country. There was a danger, incidental to our Parliamentary Constitution, of a fluctuating or uncertain character attaching to our foreign relations, and, therefore, it was extremely desirable to fix the nature of those foreign relations by formal Treaties. Such a Treaty, in reference to Afghanistan especially, would have a tranquillizing effect upon India. In alluding to a certain Memorandum dictated by Lord Lytton, Earl Granville had characterized the Viceroy's language as very imprudent. If that language had really been intended to be communicated to the Ameer, that reproach might have been directed against it with some reason. But it was not distinctly proved in the Correspondence before their Lordships that the Viceroy's language was meant to be communicated to the Ameer. It was merely used in confidence by Lord Lytton to a British Agent, who was only to convey the general sense of it to the Ameer; and there was no reason why the Native Agent should communicate to the Ameer any particular illustration or expression then employed by his Excellency. Another reproach had been cast upon the Viceroy by Earl Granville. The Viceroy was stated to have said that in certain contingencies we could efface Afghanistan from the map of the world and partition it between two great Powers; and it was complained by the noble Earl that no evidence that any intimation to that effect had ever been conveyed to Russia appeared in the Papers on their Lordships' Table. But the fact that the Russian and the English Governments had formally created the theory that an independent Afghanistan should be maintained between the two countries was believed, although the theory was not universally accepted. But if their Lordships would read the conversation which took place between Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires at St. Petersburg and the Russian Foreign Secretary on the 23rd of June, 1875, and a second held in the following month, they would find the matter alluded to as to which reference, it was said, was made by the Viceroy, and that the idea of a partition of Afghanistan existed, at all events, in some Russian minds. With reference to the defence of our Indian Empire, it could, no doubt, be defended from our present Frontier; but, on the whole, the policy of Her Majesty's Government would furnish a Frontier which was accredited by the highest authorities and had been recommended by the great Emperor Akbar 300 years ago.

THE EARL OF ABERDEEN said, that the question had been argued, on the part of the Government, as though the policy they had adopted was the only one they could have pursued. But he could not agree in that position. As to the charge of want of patriotism, which had been preferred against the opponents of the Government on this question, it would fall very lightly upon those who felt they were acting in this matter from honest conviction. A severance of Party ties was a matter which no one of ordinary sensitiveness could view with indifference; and it was also very natural that one should be inclined to abstain from any hostile act towards the Administration with a war on their hands. But the present question was not one on which they could be guided by inclination. It involved great political principles; and he was convinced their Lordships would feel it incumbent to vote upon it according to their convictions, without respect to considerations of political convenience. It might appear that some apology was required from one who, without any special qualification, took part in the present debate; but he trusted that the importance of the question would absolve him from the charge of temerity. Some of the distinguished Members of their Lordships' House had been the Colleagues of a Minister whose words were listened to with attention, and whose name he had the honour of bearing; and he could not but think that if that Minister had lived to the present day he would not have failed to endorse the views now expressed by his former Colleagues and supporters.

THE EARL OF AIRLIE maintained that the merits of the policy pursued by the late Viceroy of India and his Predecessors had not been sufficiently appreciated by the present Government, and that the arguments of the noble Earl (the Earl of Northbrook) in the debate of Thursday evening had not been refuted. The noble Viscount the Secretary of State for India, who opened the debate, had sought to cast the responsibility of the present state of affairs upon the late Government; and he had said that the assistance proffered to the Ameer by the late Viceroy was hedged about by so many conditions as to make the promise amount to little or nothing. But if their Lordships would look at the Correspondence before Parliament they would see that the offers of the present Viceroy (Lord Lytton) were equally hedged about by conditions and limitations. Looking at what had transpired in the Conferences with the Ameer, it must be admitted that we had placed him in a very false position. We had told him first that if he would not come into our views, Russia would come to an arrangement with us; then we had entered into prolonged negotiations with him; and, finally, we had broken them off. No wonder the Ameer had felt that he was in a corner; that we were not serious in our professions to him; and that it was his interest to come to an understanding with Russia in order to protect himself. It really seemed as if our object had been to get him into a corner. We had gone a very strange way about promoting that which was said to have been "at all times the object of our policy," the statement of which was in curious contrast with the results our action had produced.

THE EARL OF BEACONSFIELD said, he saw no objection to the adjournment of the debate; but he thought it would be for the convenience of their Lordships to meet to-morrow at 4 o'clock, instead of the usual hour.

Further debate adjourned till To-morrow.

QUESTIONS.

THE COINAGE — WITHDRAWAL OF WORN SILVER COIN.

QUESTION.

MR. MONK asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he is aware of the serious extent to which the silver coin of the Realm is defaced by wear and tear, and of the inconvenience arising therefrom to large employers and their workmen; and, whether the Government will take steps to withdraw such worn coin from circulation?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, the Bank of England undertakes to receive in London and at its branches worn and defaced silver coin which may be brought to it, and, if required, exchange it for new coin. No banker, therefore, need re-issue worn coin, and large amounts are withdrawn from circulation every year at the expense of the State. The average annual amount withdrawn in the United Kingdom during the five years ending 1877-8 was nearly £200,000; but during the present financial year, owing to the contraction of trade, the amount presented for withdrawal will be little short of £500,000. To meet the excessive charge which will thus be imposed on the Mint a Supplementary Vote of £30,000 was taken last Session. The particulars will be found in the Report of the Master of the Mint.

TURKEY—REPORT OF THE RHODOPE COMMISSION.—QUESTION.

LORD ELCHO asked, Whether Her Majesty's Government entertain any doubt as to the trustworthiness of the Rhodope Report; and, whether they have taken, or are about to take, any steps to carry into effect the objects for which the Rhodope European Commission was appointed?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, perhaps, as the Question of the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Serjeant Simon) on this subject was addressed to me, and it was at my request he postponed it, I may be allowed to answer my noble Friend. It is not quite correct to speak of "the Rhodope Report." No single united Report has been made by the members of that Commission. Four members have addressed separate and identic Reports to their own Ambassadors; and in these circumstances it would not be possible to take any political action upon it without serious consideration. With regard, however, to the recommendations contained in the Report as to the sufferings which undoubtedly have been brought to light, it is difficult to see how any adequate relief can be provided, either by private charity or by the funds of the Turkish Government. Her Majesty's Government are considering whether they can make any proposal on this subject.

LORD ELCHO: May I point out that my Question referred also to the trustworthiness of the Report, and that I should like to know whether any doubt is entertained on the subject?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, my noble Friend will see that is a Question very difficult to answer one way or the other. The Report which has been addressed to Her Majesty's Government by Her Majesty's Ambassador is one of considerable importance, and it undoubtedly discloses a serious state of suffering, for which it would be really desirable that some remedy could be found; but I can hardly answer the noble Lord's Question.

LORD ELCHO gave Notice that he should repeat the Question.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON said, in consequence of the Answer which had just been given, he begged to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, in the circumstance that the Report was not a united Report of the Commission, it was in contemplation to take steps to verify the Report of our Commissioners, or whether the Report would be allowed to drop?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I think it would be better that that Question should be put after due Notice has been given.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON gave Notice that he should put the Question to-morrow.

THE MOUNTED POLICE.
QUESTION.

MR. GORST (for Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL) asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether it is true that persons who had contracted to serve the Cape Government in a civil capacity in the "Mounted Police" have been by a Colonial Law compelled, without the option of discharge, to serve in a military capacity in a force called "The Mounted Rifles;" whether those who respectfully refused to submit to this arrangement were not tried by court martial and sentenced to six months' imprisonment and hard labour, which involves their working on the roads of the Colony with common convicts; and, whether Her Majesty's Government propose to take any action in the matter?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, in reply, said, he was unable to state whether the reports referred to were or were not correct. Complaints had been made to the Colonial Office in November, and they had been referred to Sir Bartle Frere to report, and that Report, of course, had not yet been received. He feared it would be some time before all the facts of the case were in his possession.

MR. GORST gave Notice, on behalf of the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock, that he would repeat the Question at a future period.

TREATY OF BERLIN—DESPATCHES—
CYPRUS—JURISDICTION OF COURTS OF LAW.—QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether there can be laid before Parliament the following Despatches as to the execution of the Treaty of Berlin, namely, the German Despatches of August last and the Answers of the British Government, and the French Despatches of 22nd August and 27th September; and, whether there is any objection to produce any Correspondence as to the power of the Courts in Cyprus to try the subjects of Foreign Powers for offences against Turkish Law, or as to the Cesnola case?

MR. BOURKE: Sir, the French despatches of the 22nd of August and 27th of September are to be found at pages 300 and 302 of the French Yellow Book published in November last. The first is a Circular addressed by M. Waddington to the French Representatives abroad. The second is a despatch addressed by M. Waddington to the French Ambassador at Constantinople. Neither of these Papers has been communicated to Lord Salisbury. There was no Correspondence with the German Government in August. A communication was made to Her Majesty's Government in September, but it was strictly confidential. No Correspondence has taken place with any foreign Power on the subject of jurisdiction in Cyprus.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE asked, whether the proceedings of the Cesnola case had been brought to the knowledge of the Government by the Governor of Cyprus?

MR. BOURKE: I am not in a position to answer that Question without Notice. I do not recollect that they have.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I will put a further Question to-morrow on the subject.

AFGHANISTAN—THE RUSSIAN MIS-SION AT CABUL.—QUESTION.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether Her Majesty's Government have any information as to the Russian Mission sent by General Kauffmann having yet left Cabul, or whether it is still there; and, in the latter case, whether any communication has taken place between the Governments of England and Russia later than the Despatch from Lord Salisbury of the 19th August 1878, No. 158, given at page 149 of the Papers, Central Asia, No. 1, as to the probable date of the withdrawal of this Mission after its purpose, stated to be one of "simple courtesy," shall have been accomplished; and, if any such Correspondence has taken place, whether he will object to add it to the Papers already published, and to lay it upon the Table of the House?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, we have no means of obtaining complete information of what takes place at Cabul. But since the Russian Ambassador came back to this country my noble Friend the Secretary of State has seen him, and he has been informed by him that the Russian Envoy has left Afghanistan, and we know from other sources that he has returned to Europe.

INLAND REVENUE — THE CUSTOMS DEPARTMENT—RE-ORGANIZATION.

QUESTION.

MR. J. HOLMS asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, Whether the Commissioners of Customs have submitted to the Treasury a scheme for the re-organisation of their Department, in accordance with the recommendations made in 1874 by the Playfair Inquiry Commission; and, if so, whether he can promise an early settlement of the question?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON, in reply, said, that a scheme for the re-organization of the Customs Department had been submitted to the Treasury. That scheme was now under consideration; and, as far as he was informed, there would be no unnecessary delay in settling the question, but the details were numerous.

PARLIAMENT—COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC BUSINESS.—QUESTION.

MR. KNATCHBULL - HUGESSEN asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is his intention to make any propositions to the House, founded upon the recommendations of the Select Committee which sat last Session, to consider the best means of facilitating the despatch of Public Business?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, the Government were not prepared to make any proposal during the present short Session with reference to the subject alluded to in the right hon. Gentleman's Question; but when the House re-assembled it would be one of the measures they would have to bring under its consideration. At present he could not make any positive announcement on the subject.

THE WINDWARD ISLANDS—COOLIES IN GRENADA.—QUESTION.

MR. ERRINGTON asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether it is true, that during the month of September last Mr. Kerr, the Lieutenant Governor of Grenada, was obliged to remove from various estates in that island more than 100 indentured Coolies in consequence of their being in a dying state from want of food and general ill-usage; whether some of those removed have since died; whether Mr. Denham, the protector of immigrants, has been by direction of the Governor prosecuted for manslaughter; if so, with what result; whether the 400 Coolies now in Grenada on the estates of the persons who ill-treated the others are to be left there; and, whether, as Coolie immigration can hardly be done away with entirely, he will take steps in order that such abuses shall not recur?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH: Sir, it is true that Mr. Kerr felt called upon to remove to hospital more than 100 Coolies from the estates in Grenada on which they had been located. On some estates complaints were made of insufficient food and medical attendance. Proceedings have been taken against the managers. The manager of one estate has been convicted of neglecting to supply the Coolies allotted to him with sufficient food and has been fined £50, and the Coolies from that estate have been allotted to an estate belonging to another person in a healthy locality. On other estates on which no complaints were made the Coolies were found to be in an unsatisfactory state of health, owing partly perhaps to the exceptionally unhealthy season, and partly to the unsatisfactory accommodation provided for them. Since the removal one or two of the Coolies have died; but the rest are doing well. They will not, however, be allowed to go back to the estates unless satisfactory accommodation has been first provided for them. Measures have been taken for more thorough inspection of estates and for more regular medical attendance, and I have reason to believe that the proprietors of estates are exerting themselves to remedy the state of things complained of. On the occasion of the removal one man who was left behind by the captain of the ship which was sent to remove them died. Proceedings were taken against Mr. Denham in the matter, but he was exonerated from blame. There appears, however, to have been a failure of justice as regards the really culpable parties, which is being inquired into.

MR. W. E. FORSTER asked, whether the 400 Coolies now in Grenada, on the estates of the persons who ill-treated the others, were to be left there; and whether Papers in connection with the subject would be produced?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, he thought he had already answered the Question. The Coolies had been removed, though not to the number of 400. The owners and managers of those estates on which they resided had been prosecuted and one had been fined; and the Coolies would not be allowed to return until proper accommodation for them had been provided.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA— THE TREATY OF WASHINGTON — THE FISHERY AWARD.—QUESTION.

MR. GOURLEY asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If he has received from the United States Government the amount awarded by a majority of the Halifax Commissioners, under Clause 18 of the Treaty of Washington; if so, how he intends disposing of the amount; whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to re-consider the circumstances under which the Award was obtained with a view to the reduction of the amount; and, if he is prepared to state how far the fishermen of Newfoundland exceeded their rights in interfering with United States fishermen when fishing and drying their nets on a Sunday?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, that the amount of the Halifax Award—namely, $5,500,000—was paid by the Government of the United States to Her Majesty's Government on the 21st of November last, and was now being disposed of between Newfoundland and the Dominion of Canada. It would be seen, by the Papers published in The London Gazette, and since presented to Parliament, that Her Majesty's Government had no intention of re-opening the question as to the amount of the Award. The question how far the fishermen of Newfoundland exceeded their rights in interfering with United States fishermen was at present under the consideration of the Government.

MARRIED WOMEN'S PROPERTY ACT, 1870—LEGISLATION.

QUESTION.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether his attention has been called to a decision lately given at the Manchester Police Court to the effect that a married woman judicially separated from her husband, and to whom a protection order had been granted, had nevertheless no legal redress against her husband who had taken away her property; and, whether, if such be the state of the Law, he will propose the necessary amendment of "The Married Women's Property Act, 1870?"

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR JOHN HOLKER), in reply, said, before the Question of the hon. Member appeared on the Paper his attention was not called to the subject. Since Notice of the Question was given he had endeavoured, but without success, to ascertain the nature of the decision. If the hon. Member would furnish him with further particulars, he would be happy to state whether, in his opinion, any amendment of the law was necessary.

ARTIZANS AND LABOURERS DWELLINGS ACT, 1875 — INQUIRY AS TO OPERATION.—QUESTION.

SIR UGHTRED KAY - SHUTTLEWORTH asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, respecting his statement on July 12th last that the time had come when inquiry should be specially made in reference to the towns in England where an official Report under "The Artizans and Labourers Dwellings Act, 1875," has been made and no action taken upon it, Whether he has taken any steps in such inquiry, and, if so, with what result; and, whether he will lay the Correspondence before Parliament?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, he had corresponded with the Local Government Board on the subject referred to; and if the hon. Baronet would move for that Correspondence, there would be no objection to its being laid on the Table.

THE GOVERNMENT OF INDIA ACT, 1858.—AFGHANISTAN (EXPENSES OF MILITARY OPERATIONS.)

QUESTION.

MR. FAWCETT asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether, in view of the provision contained in the 41st section of the Government of India Act of 1858, which runs as follows:—

“That the expenditure of the Revenues of India, both in India and elsewhere, shall be subject to the control of the Secretary of State in Council, and no grant or appropriation of any part of such Revenues, or of any other property coming into the possession of the Secretary of State in Council by virtue of this Act, shall be made without the concurrence of a majority of votes at a meeting of the Council;”

if he will inform the House by what authority the expenditure hitherto incurred in connection with the military expedition against the Ameer of Afghanistan has been sanctioned?

MR. E. STANHOPE: Sir, the expenditure was incurred on the authority of the Secretary of State for India. The matter was fully considered in 1869, and the Duke of Argyll, speaking in the House of Lords on behalf of his Government, said—

“It is the opinion of all whom I have consulted, including the Law Officers of the Crown, that under the present Statute it is unquestionably in the power of the Secretary of State for India to order in India any service which may be required. Payment for this service is made in India, and the disallowance of that payment is not competent to the Council, without the sanction of the Secretary of State.”—[3 Hansard, cxcv. 1074.]

MR. FAWCETT: As I feel that the question is one of very great importance, and as I believe the money has been spent not only in India, but beyond the Frontier of India—[“Order!”]—I am only desirous of having an opportunity of calling attention to the subject; and I will on an early occasion move a Resolution to the effect that, in the opinion of this House, the Secretary of State, by sanctioning the expenditure which he had done, has infringed the spirit and the letter of the Government of India Act.

AFGHANISTAN—REPLY OF AMEER TO ULTIMATUM.—QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether a letter from the Ameer Shere Ali has been received by Major Cavagnari; and, if so, whether its contents are known to Her Majesty's Government?

MR. E. STANHOPE: Sir, the following telegram will, I think, explain all the circumstances as to the receipt of the Ameer's answer:—

“Cavagnari reports arrival at Dakka on 30th November of a subordinate officer of Ameer's, with letter in reply to ultimatum. Messenger had reached Basawal 22nd, and there heard of Ali Musjid defeat and returned to Cabul. Letter is dated 19th, but is believed to have been re-written at Cabul after news of Ali Musjid. Summary of contents follow in cipher.”

We do not know when its contents became known to the Indian Government; but the summary was received in England on the night of December 5, and was not seen by any Member of the Cabinet until Friday, December 6. The statement in The Daily News, to the contrary effect, is a simple fabrication. The summary of contents was not published, because the full text was expected. That arrived yesterday, and was at once published in every quarter.

CRIMINAL LAW—CASE OF JOHN NOLAN.—QUESTION.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY wished to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department the Question of which he had given him private Notice, What course he proposes to pursue in reference to the case of John Nolan, a lad of 18 years of age, who died in the House of Correction, and whose death the Coroner's Jury found to be accelerated by the repeated and excessive punishment of bread and water diet, which was ordered by the Governor and sanctioned by the Surgeon; and, whether he will be good enough to procure a Copy of the Depositions and lay them on the Table of the House, together with any Correspondence that has taken place between Sir

W. H. Wyatt, the Chairman of the Visiting Justices of Middlesex, and himself, on the working of the new Prisons Act, or any other of the metropolitan or city magistrates on the same subject?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, the hon. Gentleman's Question was a painful matter, and one which affected the character of two officers of the very highest standing, one of them being a medical gentleman who had been in two prisons during a large number of years. He found the circumstances were very bad indeed; and he had therefore written to the President of the College of Physicians to ask him to name some gentleman who would assist him by going with another officer to make the strictest inquiry on the subject. The President had most handsomely stated he would be glad to undertake the inquiries himself. He (Mr. Assheton Cross) had accordingly ordered Dr. Guy, who was on the Commission for Public Prisons, and the President of the Royal College of Physicians, and any other gentleman they should agree on, to make the very strictest inquiry. Until, therefore, he received their Report, he did not think it would be right to press the subject any further. He had, however, already taken action in the matter, by ordering that the recommendation of the Jury should be carried out as to having one physician attached to each prison, instead of one for the two, as had been the case for a great number of years. He was ready to produce the Papers if the hon. Member for Galway would confer with him as to the form in which they should be laid on the Table.

AFGHANISTAN—THE FURTHER CORRESPONDENCE.—QUESTION.

MR. W. E. FORSTER asked the Under Secretary of State for India, When the further Afghan Papers would be in the possession of Members, especially the Proclamation of War, which he had hoped would be issued by itself, and must have been in the hands of the Government for some days?

MR. E. STANHOPE, in reply, said, that some Papers had already been issued in a few cases, and were in possession of several Members of the House.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

THE ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.

(MR. WHITBREAD).

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [6th December], "That the said Address be now read a second time."

Debate resumed.

MR. WHITBREAD, in rising to move the Amendment of which he had given Notice, said: Sir, it was not my desire to have moved the Motion of which I gave Notice upon this occasion. I should much have preferred if it had stood as a Resolution by itself. I had no desire to break in upon the practice—I think a very good one—which has prevailed in recent years of allowing the Address to pass without any Amendment being proposed. I was anxious, for another reason, to have moved my Resolution independently; because I did not desire that hon. Members opposite should suppose that my Motion was moved as an Amendment to any Vote for Supplies for our Army now engaged in Afghanistan. What I wish to obtain is the decision of the House upon the subject, as disclosed in the Papers which have been laid upon the Table. My Motion refers to the past conduct of Her Majesty's Government; and I do not wish that it should be mixed up with questions of the present or of the future. I am well aware of the vast interests which are touched by those who speak of the affairs of our Indian Empire; but I do not believe that any harm can arise from arguments directed solely to considerations of strict and impartial justice. I do not wish to be led away into saying anything upon the various questions that surround the one which I wish to bring under the notice of the House. I do not intend to say more than a single word upon the war which is now going on, and that is, as I have already said in another place, that it seems to me to be unnecessary and unjust. But, although I should not advise the stoppage of Supplies, I think that in the moment of success we might do that which we could not do if we were to suffer a reverse; and I maintain that directly we have obtained a substantial success, we should be justified in doing our best to terminate the war. I would further express a hope that any demands which may be made by the Indian Government upon Shere Ali should be as little humiliating as possible; and I cannot help thinking that the course of the debates will show that, at all events, such grave errors have been committed that it is our strict and bounden duty to come down somewhat in the conditions which some might deem it necessary to impose, and from the arrogant position we have assumed. Now, in the first place, I must ask the House to consider what has been the policy of previous Governments in relation to this question. The first extract in the Papers which have been laid before us to which I would ask the attention of the House will be found in page 44 of the Afghanistan Papers. It is an extract from a despatch of the 4th of January, 1869, from the Government of Lord Lawrence to the India Office at home. They set forth in paragraph 5 the policy which they recommend. They say—

"We venture to sum up the policy which is recommended or supported, in various languages and by various arguments in our Minutes, somewhat as follows:—We object to any active interference in the affairs of Afghanistan by the deputation of a high British officer with or without a contingent, or by the forcible or amicable occupation of any post or tract in that country beyond our own Frontier, inasmuch as we think such a measure would, under present circumstances, engender irritation, defiance, and hatred in the minds of the Afghans, without in the least strengthening our power either for attack or defence. We think it impolitic and unwise to decrease any of the difficulties which would be entailed on Russia, if that Power seriously thought of invading India, as we should certainly decrease them if we left our own Frontier, and met her half way in a difficult country, and, possibly, in the midst of a hostile or exasperated population. We foresee no limits to the expenditure which such a move might require, and we protest against the necessity of having to impose additional taxation on the people of India, who are unwilling, as it is, to bear such pressure for measures which they can both understand and appreciate. And we think that the objects which we have at heart, in common with all interested in India, may be attained by an attitude of readiness and firmness on our Frontier, and by giving all our care and expending all our resources for the attainment of practical and sound ends over which we can exercise an effective and immediate control."

That was the policy which was pronounced by Lord Lawrence's Government, and it was the policy which was followed in the time of Lord Mayo and Lord Northbrook—what they desired to see was a strong, just, and merciful Government established in Afghanistan, which should be an independent State, and friendly to the English Government. I should like, in the next place, to read an extract from a private letter of Lord Mayo, which was written not long after the Umballa Durbar, which showed that Lord Mayo's views were the same as those enunciated in the despatch of Lord Lawrence's Government. The extract is taken from Hunter's Life of Lord Mayo, and it appears in page 271 of that work. It is as follows:—

"Surround India with strong, friendly, and independent States, who will have more interest in keeping well with us than with any other Power, and we are safe. The Central Asia question is only a bugbear if prudence be observed, and will have no reality for many years to come."

In another letter he said—

"Our influence has been considerably strengthened both in our own territories and also in the States of Central Asia by the Umballa meeting, and if we can only persuade people that our policy is non-intervention and peace, that England is at this moment the only non-aggressive Power in Asia, we should stand on a pinnacle of power that we have never enjoyed before."

That was Lord Mayo's opinion, as expressed in a private letter. At page 93 of the Afghanistan Papers will be found paragraph 4 of the despatch of the Government of India to the Duke of Argyll, dated the 1st of July, 1869, which is as follows:—

"We entirely agree with the principles laid down in Your Grace's despatch, i. e., 'that it is for the interest of our Indian Empire that there should be a strong and settled government in Afghanistan, such as may promote commerce with us and protect the people of the country from the evils of civil war; that the discretion of the Indian Government should be kept absolutely free as to the occasions on which such assistance should be given or withheld; that further, we should abstain from exercising 'any interference in the internal affairs of Afghanistan,' and give no pledge which would lead the Ameer to believe that we should ever countenance or support a notoriously cruel and oppressive Government.'"

It will be remembered that, shortly after Lord Mayo became Viceroy, at the wish of Shere Ali a Conference was held at Umballa, the result of which was stated in the despatch from which I have just read. No doubt when Shere Ali met Lord Mayo he asked for more than the British Government could give him; for years before the Conference Shere Ali had been engaged in a tedious civil war, and had great difficulty in seating himself firmly on the Throne. He desired, therefore, not only pecuniary assistance from the British Government, but also dynastic pledges, which would secure for the heir of his choice the succession to the Throne, and guarantee his country against the evils of civil war. Lord Mayo received him nobly; and all who remembered and deplored the noble Lord, will recollect that he was well calculated to make an impression on such a Ruler as Shere Ali. Lord Mayo thus summed up the practical results of the Conference in the despatch dated the 1st of July, 1869, which will be found in page 94 of the Papers—

"While we distinctly intimated to the Ameer that, under no circumstances, should a British soldier ever cross his Frontier to assist him in coercing his rebellious subjects; that no European officers would be placed as Residents in his cities; that no fixed subsidy or money allowance would be given for any named period; that no promise of assistance in other ways would be made; that no Treaty would be entered into, obliging us under every circumstance to recognise him and his descendants Rulers of Afghanistan, yet that we were prepared by the most open and absolute present recognition, . . . to give all the moral support in our power, and that in addition we were willing to assist him with money, arms, ammunition, Native artificers, and in other ways, whenever we deemed it possible or desirable to do so."

Having read that paragraph once or twice, I was a little astonished the other evening at hearing my hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for India (Mr. E. Stanhope) assert that no promise whatever had ever been given to the Ameer that he should not be required to receive British officers in his country, and that the point was never mentioned between him and the Ameer. According to The Times, my hon. Friend ventured to say that no such promise had ever been given; and that he could only reply that Lord Mayo made no mention of such a communication in his despatch home, and had never mentioned it to the Ameer. It is difficult to reconcile that statement with the paragraph which I have just read.

Mr. E. STANHOPE: I did not say exactly what I am reported to have said. What I did say was, that in the conversation which took place between the Ameer and Lord Mayo the latter never mentioned the subject of a Resident Agent.

Mr. WHITBREAD: The hon. Member has mistaken my point, which was, not whether the subject was ever mentioned between the individual Viceroy and the individual Ameer, but whether such a promise had ever been given. The gist of the hon. Member's argument was that no attempt was made to impose a Resident Agent upon the Ruler of Afghanistan contrary to a promise that had been given, and he said that no such promise was ever given. But the subject was thus summed up in the very next page of Lord Mayo's despatch—

"The position of affairs at the close of the Conference may, in the Viceroy's words, confidentially addressed to Your Grace, be summed up as follows:—Firstly, what the Ameer is not to have—no Treaty, no fixed subsidy, no European troops, officers, or Residents, no dynastic pledges. Secondly, what he is to have—warm countenance and support, discouragement of his rivals, such material assistance as we may consider absolutely necessary for his immediate wants, constant and friendly communication through our Commissioner at Peshawur, and our Native Agents in Afghanistan; he, on his part, undertaking to do all he can to maintain peace on our Frontier, and to comply with all our wishes on matters connected with trade."

After reading that extract, the hon. Member cannot contend that no promise was ever made to the Ameer that he should not be required to receive European officers as Residents. Very possibly the subject was never mentioned between the Ameer and the Viceroy; but that was only because it was an unmentionable topic. Dost Mahomed, the father of the present Ruler of Afghanistan had said if we desired to remain friends with the Afghans we ought not to force them to receive European officers as Residents. However, the fact is that at the time of the Umballa Conference the subject was broached to the Ameer; and if Lord Mayo did not do so himself it was on account of Shere Ali's known hostility to the project. I will not weary the House by recounting the various occasions on which the policy of non-intervention has been approved in this and in the other House of Parliament. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer has twice expressed his approval of the policy of non-intervention—on the 9th of July, 1869, and on the 22nd of April, 1873. I also recollect a very strong statement of Lord Derby in the same direction—to the effect that the Protectorate of Afghanistan must necessarily follow, if we forced the Ameer against his will to receive our officer as a Resident. It is desirable, at this point, to call the attention of the House to what was our understanding with Russia; and if hon. Members will turn to the Papers they will find the understanding set forth at page 104 of the Papers. In the 6th paragraph of the despatch from Lord Northbrook to the Duke of Argyll, dated the 30th of June, 1873, it is said—

“In the latter part of the year 1869 the presence of Mr. Douglas Forsyth at St. Petersburg afforded an opportunity for a more full discussion of the proposals which were under the consideration of the two Governments. The subject of the influence which should be exercised by Russia and Great Britain respectively, over the States on their Frontiers was frankly entered into, and it was agreed that beyond the limit of the Provinces which the Ameer of Afghanistan then held he should not attempt to exercise any interference or influence, that the good offices of England should be exerted to restrain him from all thought of aggression, and that, similarly, Russia should exercise all her influence to restrain Bokhara from transgressing the limits of Afghan territory.”

And then, at the end of paragraph 7, Prince Gortchakoff is reported to have “stated that he saw no objection to English officers visiting Cabul, though he agreed with the Earl of Mayo that Russian Agents should not do so.”

I think that that is an important admission on the part of the Russian Representative. At the bottom of the page we shall see the further declaration of Prince Gortchakoff. It is said that “Prince Gortchakoff, on the conclusion of these communications, requested Sir Andrew Buchanan to tell Lord Clarendon that ‘as both Governments are free from all arrière-pensées, ambitious views, or unfriendly feelings towards each other, the more fully and frankly all questions connected with Central Asia are discussed between them the more effectually will the ‘mists’ be blown away which, through the misrepresentations of over-zealous subordinate Agents, may, at any time, hang over them.’”

Moreover, the result of the communication that had passed was thus summarized by Prince Gortchakoff in a despatch to Count Brunnow on the 1st of November, 1871—

(a.) “That the territory in the actual possession at the present moment of Shere Ali Khan should be considered to constitute the limits of Afghanistan.

(b.) “That beyond these limits the Ameer should make no attempt to exercise any influence or interference, and that the English Government should do all in their power to restrain him from any attempts at aggression.

(c.) “That for their part the Imperial Government should use all their influence to prevent any attack by the Ameer of Bokhara upon Afghan territory.

“These principles had been unreservedly accepted both by the Cabinet of London and the Governor General of India.” — [Afghanistan, No. 1, p. 105.]

That was the position of affairs between Russia and England as relating to Afghanistan at the time of which I am speaking; and, as will be seen on referring to page 116, Shere Ali was made fully acquainted with it. I would here note that, as will be found upon the following page (page 106), it was about this time that General Kaufmann

“assured the Ameer of Afghanistan that he had given no encouragement to Abdool Rahman Khan, the nephew of the Ameer, who was residing as a refugee in Russian territory and was supposed to entertained designs upon the tranquillity of Afghanistan.”

This Abdool Rahman Khan is the man who, of all others, could be most formidable to the Ameer—much more so even than Yakooob, his son. He was the son of Shere Ali's elder brother, who carried on a civil war against him for so many years, and very nearly prevented him from gaining the Throne. Abdool was still anxious to stir up trouble on the border, and would have done so if General Kaufmann had not dissuaded him. General Kaufmann told him that living within the Turkoman country as a refugee he was not to abuse the hospitality he was receiving by making any attack upon Afghanistan, saying that Russia had no quarrel either with the Ameer of Afghanistan or with the British Government. At that time it does not appear that Russia was doing anything in her relations with Afghanistan of which this country could complain. I assert that somewhat boldly; because I wish it to be clearly understood that it was the case that up to that time there was nothing of which we had cause to or did complain. This is a fact which I wish to be distinctly understood. In the year 1873 Lord Northbrook had occasion to make the Ameer acquainted with the decision arrived at, both with regard to the boundary of Afghanistan and that of Seistan. The latter, which was the boundary between Afghanistan and Persia, gave considerable offence to Shere Ali, and Lord Northbrook, wishing to explain the matter to him, proposed to send a British officer to Cabul for the purpose. Here I beg the House to observe the course of action taken by Shere Ali. He declined to receive a British officer, and proposed instead that his own Minister should wait upon the Viceroy. Lord Northbrook accepted that proposal; and I mention this point, because it is one constantly recurring in reference to proposals on our part to send European officers to Cabul, which proposals have been just as constantly refused. It is well to bear this in mind, in order that we may the better understand the question when we come to deal with that part of it which relates to the refusal of the Ameer to receive the last Mission. When the Afghan Envoy, Noor Mahomed Shah, came to Simla he opened up, besides the two questions of the boundaries, a great many other questions. He again asked for an unconditional Treaty, his master having complained always that the only Treaty between Afghanistan and England—that of 1855—was a one-sided Treaty, in that it bound the Ruler of Afghanistan to a great many things and bound England to very little. He therefore wanted an unconditional guarantee against external attack; but when asked whether the Ameer would receive European Residents, the Envoy replied that, in the interest of both countries, he could not recommend that the point should be pushed, and that branch of the question was dropped. Lord Northbrook, after referring home, felt justified in giving to the Ameer assurances which went rather beyond those of Lord Mayo; but he got no unconditional guarantee. The result was, that the Envoy went away not quite so well pleased as did Shere Ali from the Durbar at Umballa. He had got assurances that went even further; but I believe the explanation of it is this—that Shere Ali put rather too hopeful a construction upon the promises made to him by Lord Mayo. Though I admit that those promises were very carefully worded, I cannot help thinking that part of the subsequent disappointment of the Ameer results from this. There is a rather curious little reference to this in the Papers, where it is stated, at page 201, that Sir Lewis Pelly thought, in reading over the agreement come to after the Umballa Conference, he detected in the Persian version words which seemed to convey that the English Government would visit with "severe punishment," instead of with "severe displeasure," any attempt on the part of his rivals to disturb his position as Ruler of Cabul, or to stir up civil war in the Kingdom. The reason why no more definite agreement was come to between Lord Northbrook and Noor Mahomed Shah was that, though the Viceroy was prepared there and then to give him something more definite, the Envoy declared that he had no power to treat further. Now, we come to the first part of the story, as it relates to the present Government. On the 22nd of January, 1875, Lord Salisbury instructed the Government of India to address the Ameer, with a view to getting his sanction to a Resident Agent in Afghanistan. This Instruction is conveyed in a despatch, which commences by stating that Her Majesty's Government have followed with anxious attention the progress of events in Central Asia and on the Frontiers of Persia and Afghanistan, and then proceeds as follows:—

"I have therefore to instruct you to take measures, with as much expedition as the circumstances of the case permit, for procuring the assent of the Ameer to the establishment of a British Agency at Herat. When this is accomplished it may be desirable to take a similar step with regard to Candahar. I do not suggest any similar step with respect to Cabul, as I am sensible of the difficulties which are interposed by the fanatic violence of the people."

The next paragraph is a very interesting one. It says—

"The Ameer has more than once in former years expressed his readiness to permit the presence of an Agent at Herat, and it is therefore not possible that, if his intentions are still loyal, he will make any serious difficulty now."—[Ibid. p. 129.]

This, I think, was the beginning of the mistaken policy. I have no doubt Lord Salisbury believed that the Ameer had really consented to receive these Agents; and upon that point I should like to call the attention of the House to one or two other extracts from the Papers which are before us, because it really seems to me to have been the beginning of the mischief—this belief that the Ameer would consent to receive the Envoys. The evidences upon which Lord Salisbury founded that belief are two notes of private conversations which Captain Grey, who acted as Persian interpreter, had with Noor Mahomed Shah at Umballa, and which will be found in page 173 of the Papers. In the despatch which Lord Northbrook wrote home in reference to this one of Lord Salisbury, he expressed an opinion that it was very doubtful, though perhaps possible, that the Ameer had made this concession, or agreed to accept the Residents, in a private conversation with Captain Grey; and he added, that if such an assent was given, it was given in a private conversation, of which there was no official record; and that, therefore, it would be impossible upon such a foundation to press upon the Ameer the reception of these Agents. Captain Grey's note of the conversation which, as I have said, is to be found on page 173 of the Papers, is very curious. It is contained in an "Extract from Memorandum of Conversations between Captain Grey and Noor Mahomed Shah, dated 31st March, and 1st April, 1869;" and in the first conversation it is recorded that the Ameer

[First Night.]

"is open to any proposition for securing his northern border, while doubtful of any Russian power for aggression for some years to come, still thinks precautions should be taken; would construct forts on his own part or under our superintendence and admit European garrisons if ever desired; would gladly see an Agent or Engineer superintendent there (in Balkh), Herat, or anywhere but actually in Cabul, which might lead to the supposition of his being a puppet."

But on the very next day Captain Grey had another conversation with this same Noor Mahomed Shah, and it is recorded that—

"The Secretary asked him if the Ameer would sanction Native Agents in Afghanistan either as visitors or as permanent residents, supposing the British Government wished it; the Minister replied that he did not wish to commit himself, and asked, rather anxiously, whether European Agents were intended, observing at the same time that it was of no use to send any but Mahomedans, Hindoos were of no good at all."

Mr. Whitbread

That is the evidence, as far as Captain Grey is concerned; and the question is of some importance, because it is referred to again in the Instructions given to Sir Lewis Pelly in reference to the Conference at Peshawur. I have yet to learn that the assent to the Resident Agents was given, or given in such a form that it could possibly be used against the Ameer at all; and I want to draw the attention of the House to a short statement which has been made by Mr. Seton-Karr, who was Foreign Secretary to the Government of India in 1869, at the time of the Umballa Durbar. Mr. Seton-Karr has not authorized me, personally, to make use of his statement; but he entrusted it to a friend, with full power to use it as he thought most fitting. Mr. Seton-Karr states that "he was the bearer of every confidential communication between Lord Mayo and the Ameer, and was present at every interview between them. He gave Lord Lawrence an account of what occurred in a letter dated the 5th of April, 1869, which he has authorized Lord Lawrence to use. In that letter there is the following paragraph:—'He, Shere Ali, is told that we don't want British officers as Residents at Cabul or anywhere else, and he says they would do him harm in the eyes of his people.'"

I can hardly believe, therefore, that there was a real assent to the reception of these officers as Residents. If there was, it was given in very private conversations with Captain Grey, and on condition of dynastic pledges and an almost unconditional Treaty, without which nothing would have been done. After a delay of some months, Lord Northbrook's Government in India replied to the despatch of Lord Salisbury. In that reply it was set forth that, in the opinion of Lord Northbrook, Lord Salisbury very much underrated the value of the Native Agents the Government already had in Afghanistan; he denied that any real information which it was necessary for them to possess had ever been kept back by these Agents; he asked what piece of information which they ought to have known could be pointed to which had not been received from these Agents; and he went on to express the opinion entertained by everyone around him that the value of British Residents in Afghanistan would be positively nil, unless the Ameer and his people cordially welcomed them. There is not wanting some evidence of this. There are the cases, both recent, of Major Todd at Herat, and Major Lumsden at Candahar, both of whom were as much imprisoned as they would have been if shut up in a gaol, with regard to the information they could get or transmit to their Government. They were watched on all sides; and no one was allowed to have access to them, except those who could tell the story which it was desired should be known. There is, in short, no more difficult position than that of a British officer residing in the midst of a hostile population, determined that he should neither obtain, nor transmit any information which could be of value. The fact of the matter is that, as things at present stand, more could be learnt of Afghanistan affairs by an official residing at Peshawur, than by similar functionaries living in Herat or Candahar. With regard to the larger question—whether the Ameer would willingly receive these Residents—Lord Northbrook took considerable pains to ascertain the views of all those who were entitled to speak on the subject, and for that purpose he addressed a communication to the Lieutenant Governor of the Punjab, in order to obtain his views, and those of such officials as might be considered competent to advise on the following points:—

“First, whether the Ameer of Afghanistan would willingly consent to the appointment of British officers as Residents at Herat and Candahar, or at either place; second, whether the presence of such Residents at either place would be advantageous to the British Government; third, whether the Lieutenant Governor was satisfied with the sufficiency and accuracy of the intelligence received from the British Agent at Cabul, and if not, whether his Honour could suggest any way of procuring fuller and more accurate intelligence.”—[Afghanistan, No. 1, p. 130.]

The answers received to these questions were practically unanimous. The opinion of the Punjab Government, set forth at page 132 of the Papers, is in these words—

“If the concurrence of all those who may be supposed to have the means of forming a correct judgment of the sentiments of the Ameer is of any value, we must be prepared to find him most unwilling to receive a British Agent at Herat. On this the Lieutenant Governor of the Punjab, Sir Richard Pollock, Major-General Reynell Taylor, Colonel Munro, and Captain Cavagnari are all agreed, and their views are confirmed—1. By those of Nawab Foujdar

Khan and Nawab Gholam Hassan Khan, who have successively served as British Agent at Cabul, and who have means of knowing the present sentiments of the Ameer. 2. By the opinion of Noor Mahomed Shah, the Cabul Envoy, who, when at Simla in 1873, advised the Foreign Secretary that a specific request should not be preferred to the Ameer for British officers to be stationed within the Afghan dominions. 3. By the recent acts of the Ameer in objecting to permit Sir D. T. Forsyth to traverse Balkh on his return journey from Yarkund and in discouraging Colonel Baker from returning to India from Teheran via Cabul.”

There was a remarkable agreement among all these officers on the subject; and it seems to me to have been a very strong step for the Government at home to re-open this question, and to insist upon sending these Resident Agents into the territories of the Ameer against his will. Lord Salisbury, believing that the Ameer had previously consented, remarked that if he was still loyal it was not possible that he should refuse now to receive them. On this the Indian Government very properly remarked that it did not necessarily follow that because the Ameer declined to receive these Residents he had become disloyal. There were strong grounds for his refusal; because there cannot be a doubt that there was a very strong party—if not an unanimous people—in Afghanistan opposed to the reception of these Residents. I, for one, doubt very much whether the Ameer could have maintained his rule if he had permitted these Agents to reside in his dominions. What did his people believe on the subject? You will find, from every page of this Book, their belief to have been that if once they allowed these British Residents to come in their independence was gone. You may cast all sorts of hard words against these people of Afghanistan. They have been called barbarous, and I daresay they are; they have been described as treacherous, and I daresay the description is accurate; they may be called an uncivilized race, who will not admit strangers within their country if they can help it; but, at all events, they are independent, and love their independence. Neither Lord Salisbury nor Lord Lytton seem to have realized the feeling entertained by the whole people of Afghanistan upon this subject of the British Resident. They said—If we once admit him, he will be writing all sorts of reports about us to his Government, and then they will come and interfere with us and take our country from us; at any rate, it is not possible that we should maintain our independence in the management of our own internal affairs if we once admit him. Before I leave this despatch, there is one more paragraph which I wish to mention, and that is the one in which Sir Richard Pollock expresses his

"conviction that no unfavourable change whatever had occurred in the disposition of His Highness, and that he leaned as much as ever on the British Government." — [Ibid. p. 134.]

Lord Northbrook, in the same despatch, reminded Lord Salisbury of the promise given at the Umballa Conference on the question of the Resident British Agents, and begged to be allowed to continue the conciliatory policy followed by so many Viceroys. It was not long, however, before the Home Government returned to the charge; and on the 19th of November, 1876, Lord Salisbury wrote a despatch to the Indian Government, in which he urged them to find—or, as he said, "if need be, to create"—an opportunity for sending a Mission to secure the assent of the Ameer to the British Residents in his dominions. Lord Northbrook's Government did not take so long to reply this time; and I am glad to say that they adhered firmly to the policy which they had already announced as their wish to follow. They asked for a re-consideration of the whole question; expressed a doubt whether Lord Salisbury had weighed all the reasons advanced in their former communications; and repeated some of them. With respect to the proposal for finding or creating an occasion for sending a Mission to the Ameer with the object indicated, they very properly pointed out that if it were thought necessary to send such a Mission at all, the most advisable course would be—

"To state frankly and fully to the Ameer the real purpose of the Mission, and to invite him to enter cordially into those closer relations with the British Government which the Mission is to endeavour to establish. The Ameer and his advisers are shrewd enough to understand that only matters of grave political importance could induce us to send a special Mission to His Highness' Court. If the Mission were ostensibly directed to objects of minor political importance, the Ameer and his officials would be incredulous. He might then decline to discuss the weightier questions brought forward by our Envoy, and in all probability his confidence in us would be shaken, especially as the proposal to establish British Agents in Afghanistan is, as we pointed out in our despatch of the 7th of June, a departure from the understanding arrived at between Lord Mayo and the Ameer at the Umballa Conference of 1869." — [Ibid. p. 161.]

Then they asked over again that they might not be driven to depart from the policy which was pursued by Lord Lawrence and by Lord Canning and Lord Mayo; and they pointed out that if these British Agents were sent into Afghanistan without the cordial consent of the Ameer, they would run a risk of having insults offered to them for which it would be difficult to hold the Ameer responsible. The despatch also pointed out over again, with considerable detail, the reasons which guided them in asking a further consideration for this matter in their former despatch. It was hardly possible, therefore, that the Viceroy and his Government could have more manfully or sturdily maintained their policy; and I am glad that they did so. Only conceive the way in which this attempt to force British Residents upon Afghanistan was to be carried out! Of what nature were the men with whom they had to deal? Fancy an Englishman, or even a man endowed with all the shrewdness of a Scotchman, endeavouring to create an opportunity, and putting forward some flimsy pretext to suspicious Asiatics, thoroughly awake to what was going on, and then imagining that they would not see through it! Lord Lytton succeeded Lord Northbrook as Viceroy; and we are told in one of his despatches that he went out to India well prepared to deal with this question, after previous communication with the Government at home and with the Russian Ambassador. I do not at all complain of his communicating with the Russian Ambassador before leaving London. It was natural that the Viceroy who was going out should take every opportunity of learning the views of the Russian Ambassador; but there is a very ugly interpretation to be put on some things that occurred afterwards in connection with this proceeding. Lord Lytton went out with powers to give more definite declarations of support to the Ameer, and to obtain more definite arrangements on the subject of Resident Agents in Afghanistan. These powers appeared partly to be contained in the Instructions drawn out for him by the Secretary of State. These Instructions state that—

"Her Majesty's Government are, therefore, prepared to sanction and support any more definite declaration which may, in your judgment, secure to their unaltered policy the advantages of which it has been hitherto deprived by an apparent doubt of its sincerity. But they must reserve to themselves entire freedom of judgment as to the character of circumstances involving the obligation of material support to the Ameer, and it must be distinctly understood that only in some clear case of unprovoked aggression would such an obligation arise."

And further—

"The Ameer must be made to understand that, subject to all fair allowance for the condition of the country, and the character of the population, territories ultimately dependent upon British power for their defence must not be closed to those of the Queen's officers or subjects who may be duly authorized to enter them."—[Ibid. p. 159.]

That communication when made to the Ameer would naturally strengthen him in his notion, that when once he had admitted British Agents there would be an end of his independence. Lord Lytton wrote, on the 5th May, 1876, his first letter to the Ameer. It will be found at page 174 of the Blue Book. It was nominally from the Commissioner at Peshawar to the Ameer; but, of course, it was written under the instigation and the directions of the Viceroy. He says to Shere Ali, that as soon as he heard of the arrival of the Viceroy in India

"I lost no time in waiting on him; and in the course of a lengthened interview with which I was honoured by his Excellency, the present Viceroy inquired very cordially after your Highness's health and welfare, and those of his Highness Abdoollah Jan; intimating his intention of deputed to your Highness, as soon as the necessary arrangements can be made, his friend, Sir Lewis Pelly, who has accompanied his Excellency from England, and who will return so soon as his interviews with your Highness are completed. Sir Lewis Pelly will be accompanied by Dr. Bellew and Major St. John for the purpose of delivering to your Highness in person a khurseta, informing your Highness of his Excellency's accession to office, and formally announcing to your Highness the addition which Her Majesty the Queen has been pleased to make to Her Sovereign titles in respect to Her Empire of India."

That was the opportunity, or the pretext, which the Viceroy found or created, or rather, which I suppose was created for him at home. The Ameer looked at the last few lines of that letter—for that is the pith of it—and soon saw through it. The letter, after assuring the Ameer of the friendly feelings by which the Viceroy's intention was prompted, went on to say that

"Sir Lewis Pelly, who is honoured by the new Viceroy with his Excellency's fullest confidence, will be able to discuss with your Highness matters of common interest to the two Governments."

I do not complain of the tone of that letter; but there you have the pretext of announcing his own accession to office and the assumption of the title of Empress; and then comes the pith of the letter, which, as in many other cases, is contained in the last line, and of course Shere Ali, being pretty wideawake to what was on foot, was not deceived by it. The Ameer replied on the 22nd of May. His reply will be found at page 175 of the Blue Book. He says—

"In the particular of the coming of the Sahibs for the purpose of certain (some) matters of the two Governments is this—that the Agent of this friend formerly personally held political parleys at the Station of Simla on these subjects. These having been considered sufficient, and efficient, were entered in two letters . . . and need not be repeated now."

And he goes on to say—

"At this time, if there be any new parleys for the purpose of refreshing and benefiting the God-given State of Afghanistan entertained in the thoughts, then let it be hinted, so that a confidential Agent of this friend, arriving in that place and being presented with the things concealed in the generous heart of the English Government, should reveal them to the suppliant at the Divine Throne, in order that the matters weighed by a minute and exact investigation may be committed to the pen of affectionate writing."

I think it is clear from that, that Shere Ali saw through the pretexts of announcing the arrival of the Viceroy and the addition of Empress to the Queen's titles. He saw that we wanted him to do something in reference to British Agents, or something else, and he first wished to know what it was. This answer appears to have angered the Viceroy; and, as will be found at page 175, the Native Agent at the Court of Cabul wrote a letter, which was, to a certain extent, explanatory of the Ameer's reply. The Native Agent says the Ameer was afraid that the real meaning of the thing was, that he was to be ordered to receive British Residents; and he observes that, as to the coming of the Sahibs, in his view of the state of affairs it is not advisable, remarking, that the point chiefly to be regarded is, that even if for the purpose of securing the good-will of the British Government the Ameer should consent to receive a British Agent, and to make the necessary arrangements for his safety, then this grave difficulty would arise—that what was done could not be concealed from the Russian authorities, who were on his northern borders, who were extremely fearless, and who would want to have Agents in his country too. Now that may, perhaps, have been an excuse; but, at all events, it shows that there was no more desire to receive Russian Agents than British on the part of the Ameer. I quote this, because it is held that the great desire of Shere Ali was to receive Russian Agents, and not English; but I do not think that proposition can be maintained. The second letter of the Viceroy, dated 8th July, 1876, and which will be found at page 176 of the Papers, gives the first indication of the new—that is, the threatening—policy which has landed us in our present situation. In the last paragraph it says—

“I am to repeat that, in proposing to send a friendly Mission to your Highness, the Viceroy has been actuated by a cordial desire, which it rests with your Highness to reciprocate, for the continuance, on closer terms than heretofore, of amicable relations between the two Governments in view of common interests, more particularly affecting Afghanistan and the personal welfare of your Highness and your dynasty. It will, for this reason, cause the Viceroy sincere regret, if your Highness, by hastily rejecting the hand of friendship now frankly held out to you, should render nugatory the friendly intentions of his Excellency, and oblige him to regard Afghanistan as a State which has voluntarily isolated itself from the alliance and support of the British Government.”

Here was the first distinct threat of the withdrawal of all support from the Ameer if he did not accede to the Viceroy's proposals. That threat was conveyed in language which was certainly direct. It is here important to bear in mind one fact connected with the Russian Agent at Cabul, and that is this—that we never find that anything was done by a Russian Agent at Cabul which could be complained of by our Government prior to the receipt by the Ameer of this threatening letter. Let the House turn to the Central Asian Papers, and at page 79 they will find proof of what I have just said. At the foot of that page, in a telegram dated September 16, 1876, sent from Simla by the Viceroy to Lord Salisbury, it is stated that the Indian Government would send home by the next mail a despatch expressing a decided opinion on the necessity of Her Majesty's Government remonstrating with Russia on the subject of the Correspondence that had passed with the Ameer, through the hands of Russian Agents, two of whom were then in Cabul. On page 83 of the “Correspondence respecting Central Asia” you will find the written despatch, and also certain enclosures. The point with regard to the enclosures is this—that the earliest intelligence received by us of anything done by the Russian Agent or Agents, of which we could complain, is to be found in the Cabul Diary from the 4th to the 14th of August, 1876. This is the first mention of anything in connection with a Russian Agent at Cabul of which we had cause to complain. Now, if you turn to page 76 of the same Papers you will find that, by the Cabul Diary of the 1st of June, 1876, the Ameer had been in receipt on the previous day of Russian communications. It is recorded that on the receipt of the letters the Ameer summoned the British Agent, and showed him the letter of the Governor of Samarcand to the Naib. Its purport is that the Russian Government, with regard to Afghanistan, aims at nothing but friendship; that Mirza Abdul Karim has left with a Murrasila from the Russian Governor General to the Ameer; and that the Naib should appoint an Agent to escort him to Cabul. I quote this in order to show that up to this time, June, 1876, we had never complained, or had reason to complain, of anything done by the Russian Agent at Cabul, and that the Ameer always acted with openness in sending the communications to us. In order to show that that and previous communications were not regarded with anything like distrust, I would point out to the House that at page 79—Paper No. 70—it is recorded that on the 6th of September, 1876, Lord Derby transmitted to Lord Augustus Loftus, for his information, and without remark or complaint of any kind, a copy of a despatch, inclosing these Cabul Diaries of 30th May to 1st June. That, to my mind, shows conclusively that up to the time at which we began to threaten the Ameer he acted with perfect openness. Afterwards, there may, perhaps, have been something to say on the other side. The Viceroy, after sending his second letter to Shere Ali by the Commissioner at Peshawur, also sent certain Instructions, by the same hand and on the same day, to the Native Agent at Cabul, with the last paragraph only of which will I trouble the House, in the following words:—

“If the Ameer . . . still declines to receive the Viceroy's Envoy, the responsibility of the result will rest entirely on the Government of Afghanistan, which will thereby have isolated itself from the alliance of that Power which is most disposed, and best able, to befriend it.”—[Ibid. p. 177.]

This threat having been sent to the Ameer, he sent, on the 3rd of September, 1876, a reply, not altogether unfriendly in character. After suggesting that he disliked the idea of a Mission, the Ameer proceeded—

“I have come to this conclusion, that if an Envoy of the British Government, and a selected trusted Representative of this Government, should meet on the Frontier to explain mutually the views and wishes of their respective Governments, it would be a very advantageous arrangement; or, should that course not approve itself to the British authorities, then, that the British Agent at Cabul, who has long been intimately acquainted with all my wishes, should be summoned to his own Government, and expound the whole state of affairs, and, having fully understood the desires and projects of the British Government, should return back to me, and explain them all to me in private, after which I should be the better able to decide what course it is incumbent on me to adopt in the interests of my country.”—[Ibid. p. 179.]

Lord Lytton assented to the proposal; and on the 7th of October, 1876, Nawab Atta Mahomed Khan, the British Native Agent at Cabul, had a conversation with Sir Lewis Pelly at Simla. He stated the Ameer's grievances about the Seistan boundary, about Mahomed Yakooob Khan, and our desire for the appointment of political Agents, and he used the following remarkable phrase:—“that the Ameer regards the Agents from Russia as sources of embarrassment,” but hardly knew how to get rid of them. This certainly did not look as if the Ameer had made up his mind to side with the Russians. Upon the question of Yakooob Khan, there can be no doubt that the Ameer was very sore on account of Lord Northbrook's interference; but the facts were really these:—This son was the man to whom the Ameer mainly owed his position. He had fought for his father, and helped him materially to ascend the Throne. They quarrelled, and it was owing to the good offices of Lord Mayo that they were reconciled. After this, Yakooob Khan, being anxious to see the Ameer, came under a safe conduct from Herat to Cabul, when he was immediately cast into prison. Lord Northbrook very properly represented to the Ameer that the assistance rendered to him by England, from the time of Lord Lawrence downwards, had been given to him upon the one ground that England desired to see a strong, just, and merciful Government established in Afghanistan. Now, was it possible that we, who had spent so much money, taken so much pains, and bound ourselves to such obligations to the Ameer, would allow him, without a word of remonstrance, to commit this atrocious act upon his son, who had come to him under a safe conduct? Lord Salisbury frankly said that this was a just and proper course to take. But the Ameer looked upon it as a violation of our pledge not to interfere with his internal government. After having seen Sir Lewis Pelly, the Native Agent had an interview with the Viceroy, which is recorded on page 183 of the Afghan Papers; and I think there is more in this one little conversation derogatory to British honour, and calculated to work permanent harm, than in any other Paper that has ever come under my notice. The Viceroy said he was going to open his mind frankly to the Native Agent, who came to him under the somewhat peculiar circumstances and with the Mission which I have described in the words I quoted just now from the letter addressed by Shere Ali on the 3rd September, 1876, to the Commissioner of Peshawur. Lord Lytton, in the course of the conversation, made use of the following words:—

“The Ameer had apparently come to the conclusion that, having nothing to hope from us, and, at the same time, nothing to fear, he may safely stand aloof from the British Government; confident that, in the event of external attack, we shall be obliged to help him, for the protection of our own interests, even if we are under no contract obligation to do so. This was a very natural conclusion; but, unfortunately for the Ameer, there was a fatal flaw in its premises. It is true that, if the Ameer proves himself our friend and loyal ally, not our interests only, but our honour, will oblige us to defend his territories and support his Throne. But the moment we have cause to doubt his sincerity, or question the practical benefit of his alliance, our interests will be all the other way, and may greatly augment the dangers with which he is already threatened, both at home and abroad. As regards the former, the British Government can only assist those who value its assistance; and the assistance which the Ameer seems at present disinclined to seek or deserve may, at any moment, be very welcome to one or other of those rivals, from whom he will never be free till he has our assured support. As regards the latter, our only interest in maintaining the independence of Afghanistan is to provide for the security of our own Frontier. But the moment we cease to regard Afghanistan as a friendly and firmly allied State, what is there to prevent us from providing for the security of our Frontier by an understanding with Russia, which might have the effect of wiping Afghanistan out of the map altogether? If the Ameer does not desire to come to a speedy understanding with us, Russia does; and she desires it at his expense."

Here was the Viceroy speaking in the name of the Sovereign of England, in the course of a conversation described as private—but which was no more private, in fact, than is this debate—and suggesting to the Ruler of Afghanistan that as there were rival pretenders to his Throne, he (in other words, England) would offer his help to one of those rivals, unless the Ameer accepted his terms. Is it possible to draw any other conclusion from these documents, and will anyone say that such a conclusion is worthy of the policy of England? Is it the kind of diplomacy that you in this House approve for our Representative to turn round upon the Ameer, whose friendship we had always professed to desire, and to say to him—"If you do not admit our political Residents into your country we will turn to one of your rivals, from whom you are never safe once our support is withdrawn from you?" I cannot conceive any statement more derogatory to the dignity of England, solemnly made by the man who was professing to speak in the name of his Sovereign. Of this I am sure—that if he was speaking in the name of his Sovereign, he was not speaking either the sense or the judgment of the English people. I think it will be fitting that before these debates close the Government should give the country some unqualified assurance on this subject. Well, with regard to the second paragraph of this statement which he made, what about this understanding with Russia? How far has it gone? Is there another secret Treaty? Is it possible that the farce could go further? Here we have Viceroy after Viceroy protesting to this man, —the Ameer—that we desired to have an independent State between us and the Russians whom we saw coming on in Central Asia; that that was the great object of our wishes; and that for that purpose we were prepared to give him money and troops, and, in fact, anything he wanted; and yet, at the same time, we were intriguing over his head, and had even gone so far as actually to ascertain that Russia was ready and willing to enter into an agreement for the division of his country? This half-educated and half-civilized Prince was accused of intriguing with Russia; but whatever might be his intention, he must have found that the British Government had been in advance of him. It appears to me to be hardly probable that this matter can stop exactly where it stands. This House is entitled to know how far the Government have gone with Russia in this matter. We are entitled to know whether there is anything more with respect to it than is recorded in this Blue Book. It is due to us that we should be informed how far the plan—if I may so call it—of the division of Afghanistan has gone. Has it as yet taken the stage of a written proposal, and are the lines drawn on the map? I think we ought to know clearly from the Government exactly what the position is in which we stand with regard to Russia upon this point. But that is not all. The Viceroy goes on to threaten the Ameer through his Agent. He tells him that our relations with the Ameer "cannot remain as they are; but that they must become either worse or better." He then re-affirms the necessity that exists for the British Government to watch the Afghan Frontier, and speaks of an arrangement to which he says it is expedient the Ameer should accede for the reception of British Residents and a special Mission. I am not going to trouble the House with the poetical allusion to the "earthen pipkin and the iron pots;" but I should like to have some information with regard to a statement which it seems to me is more deserving of condemnation than any other I have read. In the last few lines of page 183 it will be seen that the Viceroy went on to observe that

"British policy does not permit of the alteration of definite Treaty engagements. The Ameer has hitherto had only verbal understandings with us. The letter given him by Lord Mayo was not in the nature of a Treaty engagement, and was, no doubt, vague and general in its terms."

Now, I may, I think, say, with the concurrence of the House, that this is language which is calculated to shake the confidence not only of the Ameer, but of every Prince in India. Here we have this diplomatist drawing a sharp line between written Treaty engagements and the word of Her Majesty's Representative. ["Oh, oh!"] Is that an unfair interpretation? [Cries of "Yes!"] I will read the paragraph over again—The Viceroy went on to observe that "British policy does not permit of the alteration of definite Treaty engagements"—that is to say, of the Treaty of 1855, which has always been looked upon as a one-sided Treaty, and the only clause in which, in reality, is that which binds us to respect the territory of the Ameer. The Viceroy goes on to say that the Ameer has hitherto had only verbal understandings with us; and what conclusions, I would ask, could the Ameer draw from all this, except that British policy did permit the alteration of verbal understandings? [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: Read to the end.] I will; because there are, in my opinion, three things mentioned in this paragraph to which it is desirable that the attention of the House should be distinctly drawn. We have, first of all, the reference to Treaties; then to letters written by our Representatives; and then to verbal negotiations. The end of the paragraph is—

"The letter given him by Lord Mayo was not in the nature of a Treaty engagement, and was, no doubt, vague and general in its terms."

[The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: Hear, hear!] Well, the letter was no doubt, "vague and general in its terms."

I do not know what construction my right hon. Friend is going to put upon it; but to my mind it appears that we have here a plain distinction drawn by the Viceroy between the obligations which are imposed by written Treaties, and the obligations entailed upon us by the verbal promises of our Viceroy. Can there be any other rational construction, I would ask, placed upon the words which I have quoted to the House? And what more dangerous question, I should like to know, could be raised throughout India than that which those words suggest? What have the Native Princes of India to depend upon in most cases? Not on written engagements, but upon verbal assurances given to them by the Viceroy; and if you cast the slightest doubt upon the fact that the promise of one Viceroy is binding upon his successors, you are aiming one of the heaviest blows which you could possibly deal at the confidence which is reposed in our Government in India. My right hon. Friend, at all events, is awake to the gravity of the point; and I shall be glad if, in the course of this debate, he would give us some explanation on the subject. The Viceroy seems to have been very much enamoured of this singular sentence with regard to the obligations of Treaties; because you will find, if you turn to page 216, that there is a reference to the point, and that there was a distinct idea in his mind that the obligation imposed upon us by a Treaty was one thing, and that by verbal assurances another. I am now about to quote from a letter of Sir Lewis Pelly addressed, during the Peshawur Conference, to the Minister of the Ameer, Syud Noor Mahomed Shah. Sir Lewis Pelly says—

"Your Excellency's contention is that the British Government is already bound, by its existing engagements with the Ameer, to support and defend His Highness against any foreign or domestic enemy; and that consequently the Ameer has nothing to gain by a Treaty of Alliance which, so far as the British Government is concerned, would be a mere re-statement of the obligations it has already contracted on his behalf, whilst, so far as His Highness is concerned, it would impose upon him obligations altogether new. This is, I think, a fair summary of your Excellency's argument; and the argument would be perfectly sound if its premises were true. But, unfortunately for the Ameer, they are fundamentally erroneous. The only obligations ever contracted on behalf of each other by the British Government and the Barakzai Rulers of Afghanistan are embodied in two Treaties, of which the first was signed in 1855 and the second in 1857."

Now, are there, I would ask, no other obligations except those contracted by these Treaties? Have hon. Members not seen how Shere Ali clung to what he called the writings which were given to him by Lord Lawrence and Lord Mayo? They were his charters. He repeated, over and over again, that there was no need of any Treaty. He was, he said, satisfied with the assurances which he had received, and wanted nothing more. He had the writings of Lord Lawrence and Lord Mayo, and they were, as he himself expressed it, "efficient and sufficient." I can hardly conceive that the Ameer could have put any other construction upon the language which was used by the Viceroy than that which I have put upon it. It seems to me to be the reasonable construction. Well, the Envoy was told to convey an account of what had taken place faithfully to the Ameer, certain conditions being attached to the opening of negotiations—namely, the location of British officers on the Afghan Frontier, and the maintenance of an attitude of friendship and confidence on the part of the Ameer. The second condition there was no difficulty in acceding to; but the residence of British Officers in his territory evidently was a great stumbling block throughout these communications. On this point of the introduction of British Agents on the Frontier there is a very remarkable statement, and it is the first time we hear anything definite with regard to the re-arrangement of Frontier. The Viceroy in the account of his second interview, on the 13th of October, 1876, with the Native Agent, Atta Mahomed Khan, says—

"Should the Ameer not consider the advantages worth the concession required by him, viz., British Agency on the Frontier, and a really friendly attitude on the part of the Ameer himself, it would then be needless for him to depute his Minister to meet the Viceroy's Envoy, and the Viceroy would be free to adopt his own course in his re-arrangement of Frontier relations, without regard to Afghan interests." [Ibid. p. 185.]

This is the first occasion on which we have the question of the re-arrangement of Frontier introduced. We have next a letter from the Viceroy to the Ameer, dated Simla, October 11th, 1876, which conveyed to His Highness an invitation to attend the Proclamation of Her Majesty as "Empress of India" at Delhi. Now, I am not sure that the Viceroy did a wise thing in inviting the Ameer to grace his triumph at this grand Delhi Proclamation; because he would be sure to meet on that occasion a great many Native Princes whose internal affairs had been very considerably interfered with by different British Residents in India. I do not like, I may add, to dwell in detail on this point of the reception of British Agents on the Frontier. Hon. Members will find in the Papers letters dated November 23, December 5, 7, 11, 18, and 21, which depict the attitude of the Ameer at the time. They are to be found at pages 192, 193, and 194. In the first of these letters, which is written by Atta Mahomed Khan, and which is dated Cabul, November 23, it is stated that—"The general result of their observations was that the Government of Afghanistan was not in a position to receive British officers within its Frontier."—[Ibid. p. 192.]

The letters then went on to show that there were signs of yielding in the Ameer; and in the last of the series, which was dated December 21, the writer says, after a lengthened interview with the Ameer, His Highness observed—

"God willing, for ever, the friendship existing between our Government and the British Government will remain more firm than before, and this true friendship will never be disturbed. Whatever objections or pleas have been hitherto made as to the residence of British officers on the border are owing to the savage conduct of the people of Afghanistan, and even now we agree to their residence on the border owing to helplessness."—[Ibid. p. 194.]

The meaning of that is, that he had been driven to this concession; that pressure had been put upon him; in other words, that he had been bullied; and that he could not resist any longer giving his consent to the residence of British officers within his territory. Then he sends an Envoy to meet Sir Lewis Pelly at Peshawur, and the first interview of this Envoy is with Dr. Bellew. You will find an account of it at page 195. Dr. Bellew, in a Memorandum, dated January 28, 1877, of his visit to the Envoy, records the following observations made by the latter:—

"The Ameer now has a deep-rooted mistrust of the good faith and sincerity of the British Government, and he has many reasons for this mistrust."

Dr. Bellew's reply to that observation was to the effect that he had always thought

"The disposition of the British Government towards that of the Ameer was of a most friendly character, and that he felt sure, from all that he could see as a private individual, that its most earnest desire was to see the Ameer's Government strong and prosperous, and consolidated on a firm basis."

The answer of the Envoy was—

"That is what you say. But the promises of your Government are of one sort and their acts of another. Now listen to me. I tell you what I know. It is twenty-two years since the Government of the Ameer made a Treaty with John Lawrence Sahib, and it has not from that time to this diverged from it. At that time the Ameer Dost Mahomed Khan refused to consent to the residence of British officers in his country, because he knew the lawless character of his people, and how they had killed Englishmen in the streets of Cabul at the time of Shah Shuja's overthrow. Well, his explanation was accepted and friendship continued, and then after a time the Ameer (Shere Ali Khan) came down and met Lord Mayo. Again the question of British officers was advanced, and on the same grounds objected to. After this you came with Pollock Sahib to Seistan. You will recollect that on one occasion he spoke in praise of Yakoob Khan, and I immediately warned him that if he desired to secure the Ameer's confidence he would never mention the name of Yakoob Khan again. Well, when I returned from Teheran I met Lord Northbrook, and discussed various matters at Simla, where the question of British officers coming to Afghanistan was again mooted. Now, why all this pressing to send British officers to Afghanistan when you declare that you have no wish to interfere in the internal affairs of Afghanistan? It has roused the suspicion of the Ameer."—[Ibid. p. 195.]

Now, the more I read these Papers, the more it seems to me that there had not been so much intrigue with other Powers as a deeply-rooted feeling in the hearts of the people of Afghanistan against the introduction of British Residents into their country. They evidently felt that their independence would be gone the moment they gave way on that point. Dr. Bellew paid the Cabul Envoy a second visit, which is referred to at page 202, and there, again, the Envoy uses words which I cannot help thinking are spoken from the man's own heart. In his interviews with Dr. Bellew he appears to have spoken perfectly freely; and that, I believe, is the impression which has been conveyed to the minds of many of those who knew

"God grant that the issue be favourable (well). But you must not impose upon us a burden which we cannot bear, and if you overload us the responsibility rests with you."

Dr. Bellew adds—

"I interposed here, and asked the Cabul Envoy what the burden was which he alluded to. He at once replied—The residence of British officers on the frontiers of Afghanistan."

He told Dr. Bellew at the first interview that the allusion to his assent to the admission of British Agents to reside in Afghanistan "was as much as an order for his death." There is a ring of truth about this story that the people of Afghanistan were violently—fanatically, if you will—opposed to this step. That the opposition was a true one I think we can, after reading these Papers, hardly entertain a doubt; and, moreover, it was an opposition which, it seems to me, the Ameer hardly dare face. In the Report of the Conference at Peshawur between Sir Lewis Pelly and the Ameer's Agent on February 15, 1877, Sir Lewis Pelly says—

"But, in the most friendly manner, I beg the Envoy to understand that, if the Ameer reject all we offer and all we ask, and no basis of negotiation is left, the Viceroy, while observing the terms of the Treaty of 1855, will decline to support the Ameer and his dynasty in any troubles, internal or external, and their unknown consequences, and will continue to strengthen the Frontier of British India without further reference to the Ameer."—[Ibid. p. 210.]

Now here I would ask, how was the Viceroy going at once to strengthen the Frontier and maintain intact the Treaty of 1855? That is a matter which appears to me to require explanation. Then the Cabul Envoy says that he does not understand what "strengthening the Frontier" meant; and Sir Lewis Pelly replied—

"The Viceroy will take such measures as he may deem wise and lawful for strengthening the Frontier of British India and providing for the safety and repose of that Empire; and this without communication with the Ameer."

Then the Cabul Envoy asks—

"Does this mean, within the territories of the Ameer of Afghanistan, or otherwise?"

Sir Lewis Pelly replied—

"That the object of the present Conference is not to interfere with Afghanistan."—[Ibid.]

[First Night.]

Now was that, I would ask, a satisfactory answer? Now this Pelly Conference, as it is called at Peshawur, was brought to a close at the time of the death of Noor Mahomed Shah, the Ameer's Envoy. The death of the Envoy occurred on the 26th of March, and on the 30th of March the Conference was, by order of the Viceroy, brought to a close, although another Envoy was present at Peshawur at the time. If you want to see the reason for the closing of the Conference you must turn to pages 170 and 171—to the despatch of the Viceroy, dated the 10th of May, 1877. The Viceroy there tells us that—

“The Afghan Envoy, who had long been suffering from a mortal disease, expired shortly after his receipt of this communication. His surviving colleague, the Mir Akhor, declared that he had no authority to answer any question from the British Government; and Sir Lewis Pelly was consequently instructed to close the Conference on the ground that there was no basis for negotiation. Apparently the Ameer, whose object was still to gain time, was much surprised and embarrassed by this step. At the moment when Sir Lewis Pelly was closing the Conference, His Highness was sending to the Mir Akhor instructions to prolong it by every means in his power; a fresh Envoy was already on the way from Cabul to Peshawur; and it was reported that this Envoy had authority to accept eventually all the conditions of the British Government. The Viceroy was aware of these facts when he instructed our Envoy to close the Conference.”

Now, it is a little difficult to understand why the Conference was closed when that which the Viceroy had taken so much trouble to gain appeared to be at last within his grasp. Was not it the obvious solution of the difficulty, that by that time it was deemed expedient that there should be an extension of our North-Western Frontier? The Viceroy tells us that it was evident it was not desirable to go further with the Conference when he found that Shere Ali was not friendly in his disposition towards us, and was obviously not cordial about the receipt of these British Residents. But had he at any time, I would ask, found the Ameer cordial with respect to the reception of those Residents? Had he not been warned, over and over again, by every officer whom he came across in India, that the Ameer was strongly opposed to such a step? He, nevertheless, presses on the next day, and when at last he knew that the Ameer, dated 13th, the Ameer was about to ference. He found by that time that the mere location of British officers in the Ameer's territory would not be sufficient, and that he wanted an extension of Frontier. It is impossible to account otherwise for his closing the Conference after so long a delay when he was on the point of having the very terms acceded to for which he had been asking throughout. Well, a great break occurs at this stage of the proceedings. The matter was reported to the Government at home in a despatch dated 10th of May, 1877, from Simla, and you will find towards the close of that despatch, at page 172, the following remarkable passage:—

“The further course of Cabul politics we cannot foresee, and do not attempt to predict. But we await its natural development with increased confidence in the complete freedom and paramount strength of our own position. In the meanwhile we see no reason to anticipate any act of aggression on the part of the present Ameer, or on our own part any cause for interference with His Highness. Our relations with him are still such as we commonly maintain with the Chiefs of neighbouring and friendly countries. But whilst, on the one hand, they are now relieved from all liabilities, real or imputed, on behalf of his personal fortunes or those of his dynasty, on the other hand, they have been placed by our recent arrangements with Khelat (and others which will be separately reported to your Lordship) in a position much less dependent than heretofore upon the personal disposition, or uncontrolled conduct, of so uncertain a neighbour.”

Now, this step was taken of closing the Conference, and it was reported home in the despatch from which I have been quoting, and which is dated the 10th of May, 1877; but it appears, I confess, to my mind, somewhat curious that this despatch is the first official record of these transactions we have following the despatch of the 28th of January, 1876; or, in other words, for a period of a year and a-quarter. That was a very long time for the Viceroy to be left without counsel and support from the Government at home. It seems to me that a Viceroy inaugurating a thoroughly new policy, which had been opposed by his Predecessors, should have sought advice from home during that period. But Lord Lytton does not appear to have done that. Is it possible that a despatch on the subject was delayed? because had such a despatch been written there were members of the Viceroy's own Government who would have been found to protest against it. I hold in my hand a letter which has been addressed to the Editor of The Daily News by Sir Henry Norman. It is too long to read; but I may inform the House that Sir Henry Norman states that if he and his Colleagues had been consulted they would certainly have protested against this policy. I will read only one sentence from the letter. Speaking of how odd it would appear if he cordially concurred in adopting a policy which he had a few weeks previously deprecated, Sir Henry Norman says—

“I did no such thing, nor did Sir William Muir or Sir Arthur Hobhouse, who, with myself, were members of the Viceroy's Council during all the discussions preceding Sir Lewis Pelly's Mission; on the contrary, we objected to the policy, and to measures in connection with it.”

We can understand that it would have been inconvenient to write home under the circumstances. I wish also to point out that as it was possible to carry out this policy only by deliberately concealing it from Parliament, it was so concealed. During the spring of 1877 a good many persons began to hear from India reports of these Conferences which alarmed them; but the matter was allowed to rest for a time. There were, however, later on, debates on the subject, both in the House of Lords and the House of Commons. One of the most important was that which took place in the House of Lords on the 15th of June, 1877, and it was a debate, I may observe, which threw the whole of us off our guard in reference to this question. That debate was opened by the Duke of Argyll, who, in the course of his speech, remarked that—

“Rumour said that the Government of India had determined upon a complete change of policy, and had resolved to insist on the Ameer receiving a Resident British Envoy at his Court. It had been said, too, that a particular officer had been appointed.”—[3 Hansard, cccxxiv. 1832.]

Well, what was the reply of the Marquess of Salisbury?

“We have not tried to force an Envoy upon the Ameer at Cabul—we have not suggested Sir Lewis Pelly as an Envoy at Cabul. . . . Our relations with the Ameer of Cabul have undergone no material change since last year. I do not believe that he is worse disposed towards us than hitherto, or that his feelings are in any way more embittered towards the British Government.”—[Ibid. 1835.]

Well, Lord Lawrence spoke after the noble Marquess in the debate, and he was followed by Lord Northbrook, who said—

“I heard what fell from the noble Marquess to-night . . . with the greatest possible satisfaction, because I feel it would be no light matter to change a policy which has been pursued deliberately by successive Governments in this country, and which has received the cordial support and approval of men like Lord Canning, my noble Friend who has just addressed your Lordships, and Lord Mayo.”—[Ibid. 1842.]

I have seen that some explanation has since been given of the answer of Lord Salisbury on that occasion, and it is to the effect that we had not meant to send a British Resident to Cabul. Now, for my own part, I am disposed to doubt whether even the literal correctness of that explanation can be maintained; for it will, I think, be found from one of the Viceroy's letters to the Ameer, that he proposed to send Sir Lewis Pelly to him at Cabul or elsewhere. But be that as it may, I contend that the speech of Lord Salisbury was one which was calculated to throw us off the scent, particularly in that sentence which says that our relations with the Ameer have undergone no material change since last year. And now I wish, in dealing with that point, to make this remark. There is, to my mind, nothing more important than that our Questions and Answers to each other should be not only literally true—as I assume the Answer to which I have just referred to be—but that they should be frank. Right hon. and hon. Gentlemen who sit on the front Benches opposite have far more interest in this than independent Members. If we cannot rely absolutely on the information which we receive in Question and Answer in Parliament, it would be impossible to conduct the business of the country without resorting to practices which would be distasteful to every Englishman. If, where it may be done, an Answer were to be given which, while it may be literally true, might serve to throw us off the scent, then it would become necessary for us to frame our Questions in the form of the clauses of a criminal indictment, and that would be to degrade the business of Parliament. I, for one, trust that we shall always be able to maintain the practice which has hitherto prevailed; and that when we receive an Answer to any Question which we may put, it shall be one which, as heretofore, we may accept with implicit reliance on its honesty and straightforwardness. If that practice should be departed from, and a new mode of putting and answering Questions should be adopted in its stead, nothing, to my mind, could tend more to bring our proceedings into disrepute. But to return to Shere Ali and his fortunes, we find that the Government thought that the Ameer might well be left to reflect upon the situation in which he was placed. On the 30th of March the Viceroy closed the Conference at Peshawur, and thus shut the door between his Government and the Ruler of Cabul. And when was this course taken? That Government, which is always talking about prestige, closed the door of communication between them and the capital of Afghanistan, and withdrew from it their Native Envoy, at a time when grave events were happening in Europe, and when England seemed to be madly bidding the rest of Europe to stand aside in order that she might step in as the champion of Mussulman rule, and alone settle the question with Russia. This was the time chosen to take away our Native Agent from Shere Ali's Court, leaving no one to point out to him that neither in Europe, nor in Asia, were you afraid of the great White Czar. And this we are told is diplomacy. The Ameer was left alone to his reflections: did they ever consider for a moment what those reflections were likely to be? Might he not have reasoned with himself thus—"This new Viceroy is angry with me. He has broken up the Conference. No Viceroy has ever before treated me with insult and the hard language this one has done. I used to get fair words from Lord Lawrence, and Lord Mayo, and Lord Northbrook; but this last Viceroy casts some doubts on the promises which I received from them. He has gone so far as to tell me that he has been in communication with the Russians for dividing my Kingdom and blotting me out altogether; had I not better talk to the Russians? That General Kaufmann always appears very civil to me. He says nothing about Resident Agents. He makes friendly inquiries after me, and he has got under his control that nephew of mine, who is a most dangerous conspirator against my Throne." Was there any improbability in supposing that Shere Ali would have reasoned with himself in that way? The Viceroy had shut the door against himself, but had left it open to Russia, and that at a moment when we were threatening Russia by bringing over troops from India to the Mediterranean. The Government, I may add, never found anything to complain of between Shere Ali and the Russians until after they had written threatening and insulting letters to the Ameer. After that there were, I admit, some intrigues. But be that as it may, the Government approved the course which had been taken by the Viceroy; and I would now quote a passage which will be found at page 223, and which is almost the last extract with which I shall trouble the House. The passage occurs in a despatch dated 4th October, 1877, from Lord Salisbury to the Governor General of India. He says—

"Upon this point the history of the events reported in the letter under reply is unhappily conclusive, and demonstrates but too plainly how erroneous was the opinion expressed so recently as the year 1875 by Sir Richard Pollock, the Commissioner of Peshawur, that 'no unfavourable change had occurred in the disposition of the Ameer.' Shere Ali's confidential Envoy stated explicitly that his master had 'now a deep-rooted mistrust of the good faith and sincerity of the British Government.'"

Here we have a specimen of putting two paragraphs together in such a way as to create a very misleading impression. You will find, at page 195, that in the interview which he had with Dr. Bellew, the Afghan Envoy stated that—

"The Ameer has now a deep-rooted mistrust of the good faith and sincerity of the British Government."

But why? Because of the Indian Government pressing upon him the question of the residence of British officers on his Frontier; and this sentence, taken from the report of a conversation on the 28th January, 1877, is quoted as a proof that the opinion expressed by Sir Richard Pollock in 1855 as to the disposition of the Ameer was plainly erroneous. [Cries of "Read on!"] If I have omitted anything material, there are other hon. Gentlemen who are capable of supplying the omission. Now, on the 14th of August, 1878, the Viceroy writes to the Ameer that a British Envoy will visit him "immediately at Cabul." He gives him no time to consider his position. Then, on the 21st August, the Mission was postponed; and when at last it proceeded, in the course of the next month, our Envoy was, as we all know, refused admission. But why was it sent on that particular day, when it seemed probable that, if time were allowed, it would not be rejected? Because it had been prepared with a certain amount of pomp and circumstance, and was designed to invite the attention of the Native nobles who had been asked to accompany it to a sort of triumphal entry into Afghanistan against the wishes of its Ruler and its people. The policy of parade had been carried so far that we could not afford that the Mission should be postponed or recalled. What was the account given in the telegram of the circumstances attending the meeting of Major Cavagnari with the Commandant of Ali Musjid? I think the Government are under a heavy responsibility in that matter. The account was, that the Commandant of the fort threatened Major Cavagnari, saying that, save for his personal friendship, he would shoot him on the spot. Remember how every newspaper was led into the belief that our Envoy had been insulted. The Government are quick enough to contradict everything that tells against them and their policy; but in this case this false telegram—false, that is, in the sense of giving an absolutely untrue impression of the facts—was allowed to do its work. I repeat, the Government are under a very grave responsibility for letting the war fever be lashed up in such a manner. They had pressed the Mission on, and I do not say that it could not possibly have been right to do so, even against the wishes of the Ruler of Afghanistan; but that could only have been so if the circumstances of the case were urgent, and if there was no other course open. But were the circumstances of the case urgent? Certainly not. The Papers which were delivered to us relating to Central Asia throw much light on that point; and it must be patent to all who have read them that our real cause of complaint was against Russia. It was Russia who had violated her agreement with us, in sending an Envoy to Afghanistan; and you must remember that it was the Russian Mission that was the immediate cause of the British one. Lord Cranbrook seems to have seen it in this light, for on the 8th August, 1878, he writes to Lord Salisbury—

"It is the Russian Cabinet alone which is responsible for the acts of its Agent; and it is the Russian Governor General of Turkestan, rather than the Ameer Shere Ali, who, with or without authority, is at this moment pursuing a policy of which the effect must be to seriously agitate the minds of Her Majesty's subjects throughout India. In view of the gravity of the situation the Secretary of State for India may safely leave to Lord Salisbury, who has a full knowledge of the question, the adoption of such language at St. Petersburg as he may think best calculated to bring about a result such as the engagements of Russia entitle us to expect."—[Central Asia, No. 1 (1878), p. 143.]

These sentences have the right ring about them. We shall see how they were acted upon. In the meantime, it appears that on the 14th August M. de Giers, in conversation with Mr. Plunkett, used these words—

"Everything has been stopped. The political as well as the military precautions which we thought ourselves justified in taking against you—everything has been stopped."—[Ibid. p. 148.]

This conversation was known at the Foreign Office on the 19th August, and it was not until that day that Lord Salisbury takes any action upon Lord Cranbrook's letter of the 8th. The demand he makes of the Russian Government is conveyed in the following words, addressed to Mr. Plunkett:—

"I must therefore request you to mention these reports to Prince Gortchakoff, and to enquire whether there is any foundation for them. You will not conceal from His Highness that proceedings of the kind referred to would cause uneasiness in India and dissatisfaction in this country, and should it prove that there is any truth in the statement that a Russian Mission has proceeded to Cabul, you will express the hope of Her Majesty's Government that it may be at once withdrawn, as being inconsistent with the assurances so frequently received from His Highness."—[Ibid. p. 150.]

Mr. Plunkett, receiving this on the 26th of August, and being unable to find M. de Giers at the Russian Foreign Office, writes to him according to his instructions. But it is not until the 6th September that he calls to inquire

"why he had not yet received any answer to the request of Her Majesty's Government that the Russian Mission should be withdrawn from Cabul."—[Ibid. p. 162.]

On the 13th September Mr. Plunkett writes to Lord Salisbury, enclosing M.

[First Night.]

de Giers's reply, which had just reached him from Livadia. M. de Giers says—

"The dispositions of the Imperial Government in regard to the Central Asian Question . . . have necessarily been affected by the political condition in which we were placed by the attitude of England during the recent crisis in the East. But, under the present circumstances, those dispositions are the same as formerly, and are not of a nature to give rise to any distrust on the part of the English Government."

He adds, that

"the Mission . . . is of a provisional nature, and one of simple courtesy."—Ibid. p. 164.]

By a letter addressed to the India Office, on September 20th, we learn that

"Lord Salisbury infers from M. de Giers's note that his Excellency acknowledges that all the former assurances of the Russian Government in regard to Afghanistan have now recovered their validity."—[Ibid. p. 165.]

I will here observe this—that M. de Giers does not promise to withdraw the Mission to Cabul, nor does he say the previous Russian assurances have recovered their validity, which is the construction of Lord Salisbury. It is altogether a very vague statement; and its right answer would have been to acknowledge with courtesy his letter, say that we were glad to learn that the dispositions of Russia were the same as formerly, but that we should be glad also to know by what date the Russian Mission would be withdrawn, and whether we might count upon the former Russian assurances having recovered their validity. The truth is, that whilst ready enough to go to war with the Ameer, the Government was not pressing Russia with the persistency with which she ought to have been pressed on this subject. Some time ago it used to be the fashion for hon. Gentlemen opposite to complain of Lord Derby because his utterances to the Russian Government were too gentle and tender. Well, if Lord Derby's utterances were gentle, Lord Salisbury's are lamb-like. But, after all, let the House bear in mind the date. It is a fact that on the 13th September Mr. Plunkett was in possession of M. de Giers's reply, which Lord Salisbury professes to look upon as satisfactory, and it was not till the 21st of September that we pressed on our Mission into the Khyber Pass. If the Russian assurances were to be relied upon, why was the Government in such a hurry to press the Ameer? It seems to me that we have actually gone to war with the Ameer—that we took the step that we knew would lead to war a week after our officer was in receipt of Russian assurances that the very cause of the war was going to be removed by the Russian Government. I admit that Mr. Plunkett's despatch containing M. de Giers's assurances were not received in England till the 18th of September; but why did they not send a telegram? What is the use of the telegraph? It is not given you merely to send showy telegrams, in order to raise a war fever; it was given you that you might take steps to stop a war. The case is this—we have had cause for complaint against Russia, and we have fastened it upon the Ameer; we have gone to war with the Ameer on account of that Russian Mission; and the upshot of the war will probably be this, as far as I understand it—that we shall annex the territory of the independent tribes lying between us and Afghanistan. This is an odd example of vicarious punishment. There is, too, an ascending scale of punishment—to the Russians, remonstrances of the most gentle order; to the Ameer, war; to the independent tribes, annexation. And it is curious, also, that the punishment falls exactly in the inverse ratio of the ability of the different parties to resist. I have detained the House very far beyond what I had anticipated; but these Papers are interesting, and the story, I think, cannot be told without copious reference to them. We have seen the Government land us in this war; a war, as I think, unjust and unnecessary at the outset. I cannot come to the conclusion that anything else has been in their minds since the Pelly Conference was closed but this advance and rectification of the Frontier; and I am driven reluctantly to the belief that they took the opportunity of the Ameer's unwise and improper conduct—for unwise and improper, I think, his conduct was—to make that advance. And now, when you have made that advance, I should like to know what particular end you expect to gain from it? That is a question I am not going to enter into at large. It may very likely form the subject of another debate. But the charges that I bring against them are that they have adopted a new policy in India; that they have adopted that policy against the advice of all previous Viceroy, and against the advice of every officer of experience who has served in the Punjab, and who is entitled to form an opinion upon it; that they have acted upon that policy, and attempted to carry it out by threats, and by language unworthy of the British Government, calculated to defeat the very end they have had in view, and to shake confidence in us throughout India; that they concealed this policy from Parliament and the country; and that it was only by concealing this policy that it could be carried out, for if we had had the story before us, there is such a consensus of opinion among those who have served long in India that I would have defied them to do so; further, that having a cause of complaint against the strong, they fixed the quarrel on the weak; and that, by their conduct, they have brought us to a war in which already gallant men's lives have been lost, and homes made desolate, to atone for the blunders and errors of their Administration. Now, these are grave charges. I have brought them on the foundation of the Papers that have been laid before us; and unless the Government can clear themselves completely of these charges, I am justified in asking the House to assent to the Motion which I now make.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House disapproves the conduct of Her Majesty's Government which has resulted in the War with Afghanistan,"—(Mr. Whitbread),—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. E. STANHOPE said, that the speech to which they had just been listening had, as they would naturally have expected, been couched in moderate terms—more moderate, indeed, than those in which the hon. Member had recently addressed his constituents at Bedford. He would endeavour to follow his example, and to avoid, so far as possible, what he might call the "personalities" of the question. He must ask the indulgence of the House if he had to follow the hon. Gentleman's speech at some length. As he understood the charges brought by the hon. Member against the present Government, they were these—that the irritation of the Ameer's mind had been caused entirely by the Government, and mainly, as the hon. Member evidently thought, because they had tried to induce him to accept British Residents. And then he went further, and maintained that the Government, having been desirous of late to annex additional territory in India, had taken advantage of a certain misconduct on the part of the unfortunate Ameer, in order to achieve that annexation. These were the grave charges that had been brought, to which he desired to offer a complete and entire opposition. But as they ranged over a long course of years, it would be necessary for him to present the House, in his reply, with a consecutive narrative of the relations of this country with Afghanistan, in the course of which he would endeavour to meet the various points of the hon. Member. When the Ameer, after various vicissitudes of fortune, succeeded at length in getting under his authority the greater part of Afghanistan, he was desirous of entering upon friendly relations with the Indian Government. Lord Lawrence aided him with money and arms, and if he had remained in India he would probably have arranged a meeting with the Ameer. That intention had been carried out by Lord Mayo, who met him and discussed certain subjects with him very fully and frankly; and though he (Mr. E. Stanhope) was ready to admit that the representations made by Lord Mayo in the letter written at the close of the Conference had been misunderstood and misrepresented by the Ameer, yet, at the same time, there could be no question that, whether from the nature of the assurances or from Lord Mayo's own personal influence and judicious conduct, the Ameer left that Conference a satisfied and a happy man. It had been said that Lord Mayo gave the Ameer a promise that we would never press a British Resident upon him. He (Mr. E. Stanhope) had, on a former occasion, said in that House—and he was ready to say it again—that as between Lord Mayo and the Ameer the subject was never mentioned. But it was mentioned by Lord Mayo's authority in the conversations between his Agents and the Agents of the Ameer. And what happened was this—It was abundantly clear from the despatch which the hon. Member opposite did not desire to read the end of, that the Ameer did wish us to establish Resident Engineer Agents within his dominions for the purpose of affording him advice. It was a boon which he asked us to grant him. It was included among the boons which he had asked from Lord Mayo at the time that he had begged for assistance in money and arms, and it was one of the boons which Lord Mayo thought that we ought not to grant at the then stage of our relations with him. The then state of things was summed up by the Duke of Argyll in 1869, when he said—

“I have every reason to believe that Lord Mayo has consistently pursued the same policy of non-intervention and of the avoidance of entangling engagements, which was pursued by my noble Friend the late Governor General of India (Lord Lawrence). So far as my own instructions to Lord Mayo are concerned, they certainly have been to avoid all entangling engagements for the future with Afghanistan, and to maintain the British Government and the Government of India perfectly free in regard to that and other conterminous States.”—
[3 Hansard, cxv. 1087.]

After this interview the first difficulty that arose was with reference to the Seistan boundary in 1872. The Ameer did not understand the nature of an arbitration, and the decision undoubtedly rankled in his mind for some time. But the terms of it, although, perhaps, very different from what the Ameer had expected, had been faithfully kept by him. But in 1873 a new element was introduced into the matter. Lord Northbrook, as it would appear, suggested that an Envoy should be sent to the Ameer to explain the Seistan decision to him. And what was the reply of the Ameer? He said that he should like to send an Envoy to us; but that if we preferred to send to him, he was willing to receive him. That was the spirit in which he received the overtures of Lord Northbrook. It was eventually agreed that he should send an Envoy to us, and then it appeared that the advances of Russia in Central Asia had greatly alarmed the Ameer. It was true that the Duke of Argyll seemed to think that the Ameer only pretended to be afraid of the results of those advances; but he (Mr. E. Stanhope) thought that from the Papers themselves there undoubtedly was substantial ground for the fears which the Ameer had then expressed. It seems perfectly clear that the Ameer was alarmed by the Russian advance in Central Asia, and that he sought our protection against its consequences. Upon that point he accepted the statement of Lord Northbrook's despatch to the Home Government on the advance of Russia, although, as Lord Northbrook stated, it was drawn more in accordance with Mr. Gladstone's speech on Mr. Eastwick's Motion than as expressing the views of the custodians of India. Lord Northbrook was of opinion that it was necessary and desirable that some more definite assurances should be given to the Ameer on this point, and he stated that the Cabinet at home gave their consent to his giving them. Upon that point he fully accepted the assurance of right hon. Gentlemen opposite. Lord Northbrook, however, gave those further assurances wrapped up in such a perfect mist of conditions that it was not surprising that the Envoy described those assurances as obscure, and asked for something a little more definite. The Envoy asked that the assurances should be put into writing, to be sent by Lord Northbrook to the Ameer, and that in that writing it should be stated distinctly that we intended to protect him against Russia. And what was the reply of Lord Northbrook? He would ask the House to remember what was the one assurance which had been given to the Ameer in 1869 by Lord Mayo—an assurance in writing which was peculiarly prized by him, and which it was evident from the beginning to the end of these Papers he had stuck to with the greatest tenacity. Well, Lord Northbrook sent a letter to the Ameer, and annexed to it certain conversations—he only called them conversations, not assurances—which had been held with the Envoy, and a Memorandum which the Envoy was instructed to show him, adding, with reference to affording him protection—

“But the question in my opinion is one of such importance that the discussion of it should be postponed until a more convenient opportunity.”

And the Memorandum also contained those words and no more. Lord Northbrook stated in his despatch that he had added those words because the Envoy had not authority to enter into the subject; but there was nothing in the Papers to show that the Envoy had not the necessary authority. Then in 1874 occurred the arrest of Yakoob Khan. He had no particular reason for disputing the proposition of the hon. Member, that the conduct of the Ameer in imprisoning Yakoob Khan was such that the Government could not justify it. There was one point of view of the matter, however, from which, doubtless, the Ameer might look at it. The Ameer stated that he had put his son in prison for two reasons — first, for rebelling against his authority; and, secondly, for engaging in intrigues with Persia to undermine his authority. Therefore, the Ameer himself might well conceive that he had ample justification for the course which he had pursued with regard to his son; and he quoted against us the language of Lord Mayo's letter, in which he said he (the Viceroy) should regard with the severest displeasure any rivals who might attempt to dispute the Throne with him. Our interferences on behalf of Yakoob Khan had rankled in the Ameer's breast for years, and it was the only grievance to which he had referred in his last letter. There was a good deal of evidence as to his state of mind in reference to us at this period of our relations. Lord Northbrook's Government told us that his language after the return of the Envoy from Simla in 1873 was "anything but satisfactory;" he had refused to let peaceful expeditions, sent under Colonel Baker and Mr. Forsyth, pass through his territory; he hesitated about accepting our gift of arms; and he had refused to accept the present in money we had offered him. In the meantime, it was abundantly clear that his relations with Russia had altered, and that he now no longer addressed them in merely courteous language, but as soliciting their favour. And what did he do towards England? In the earlier stages he said he was quite prepared to confer with Her Majesty's Government on the subject of his relations with Russia; and he sent on the letters which he had received from the Russian Governor General, in order that the Indian Government of the Queen might suggest replies. But if the House carefully studied the Papers in consecutive order, it would find that after a time his friendly communication was altogether dropped; and the only account which Her Majesty's Government received of any letters having passed between the Ameer and the Russian Governor General was the simple statement of the fact by our Agent.

MR. GOSCHEN asked the hon. Member to state the date at which this form of communication was dropped?

MR. E. STANHOPE said, that if the right hon. Gentleman would carefully examine the documents, he would find it very difficult to fix any very definite date for this event; but he would find the whole of it taking place within the years 1873-4-5; and when they came to 1876, the House would find the Agent representing—before Lord Lytton had said one word directly or indirectly either to the Ameer or to anyone connected with him—the estrangement and the annoyance of the Ameer. This was stated in various ways and by different persons; but there could be no doubt of the fact that the estrangement and alienation came about before Lord Lytton had had any communication with the Ameer, and was the result of action taken by former Rulers of India. The Viceroy, in a despatch dated May 10, 1877, wrote—

"In short, the information gradually extracted from our Cabul Agent convinced us that the system on which we had hitherto conducted our relations with Shere Ali had practically resulted, not only in the alienation of His Highness from the Power which had unconditionally subsidized and openly protected him; but also in the increased closeness and confidential character of his relations with the only other Power that can ever cause serious danger to our Empire in India."—[Afghanistan, No. 1, p. 168.]

This was the state of things with which his noble Friend (Lord Salisbury) had to deal; and in referring to the action of his noble Friend, he wished it to be clearly understood that up to the present time he had dealt entirely with events which happened before Lord Lytton went to India, and before the Ameer had any knowledge whatever of what Lord Salisbury had done in his capacity of Secretary of State. Up to the time of which he had been speaking, all Lord Salisbury's actions had been included in confidential communications between himself and the Government of India; and he now came to speak of the time at which the Government of India communicated what they had to say to the Ameer. It was clearly admitted by Lord Northbrook that the circumstances of the time, and the steady advance of Russia, might at length force the Government of India to give to the Ameer assurances utterly different from, and far more definite than, those they had hitherto given; and though he explained in a despatch in 1875 that he regarded the interference of Russia with Afghanistan as neither probable nor near, yet, at the same time, he intimated that if that advance took place it might be desirable not only to give more definite assurances, but actually to enter into a Treaty with the Ameer for protecting him against foreign aggression, adding that the appointment of a Resident at Herat would be a necessary consequence of any such engagement as that to which he referred, and of the advance of the Russian Frontier. Lord Salisbury's reply to this was, that if the Government were to wait for an indefinite period, as hinted by Lord Northbrook, the time for useful action might have passed, and that our influence with the Ameer, which was already on the wane, might have altogether disappeared. So that the only difference between Lord Salisbury and the Viceroy was as to the opportuneness of the time for the course which was suggested; and the consequences of the delay which resulted rested, to a very large extent, on Lord Northbrook, who for more than a year disregarded the instructions which he received from home. Which of the two was right? Events had shown that the contingency which Lord Northbrook described as neither near nor probable had happened within three years; that the time had passed for the representations which might have been made to the Ameer to be made with any chance of success; and that Lord Salisbury showed himself to be gifted with foresight which was entirely wanting in Lord Northbrook. Acting upon the conclusions at which he had arrived, Lord Salisbury instructed Lord Lytton, on his arrival in India, to propose a friendly Mission to the Ruler of Cabul. A great deal had been said upon the pretext on which the proposal of that Mission was based; but it seemed to be forgotten that the Ameer's own Minister had suggested to Lord Northbrook that it being necessary first to familiarize the Afghan people with the very idea of a Mission and of communication with the people of India, it would be unwise at the outset to set fully forth all the objects which it was hoped to attain by means of the Mission. The Envoy was to be instructed to offer to the Ameer certain definite assurances in the event of his asking for them; but the Ameer positively refused to receive the Mission on the 22nd of May, 1876—a date which was important, because at that time neither the occupation of Quetta nor the proposal of a Resident Envoy at Cabul had been made, and these were the events which in some quarters were said to have led to all or a great part of the difficulty that had arisen. After the refusal further negotiations were commenced; and the Ameer agreed that Her Majesty's Government should withdraw their Native Envoy from Cabul in order to confer with him at Simla as to the views of the Ameer. This was done, and the grievances, supposed or real, of the Ameer were set out at great length in the conversations which were recorded in the Afghan Papers. It transpired that his special grievances were—our decision as to the Seistan boundary, our interference in the case of Yakoo Khan, and certain steps we had taken with regard to Wakhan. It was then shown to the Ameer that Lord Lytton was most anxious to discuss these or any other grievances, and, if possible, to remove any misunderstanding that might have arisen. After this, further conversations took place between Lord Lytton and our Agent at Cabul, and he wished to protest against the language in which these conversations were described. It was certainly true that if there had been any desire on the part of the Government to withhold facts, they would have been amply justified in keeping back the records of these conversations, for the reason that they were just as strictly confidential communications as were those which passed between a client and his legal adviser, whom he wished to put in possession of certain facts, but not in the precise language which he would use when addressing the Court. Thus Lord Lytton impressed upon the Envoy the importance of the Ameer being induced to do something in order to strengthen himself in his external relations. It might be that some incidental expression might have been used which was not quite so judicious as could be wished; but the House would make every allowance for the circumstances in which that Conference was held; and they must remember that such confidential communications were never before given in any such form as that in which they now had them. In one of these it was curious to observe what a number of fallacies the hon. Member had discovered. He had tried, indeed, to make out of it that between this country and Russia there was a secret Treaty for the partition of Afghanistan. He thought he should waste time if he offered any observations on that subject. The evidence brought forward was so utterly meagre and unsupported by any facts, that he did not think it was worthy of any further consideration. But what was a much more serious matter was this—that the hon. Gentleman endeavoured also to draw the conclusion that the Government of this country was prepared to fulfil its written engagements, but that it would not keep its verbal engagements. Now, that was an utterly and entirely unfair and misleading interpretation to put on Lord Lytton's words. The distinction Lord Lytton drew as between verbal and written assurances was the distinction which was always drawn by the Ameer; and it was pointed out—as it always had been pointed out—that what the Ameer wanted was written and not verbal assurances. He said so in 1869, and he got them; and he said so in 1873, and he did not get them; and the Ameer had always relied on that little scrap of writing from Lord Mayo as something to be prized, because it was to the Oriental mind a thing he could understand. It was not a mere verbal undertaking, surrounded by conditions and all sorts of suggestions which were to the Oriental mind utterly and entirely a puzzle. Then followed the series of communications between Sir Lewis Pelly and the Agent of the Ameer. There was only one condition, and that was the condition of Lord Lytton that there should be Resident Agents on the Frontier of Afghanistan. The hon. Member quoted a great deal against this proposal, and he must therefore ask the permission of the House to allow him to interpose at this point of his narrative what were the real facts on that subject. In 1857, the question of Resident Envoys was not only raised, but it was accepted for a definite purpose by the Ameer, and was incorporated in the Treaty. Under that Treaty they were entitled to appoint Resident Agents for a certain purpose, not, indeed, at Cabul, but in other places. Again, in 1859 the question was mooted, and there could be no question whatever that the Ameer assented in principle to that condition. They had heard quoted the authority of Mr. Seton-Karr. This was the gentleman who, having been confidentially employed, thought fit, before any of these documents were given to the world, to give to the public his version of the transactions. Now, he was told Mr. Seton-Karr was a gentleman who did not speak the languages principally used on the occasion, and his evidence was not so powerful as that of other gentlemen concerned in the matter. He was not going to give his own evidence against that of Mr. Seton-Karr; he was going to ask the House to allow him to quote a much greater authority than his own. He was going to rest satisfied with the statement of Lord Northbrook's Government. When the hon. Gentleman approached that period he ceased to read anything from the Papers. He gave them a general idea of what he thought; but if he had read one passage they would have had Lord Northbrook's Government's definite views. He referred the House to the following paragraph in the despatch of Lord Northbrook's Government in 1875:—

“On the whole, however, we think that either the Ameer himself or his Minister, Noor Mahomed Shah, did in confidential communications with Captain Grey express a readiness to accept at some future time not far distant the presence of British Agents at places in Afghanistan, excepting Cabul itself. But our impression is that the intimation was intended to be contingent either upon the receipt of far more substantial assistance than was promised the Ameer at the Umballa Conferences, or upon the conclusion of a Dynastic Treaty, that is, upon obtaining the recognition, in a Treaty with the British Government, of his son Abdoolla Jan as his successor. Such a formal recognition His Highness was anxious to secure, but Lord Mayo, for obvious reasons, declined to entertain the proposal.”—[Afghanistan, No. 1, pp. 131-2.]

Now that was clear and distinct. [Mr. CHILDERS: Read the next paragraph.] He did not want to do anything unfair, he had not the next paragraph, and he did not know what it was, but he thought it had nothing to do with it. Passing on from 1869, it was clear the subject of Envoys was again discussed in 1873. Under Lord Northbrook's express instructions the Foreign Minister discussed the matter with the Agent of the Ameer, and then he suggested the appointment of Resident Agents in Afghanistan. Entire concurrence was expressed by the Agent in principle; but in order to familiarize the people it was thought desirable, in the first instance, only to depute an Agent to examine the Frontiers of the country, and not to reside there until the people of the country understood the matter. The position of affairs, then, was this—that the principle had been assented to more than once by the Government of Afghanistan; that Lord Northbrook had himself suggested it as an indispensable condition for making a complete and definite Treaty with the Ameer; and that the Agent of the Ameer came to Peshawur in 1877 on the express condition, which had been fully explained to him, that it was understood he assented to the condition of the acceptance of Resident Agents. From the first the great object the Ameer had in view was apparent. The Agent went over all the old grievances, and he showed no disposition whatever to come to a definite point. There was great delay; and all this time it was well known that the Ameer was hostile—so hostile that he had endeavoured to incite the neighbouring tribes to enter into a religious war. The conversations were drawn out to such a length that they seemed to be almost interminable. [An hon. MEMBER: There is no evidence of that.] Was the hon. Member who said there was no evidence prepared to disbelieve the distinct statement, not of Lord Lytton, but of the Government of India? Well, that being so, from the spirit in which the Ameer had acted, and in which he had instructed his Agents to continue the negotiations, it did not appear to the Government that there was any great hope of the negotiations ending satisfactorily. However, the Government were prepared to continue the negotiations. Now, the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken had made a great deal of what took place at the time, and he had endeavoured to show that the Government were desirous of snatching an opportunity of ending those negotiations. Well, he (Mr. E. Stanhope) durst say they were, for it seemed to him they would lead to no satisfactory results. But the inference which the hon. Gentleman drew from the despatch of Lord Lytton's Government was not, he believed, such as the House would be disposed to draw. That Government had stated that the Ameer still desired to gain time; that he was sending another Envoy; and that it was reported that he was prepared to accept our conditions. Probably, it was a report spread about by the Ameer himself to gain time, because he did not desire to commit himself finally either to Russia or to England. Then it was said—"Why did not Lord Lytton send home an account of those negotiations?" In the first place, the Government of India waited till those negotiations were concluded, and then sent home a despatch of great length and importance with the least possible delay. He thought it was unjust to the Viceroy of India to say that he delayed, for an unworthy motive, to send home a despatch because he desired to prevent a division of opinion in his Council from becoming known. If such imputations were to be made, he wished to know why did not the Duke of Argyll send a despatch to India and tell the Indian Government distinctly in 1873 what his policy was with reference to Afghanistan? He sent a telegram which it was impossible for any ordinary human being to understand. The hon. Member alluded to a letter written by Sir Henry Norman, in which he said that he had no opportunity of representing his dissent from the opinions of Lord Lytton, because of the delay in this despatch. That was a misleading statement. He (Mr. E. Stanhope) had an opportunity that very day of conversing with a gentleman who held a very responsible position not long ago in the Council of India, and he told him it was a well-established rule that dissent could not be entered before anything was discussed; but that when the thing was thoroughly discussed it was open to any Member of the Council to make an entry of his dissent in the Minutes, and to call upon the Governor General to send the Minutes home. Sir Henry Norman neglected that opportunity. The next point to which he thought the hon. Member attached considerable importance was a statement of his noble Friend (Lord Salisbury) soon after the conclusion of the Conferences. Well,

Mr. E. Stanhope

Lord Salisbury had given a full explanation of that in the other House of Parliament. To that explanation it was almost impossible for him (Mr. E. Stanhope) to add. If the House was not prepared to accept the assurances which his noble Friend gave as perfectly sincere there was really nothing more to say. But he did know that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) and the hon. Member for Bedford, in the speeches which they had made in the country, had misquoted the language of Lord Salisbury. It might have been accidental; but it was rather curious that the language should have been misquoted in the same way in both speeches.

MR. WHITBREAD said, he held Hansard in his hand, and handed it to the reporter.

MR. CHILDERS said, he wrote down the statement precisely, and read it word for word.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, they must be very much obliged to him for affording them an opportunity of making these explanations. They were unfortunate in being reported by The Daily News.

MR. CHILDERS believed the report in The Times was verbatim. The report in The Daily News was a very short one.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, nobody who read the speech of Lord Salisbury could doubt for a moment that the circumstances were exactly those which he stated. He explained that then he spoke under circumstances which prevented any full statement—and he answered a definite question put by the Duke of Argyll, and the proof that he was understood in what he stated was to be found in the subsequent speech of Lord Northbrook, who said that he understood Lord Salisbury's speech to apply only to an Envoy at Cabul. To resume; the Conference being broken up, the Government considered it desirable to review the position in which we stood towards the Ameer. It was explained to him most fully that we desired and sought no quarrel with the people of Afghanistan. Our object was that they should enjoy their independence, their peace, and their prosperity. We had no wish to interfere with their domestic concerns; and while we carefully guarded ourselves from being supposed to accept the interpretation which the Ameer had put upon certain assurances of Lord

Mayo's, we told him that we would not withdraw from the obligations we had previously entered into. We did not disguise from him that we should have preferred a policy of hearty co-operation for the protection of our common interests; but if he would not have it, then we were prepared to revert to our former relations, only hoping that the day would come when he would see matters in the same light as we did, and be prepared to welcome proposals made to him in absolute good faith. So matters continued till an event happened which changed the whole aspect of affairs. We learned in July last that a Russian Mission had arrived at Cabul, and had been welcomed by the Ameer, after having rejected our Mission. Considering the events which were happening in Europe, and the attitude of the Ameer, this appeared to the Government of India to constitute a grave political declaration, and to necessitate a re-consideration of our whole position. He (Mr. E. Stanhope) supposed that our only motive for caring about the affairs of Afghanistan had been the interest of India. We are placed in that country in a position unexampled in the history of the world, as trustees for its many millions of inhabitants, and responsible for their contentment and prosperity. The Government of India had always held that the maintenance of Afghanistan as an independent, strong, and friendly Power was desirable, not only as a barrier against the encroachments of any foreign Power, but as a security to our Frontier. Not that we had, or have, any expectation of invasion, still less any fear of it. But it had long ago been pointed out that the influence of a Russian Mission at Cabul would be perceptible throughout the length and breadth of India. As long ago as 1847 Lord Palmerston thus expressed to Lord John Russell his views with reference to Afghanistan—

“A Russian force in occupation of Afghanistan might not be able to march to Calcutta, but it might convert Afghanistan into the advanced post of Russia, instead of that advanced post being in Persia; and whatever Hardinge may say of the security of the rest of our Frontier, you would find in such a case a very restless spirit displayed by the Burmese, by the Nepaulese, and by all the incorporated States scattered about the surface of our Indian Possessions. These things would lead to great expense, require great efforts, and might create considerable damage. The best method of preventing these embarrassments seems to be to take up such a position, not in posse, but in esse, as would make it plain to everybody that we could not be taken by surprise."

Well, the Government of India, entertaining the same opinion, felt that while Afghanistan was under British influence, our Frontier—in itself a purely accidental one—was comparatively secure; but that if she were to become a mere tool of a foreign Power, a formidable element of disturbance and intrigue would be introduced upon our Frontier, while within that Frontier the disturbing effect (to say the least of it) would be enormous. It would, he was sure, very much surprise the House if he were to tell it how numerous were the disturbances which had constantly been occurring upon our Frontier. There had been during the last 28 years no less than 19 expeditions, in which 68,000 men had been engaged, and no less than 60 or 70 affairs of minor importance. And what, he should like to know, would have been the condition of our Frontier, if those who dwelt upon the other side of the mountains had always been hostile to us instead of friendly? We should have been driven from a permanent state of peace establishment into one of constant preparation for war. And what was the course which was, under the circumstances, taken by the Government of India? It might have been, under some circumstances, judicious to have treated the conduct of Shere Ali as a merely unfriendly act, and we might have remained inactive, or the suggestion of Lord Lawrence might have been adopted, and we might have retired from our present position to the line of the Indus. That was a matter which, however, he did not think he need argue for a moment, for everybody must be aware what would be the effect which would be produced in India by any such abandonment of our position as Lord Lawrence proposed. The point was one, he might add, which he was quite content to leave as it had been placed by the Duke of Argyll, in saying we could not allow Afghanistan to pass entirely under the influence of a foreign Power. Or we might have insisted that the course taken by the Ameer amounted to an act of open hostility to us; but a much more moderate view was taken by the Government of India. They said—

"It appeared quite possible, however, that the significance of this event might have been over-rated or misconstrued in India, or that the Ameer himself might be induced, by timely diplomatic representations, to realize the gravity of his action, and to appreciate its inevitable effect upon his relations with our Government. But the only hope of clearing up any such misunderstandings, or of bringing our legitimate influence to bear upon the Ameer, lay in the renewal of direct personal intercourse with him through a British Envoy."—[Afghanistan, No. 1, p. 239.]

That being so, the Government of India proposed to send a friendly Mission to the Ameer; and they pointed out that they did not at the time anticipate that there would have been any serious difficulty on the part of the Ameer in accepting that Mission. They hoped that he would, on the contrary, really have welcomed it; and that to make the attempt was, at all events, not only desirable, but absolutely necessary. And what were the steps which were actually taken? Were they unfriendly? Sir Neville Chamberlain was appointed to conduct the Mission, and he was given an escort of no unreasonable strength, and one by far smaller than that which the Ameer himself had brought with him into India upon a former occasion. If a smaller one, indeed, had been sent, it would have been regarded by the people of India as derogatory to our prestige. We had, besides, sent, in deference to the Ameer, Gholam Hussein Khan, who had already acted as Agent in Cabul, to announce the Mission. But it would appear that, from first to last, the sole object of the Ameer was delay. Our Agent was allowed to make only short marches. Four letters had been sent to the officers of the Ameer, of which a great deal had been said—they had been sent to clear the way, as it were, for our Agent, and in order that there might be no mistake as to his responsibility. That being so, Gholam Hussein Khan arrived in Cabul on the 10th of October. He had an interview with the Ameer, and from that time several letters had been received giving an account of the state of feeling of the Ameer. Among those letters, which had been, as far as they were in the possession of the Government, set forth in the Blue Book, there was one to which he thought it desirable attention should be drawn, because it explained the great point in all these communications—that most of them had been written under the influence of the Ameer. That letter explained previous letters, and was from Gholam Hussein Khan to Munshi Muhammad Bakhtyar Khan, and it was as follows:—

“The facts are these: Whatever I write is what I hear from the Wazir or from the Ameer, and some sentences are from myself. Considering that the post is in the hands of the Ameer, and that nobody is allowed to communicate with me, you may imagine what sort of an account I can give. The temper of the Ameer is hasty (or touchy), and he gives little or no attention to the letters from the British Government. The reason of his not inviting the English Mission is the intention to delay. Three Russian officers have gone back and two are still in Cabul. I suspect that the coming of the English Mission is impossible so long as the Russians are here (or until the Russians have gone back). If the British Government is content to delay for its own purposes, then conciliatory letters may prove useful, but in the event of delay being considered injurious, then my stay here is of no profit, and I should be recalled in some suitable manner.”—[Ibid. p. 247.]

That being, as we were informed by Gholam Khan, the state of things, what did Lord Lytton do? Did he show himself as anxious to precipitate matters as some seemed to suppose? No; he telegraphed to Major Cavagnari that he was to take great care not to proceed in his arrangements with the Frontier Tribes in such a manner as to offend the Ameer, before the opportunity had been afforded of seeing whether he would accept our Mission. The delay, however, continued to go on, and time passed to such an extent that the Government of India felt they could wait no longer. Major Cavagnari accordingly proceeded and had an interview with the Agents of Shere Ali at Ali Musjid; and, with regard to that interview, he was glad to find the hon. Member opposite had not that evening spoken as he had done at Bedford, because at Bedford he spoke of the telegram which was sent by the Viceroy, giving an account of it, as a lying telegram.

MR. WHITBREAD: The word “lying” is one which never ought to be used in public speaking, and I am sorry it should have been. What I intended to convey was that the telegram, whoever it came from, gave a false impression of what had occurred.

MR. E. STANHOPE: The telegram was from the Viceroy, and such a word as “lying” applied to it was, in his opinion, deserving of serious reprobation, and the hon. Member had certainly used it.

MR. WHITBREAD denied that he had applied such language to the Governor General. He had copied the telegram from a newspaper, not knowing who was the author of it, and what he wished to state—and what he was prepared to state in that House or anywhere else—was that the telegram, in giving an abbreviated account of what had taken place, had conveyed a false impression of the scene at Ali Musjid.

MR. E. STANHOPE was sorry the hon. Gentleman had not corrected the report of his speech which appeared in the papers, and would only add upon that point, that any imputation on the character of the Governor General of India, who had such important negotiations to conduct, appeared to him to be extremely undesirable as well as unfair. They had great difficulty in presenting the telegrams in such a way as to do justice to the Viceroy, and afford an impartial statement of the facts. To say, then, that what he asserted was utterly untrue, was very hard on the Viceroy. That being the case, he was prepared to justify the telegram. Having read the Reports of Colonel Jenkins and Major Cavagnari, he was convinced that what the Viceroy had said was the whole truth. He would not quote the Report, which had been often quoted; but he really had thought that the House would believe the truth of the Viceroy's statement as to what passed at that interview. That interview was also remarkable for another thing—the tact shown by Major Cavagnari. At any moment an incautious word from him might have precipitated a conflict; and obviously, if Lord Lytton had intended that result, he would never have instructed him to preserve a cautious demeanour towards the subjects of Shere Ali. After the refusal of the Commandant of Ali Musjid to admit our Mission, the Viceroy, so far from precipitating a collision, telegraphs home that he would endeavour to avoid it, and, if possible, to obtain a pacific solution. And after that, he instructed his Envoy to address a final Ultimatum to Shere Ali, and to offer time for consideration. This forbearance was carried so far as to cause a delay of two months before the insult was resented, and of postponing military operations to the very last day possible before the commencement of the winter. He wished to ask hon. Members opposite, at what point of the negotiations was it that, in their opinion, the Government had gone wrong? He would like to know precisely what they would have done in like circumstances? How would they have treated the Prince who had tried to stir up the Border Tribes against us, and who, in order to embarrass us at a time when, to say the least of it, our relations with another foreign country were strained, had received an Envoy from that country whose intentions were avowedly hostile to us, while our counter-Mission was rejected in the face of all India, and at a point outside his own territory to which he had advanced his forces? In view of all those facts, the Government of India had felt that a crisis had arrived in our relations with Afghanistan; that if such conduct were tolerated, a feeling might get abroad that we were losing our strength; and that that paramount influence in Afghanistan which ought to be ours was not only going, but absolutely gone. The Indian Government had felt that Afghanistan under a foreign Power might prove a constant menace to our safety in the East, and they had accordingly represented to the Government at home the absolute and urgent necessity of taking some steps to secure our position. There could be no pretence for saying that Lord Lytton desired war—of all people in the world he was one of the least likely to desire it; and if there was one thing for which he would be remembered gratefully, it would be for the re-establishment of our Indian finances on a sound basis. Was it likely, then, that he should desire to overthrow that satisfactory basis, and to risk his whole reputation and undertake the anxieties of war? The Government at home had entered upon the war with no light heart—though sometimes they had been accused of desiring war—but that had been at a time when they had achieved peace. In truth, they desired no war, and no annexation of Afghanistan; yet, when dangers and trials were pressing, and when they felt that to take some notice of them was necessary and unavoidable, if they had failed to do so they would have been untrue to their trust. In that spirit, they were quite ready to submit their conduct to the judgment of Parliament, and were not afraid of the verdict.

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, in my opinion, the two speeches we have listened to this evening are not likely to diminish the wonder that has been expressed in several quarters at the contrast between the eager warmth with which this matter has been discussed out-of-doors, six weeks ago, and the calm and dispassionate manner in which it has been debated within this House. But the circumstances have greatly altered; for six weeks ago the question of war and peace was still open, and those who regarded war as a great calamity would have been something less than Englishmen if they had not discussed the subject with animation. The Government, however, have now taken upon themselves the responsibility of declaring war. Overt acts of war have been committed; and it has become the duty of Parliament to say conscientiously whether they think what has been done should have been done or left alone. We are bound to do that, unless we are ready to sink to the rank of an Assembly which only meets to register the foregone conclusions of the Government. A theory has been propounded by several leading papers, that when war has once been declared the House of Commons has nothing to do but to hold its tongue and vote the money. But I cannot endorse it; for the simple reason that it goes to maintain that the most important of all resolutions which the Executive can take—if only it be taken without first consulting Parliament—is ipso facto removed from the cognizance of Parliament. I do not propose to touch on any of the matters which have been treated so exhaustively by my hon. Friend the Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread), except in so far as that is rendered necessary by some of the observations of the last speaker. It is especially necessary to refer to certain remarks of his with regard to Lord Northbrook; because Lord Cranbrook's despatch identifies Lord Northbrook's reputation with that of the Government which I had the honour to support. Lord Cranbrook, in the ninth paragraph of his despatch, has attempted to throw upon Lord Northbrook the consequences of the fatal step that was taken in 1876, and which has involved us in the war with the Ameer; and the Under Secretary of State for India evidently regards

—and justly so—Lord Northbrook as the recalcitrant agent of the present Government. The hon. Gentleman said—“Events showed that representations which were addressed to the Ameer in 1876 ought to have been addressed to him in 1875, and would have been addressed to him but for Lord Northbrook.” Sir, I should rather say that events have proved the truth of Lord Northbrook's prediction, and that the consequences which Lord Northbrook said were certain to arise, if a certain fatal step was taken in 1875, have actually resulted now that that step was taken in 1876. Lord Northbrook prophesied that if British Residents were pressed on the Ameer he would refuse to receive them. He has refused. He prophesied that the refusal would impair the influence of the British Government in India. It has done so to such a degree that we are going into a great war to restore that influence. He prophesied that the Ameer would be thrown into the arms of Russia; and he has been thrown so completely into the arms of Russia that no one knows if he will be got out of them. The hon. Gentleman, towards the close of his speech, asked the cardinal question on which the issue of this debate must turn, and that is—at what specific point of those negotiations the conduct of the late Government would have diverged from that of Her Majesty's Ministers? Although I am not in the secrets of the late Government, I will not hesitate to name the exact point of separation, and that is just half-way through the Blue Book, at page 128, at the time when Lord Salisbury wrote a letter raising again the question of the British Agents in the territories of the Ameer, and insisting that his policy with regard to that matter should be carried through. Lord Northbrook, however, clearly shows that his policy with regard to Afghanistan had been to show the Ameer that we desired to assist him with our advice whenever he required it, and not to press upon him the presence of a British officer within his territories. While I thank the Government for the fulness of the Blue Book—and feel bound to compliment the editor upon the skill with which he has arranged the several documents—I have yet to complain that there is one hiatus in the Papers which will have to be explained in a manner which will bring more conviction to the House than has been produced hitherto—the absence of the Minute of General Norman, Sir Arthur Hobhouse, and Sir William Muir. Had that been given, it would have let some light in upon what is the difference between the old and new policy of the Indian Government. Taking the Papers as a whole, however, such well-digested information, tracing the whole course of events, has never been laid before Parliament to my knowledge, and they give those who study them an opportunity of so tracing them. We have often heard of the high pitch to which the art of writing well is carried among our Anglo-Indian officials; but this collection of Papers proves that at the India Office there exists not only the art of writing well, but a still higher and rarer literary quality—the art of arrangement. This Book contains not merely the materials of history. It is history itself. Almost without a word of comment, the story is left to tell itself; and the only exception brings into strong relief the merit of the performance; for I cannot but think that the author himself would be glad if he had ended the Book at page 260. Lord Cranbrook ought to have been sufficiently confident in the excellence of his own production to have sent it into the world without the tail which he has put to it; and the unfortunate—and to those whose political and administrative reputations are concerned the very unfortunate—brevity and condensation of paragraph 9 contrasts most unfavourably with the full and detailed exposition of the rival policies of Lord Lawrence and Lord Lytton, of the late Cabinet and the present one. As to the merits of those policies we differ, and differ widely; but as to their intention, it is difficult to see how there can be any difference of opinion whatsoever. The old policy consisted in full reliance upon a well-disciplined and well-appointed army, stationed within our own borders; in keeping our troops in hand in a country where there was, or soon would be, complete means of lateral communication all along our Frontier, and where that Frontier would not be cut transversely by great ranges of mountains—as high as the mountains of the Bernese Oberland—which would hinder, instead of furthering, that facility of concentration which is the soul of modern, and indeed of all, warfare. Another supposed—and, as I think, very material—advantage of the old policy was that our Frontier lay in a plain; and the inhabitants of a plain when once conquered are conquered for ever; while there are few instances in history in which the inhabitants of mountains have been finally and thoroughly subdued and assimilated. Situated, to a great extent, in a fertile country, in the midst of their supplies, and in the very heart of the best recruiting ground in India, our Army had nothing to do, except to look after the people who were in front of them, and no reason to trouble themselves about the people among whom they lived, or, still worse, the people who were behind them. And while this policy was, according to the very distinguished military men who held it, the most effective policy from a military point of view, it had, in the eyes of the soldier-statesmen who governed India, and who, while they were soldiers, were not ashamed of being statesmen, this immense recommendation—that it was an economical policy. That was the opinion not of holiday soldiers, or penny-wise and pound-foolish economists. The Minute of 1869 embodying that opinion was signed by the statesman who saved the Punjab, and the General who had been Chief of the Staff of the Army which recovered India. Men who had been in such a position at such a crisis knew very well that a military danger, far more serious than any external military danger, would be the internal discontent that would infallibly result from increased and increasing taxation. Such men as these—such a man as Colonel Reynell-Taylor, the Commissioner of Umballah, who in three desperate campaigns has fought throughout the length and breadth of the country which he now wisely governs—hold the same view; as General Norman, who, in the course of 10 years, was 25 times thanked in general orders and despatches for services in the field—held the view that the old system of Frontier defence was the most effective for military purposes; and that the system which was most effective for military reasons was—as in the long run must always be the case—the most truly economical. To put against opinions like these you have, indeed, great names; but I must beg to remind the House that this is a matter on which we want something more than great names—we want exact calculations. General Norman, and Colonel Taylor, and Sir John

Lawrence, are arguing in favour of a system which they know by experience; which they have worked, and, to a great extent, have founded; a system which was in force for many years; a system which was in force from the moment when the Government of Lord Ellenborough evacuated Afghanistan to the moment when the Government of Lord Lytton occupied Quetta. But the new policy is a thing of the future. The military and still more financial arrangements connected with it are matters of hypothesis and conjecture; and I am bound to say that the imaginations and ideas of some of its warmest supporters are—like the garrisons which they propose to plant a couple of hundred miles from our present Frontier—not in the plain, but in the clouds. What are the data on which we are relying, as against the minute, the well-founded, the familiar, and household knowledge of the old school of Punjaubee administrators? Here is a specimen of what—in default of any estimates proceeding from official and authentic sources—is put forward as a guide to the public opinion of the country. General Shakspear, of the Artillery—a very hard-fighting officer, though his distinguished services were done elsewhere than in India, and who appears to be at least as courageous with his pen as with his sword—writes to The Times from the scientific club to say that, whereas our present Frontier would take 100,000 men to defend it, a scientific Frontier would require only 5,000 men. Now, here we have a scientific soldier writing about a scientific Frontier from a scientific club, who tells us that, if the Russians attempted to invade us—for that, of course, is the contingency under which we should require 100,000 men to hold our present Frontier—we could keep them back with 5,000 men. Sir, I cannot imagine how anyone—soldier or civilian—can believe that, by placing behind our backs a range of mountains 100 miles broad, 13,000 to 17,000 feet high, and swarming with turbulent and faithless mountaineers, we could at once repel Russia, and keep up our numerous, lengthy, and perilous lines of communication with smaller forces than we have at present. It is at least an open question among scientific military men that a line on the summit of a range of mountains—or, still more, on the reverse of a range of mountains—is the very worst and most dangerous line to defend. You have not only to protect your main Passes—and for every one of those main Passes, if Russia came, 5,000 men would be barely sufficient garrison—you have to watch and block every mule track, and even foot track, by which Infantry could pass in order to take your garrisons in the rear. Look at the experience of Turkey. By far the greatest and most unmitigated misfortune of Turkey in the late war was the defeat which befel her at a time when events, political and military, were hurrying so fast that very little was heard of it in London—the battle which, I think, is called the battle of Kesnova. The Turks held the Shipka Pass and the neighbourhood in immense force, and with a most powerful artillery. They were attacked in front by the main Russian Army. They beat the Russians handsomely. They were on the very point of ruining their army, when Skobelev pushed his Infantry across paths by which he could not drag a single field-piece. He took the victorious army in the rear. He had it at a hopeless disadvantage. Without a gun to help him, two-and-forty pieces of Artillery fell into his hands in a couple of hours. And when once they were beaten, the whole Turkish Army, being on the mountains—instead of being on their own side of the mountains—were captured, if I recollect right, to the number of 28,000 men. Now, brave as the Turks are—heaven knows that I do not wish to argue too closely from them to our own valiant battalions; but everybody who has studied military history knows that, in order to fight his best, the British soldier must, like other soldiers, be placed in a position which accords with the well-established principles of the art of war. I am stating the case insufficiently. I am conceding half of what is urged on the other side, when I say that if we push our line across the mountains, for every soldier who, owing to our improved positions, we could spare from the front, we should be forced to tell off two to guard our communications. Austria requires 60,000 men permanently to occupy Bosnia and Herzegovina—countries in which, taking them together, two-thirds of the population are favourable to her—and if we chose to place behind our Frontier a district much like Bosnia and Herzegovina, with mountains thrice as high, and with a population not a man of which we can trust, to believe that we should in the end get off more cheaply than Austria, is, in my opinion, to labour under nothing short of infatuation. And, what is more, that is the opinion of Her Majesty's Government. If the object of this war—the wisdom of which we condemn and you justify—is to provide India with a Frontier which can be defended more economically, what is the meaning of the announcement made in this House last Friday by the Under Secretary of State for India? What is the meaning of his declaration that the Indian Government, with the unanimous consent of the Indian Council, had determined to increase the Native Army? And The Times newspaper—which throughout the whole of this business has shown a minute acquaintance with the military intentions of the Government that is more than prophetic—The Times newspaper, which two full months before war was declared, before ever the Chamberlain Mission had started from Peshawur, before nine out of ten Englishmen knew that such a Mission was to be sent, told us the exact number of troops which would be required in case Afghanistan was invaded, and entered into details so minute that it pointed out the destination of every half-squadron and half-battery—The Times newspaper now informs us that the Indian Government intends to increase every Native Infantry battalion by 200 men, and to add a proportionate complement of European officers. Under the old policy we contrived to guard India with 500 bayonets in a battalion; and since we have been informed by the Prime Minister—on the most solemn and important occasion on which, except from his place in Parliament, a Prime Minister can speak—that we have gone to war to extend our Frontier; and since, by the confession of the Ministry, the first result of our extension of Frontier, as I can well believe, will be to add 40 per cent to the strength of our Infantry—apart from justice, apart from international morality, on grounds of British, or, as it is now called, Imperial expediency—I emphatically put in my protest against such a war. I should very much like to know whether

Lord Beaconsfield, before he made his declaration at the Guildhall—which committed the country to a permanent military occupation of the North-Western Highlands—had considered in detail the practical objections which the Indian authorities made to such an occupation in the year 1869, and had satisfied himself of the practical arguments by which those objections should be refuted? Let hon. Gentlemen turn to pages 56 and 57 of the Afghan Papers—I have not risen to take up their time by reading lengthy extracts, and still less shall I presume to translate into my own feeble and insufficient language the phrases in which the ablest and most distinguished of our Punjab officials have put their opinions and their experience on record; but I beg hon. Gentlemen to read that part of Colonel Reynell-Taylor's despatch which refers to the inconvenience—a word which, in the Indian language, means the peril—of permanently stationing Native troops on the other side of the mountains, and still more among the mountains themselves. It has been my great good fortune—a good fortune which I wish had been shared by some very prominent statesmen—to have had just enough connection with India to make me more than distrustful—to make me absolutely sceptical as to my own power of forming any sound opinion of Indian subjects as the result of my own observation. But I do know just enough of India—or, rather, of Anglo-India—to have some means of judging the relative value of the opinions of others; and I am certain that when Colonel Reynell-Taylor states, and gives the grounds for his statement, that the permanent occupation of the new Frontier will put a strain—and a very serious strain—on the discipline and the morale of our Native Army, he has said something which will require a more weighty answer than a few clever sentences in a debating speech in the House of Commons. I look in vain in these Papers for a confutation of these, as I think, convincing—and, if convincing, most alarming—arguments. At this moment, on both sides of the House, we are under the deep impression produced upon our judgments and imaginations by successes, which prove that the quality of British soldiery has not deteriorated, and the average quality of British military leadership has largely and unmistakably improved. At this moment our Native troops, who have taken part in those successes, are under the influence of the just pride and exultation which spreads itself like a second patriotism through a successful army; but when two or three—or, if you like, 20 or 30—years have gone by; when the novelty has worn off, and the cold, the discomfort, the exile, the entire breaking up of that family and domestic life which, to the Native soldier, constitutes a necessity of military service, have done their work, then the discontent of the 25,000 Sikhs and Poorbeah Sepoys, who will be quartered in the Passes, will add a very serious feature to our Indian difficulties. But it will be said you may quarter the European troops in the Passes, and keep the Natives in the plains. That may be said in the House of Commons; but it will not be regarded as a practical solution of the question in India. With 200,000 men in arms under the command of the independent Princes of India; with Scindiah adopting the Prussian system to arm his entire male population; with our own Native Army 120,000 strong; our 40,000 or 50,000 British linesmen, and our 10,000 British Artillerymen are not a man too many to enable the Englishmen resident in Hindostan to sleep quiet in their beds. When the first flush of victory and confidence is over, I will venture to say that the least acceptable proposition which could be made to the Anglo-Indian community would be to denude Cawnpore, Meerut, and Allahabad, in order to send 12,000 or 15,000 British bayonets to the other side of the Suleiman mountains. These were the considerations, I cannot doubt, which weighed with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, when, in August, 1877, he made his declaration against advancing our present Frontier. So strong was the right hon. Gentleman's opinion in favour of the view which I have been advocating, that he declared himself opposed to the military occupation of Quetta. Considerations—political and diplomatic—have since, I suppose, modified the right hon. Gentleman's judgment; but on the military question—and I have not attempted to deal with any other—I boldly quote him as an authority in favour of my view. It is a thousand pities that we did not leave it for Russia, if she wants to invade us, to entangle herself in a preliminary conflict with the Ameer, and hamper and handicap herself with the bitter animosity of that most resentful nation—the effect of whose patient but watchful hostility we ourselves, a generation ago, learned by memorable experience. I could wish no worse fortune for our worst enemy than to have turned himself—as we have contrived to turn ourselves—into the enemy of the Afghan race. An hon. Friend of mine opposite—who, I think, has not been in India—the other day, when speaking to his constituents, described the Ameer as the puppet of Russia. With much greater justice, the hon. Gentleman the Member for the Eastern Division of the West Riding (Mr. C. Beckett-Denison)—who has been in India for a long time and to some purpose—spoke of the Ameer as a Potentate who was anxious to rub the noses of England and Russia together. But, unfortunately, we needs must step in and remind Shere Ali that there was a Power far more formidable than Russia, and far nearer to his doors, who demanded of him much greater sacrifices, and was determined to inflict on him a more intolerable humiliation. I candidly admit that the negotiations with Lord Northbrook in 1873 left the Ameer sullen. I am very much inclined to think that they found him sullen; but Shere Ali, whatever else he may be, is no fool; and some much stronger motive than sullenness is required to induce a Ruler to defy a Power which could at any time occupy his capital on six weeks' notice, and that motive was terror—terror, mixed with indignation, at the persistent determination to force upon him British Residents; the invitation—for so he would read it—to accept the fate of so many other Native Rulers who had admitted British political officers within their Frontiers—to run the usual round of semi-independence, total dependence, and then final subjugation and extinction. He knew his people better than we know them. He knew that when Afghans saw the white faces lording it in their streets they could not be trusted to keep their fingers off the foreigner. He knew—if we have forgotten it—how often, among a people less hot-blooded and vindictive than his, the downfall of a Native dynasty has begun with an attack upon the British Residency. And in this frame of mind he heard that Quetta—which stands at the back gate of his country, as Peshawur stands at the front gate—was occupied by a military force; and he heard it, as we well know, with much the same feelings as George III. heard that Napoleon was encamped with 100,000 men on the cliffs off Dover. And, finally, his Envoy was invited to a Conference at Peshawur, to which our Envoy came with the draft of a Treaty in his pocket, which as hon. Gentlemen will see, if they turn to pages 190, 191, was expressly, carefully, and most effectually drawn for the purpose of turning him into a subsidised dependent. If we wished to hurt his feelings; if we wished to pick a quarrel with him; if we wished to thrust him—whether he willed it or not—into the capacious arms of Russia, I cannot even conceive what other course we should have taken. But the details of the process by which this unhappy Ruler was forcibly alienated from British influence, which by the end of this week will be familiar to the country, I leave in more capable hands. My endeavour to-night was not to enlarge upon the justice or injustice of our conduct—though my vote in the division will be affected by that consideration—but to show, apart from right or wrong, that we are doing not well, but ill for our own interests by going to war in quest of a scientific Frontier.

MR. MARTEN said, it must be assumed that the Government was following the advice of military men of experience, and he pointed out that the testimony of an experienced commander like Lord Napier of Magdala was in favour of the Frontier which was now sought for North-Western India. In that noble Lord's opinion the assertion that we were secure in India if we remained within our mountain boundary was at variance with all history. A mountain chain that could be pierced in many places was no security if you hid behind it. How much Austria lost in not defending the Bohemian mountains; and what might have been the position of the Turks had they properly secured the passage of the Balkans? The principal charge the Mover of the Amendment had made against the Government was that they had inaugurated a new policy with regard to our Indian Possessions, and that that policy was a policy of preserving ourselves against the aggressions of Russia. But he (Mr. Marten) distinctly repudiated that charge; for he contended that they had, on the contrary, endeavoured to pursue the same policy, making allowance for the changes which were found necessary under the altered circumstances. As he understood the policy of the Indian Government and of England with regard to Afghanistan, it was that we desired Afghanistan should be independent, strong, and, above all, that it should be friendly to us; and if these three conditions were fulfilled, our position on the North-Western Frontier would be safely protected. The real ground of complaint put forward by the Ameer, according to his Envoy, was the interference of the Viceroy with regard to his son. How could it then, in fairness, be said that we had given him umbrage by asking that he should enter with us into an offensive and defensive Treaty, which was, he contended, a proposal for a complete alliance justified by the advances of Russia, and for the due effect of which it was necessary that we should have the means of having Resident Agents? Reviewing the Papers at considerable length, the conclusion he arrived at was, that had we, at an earlier period, adopted a wise and friendly policy we might still have been on friendly terms with the Ameer, who had at one time avowed his willingness to be the enemy of our enemies. That friendly disposition had, for some reasons not clearly explained, been disturbed. He (Mr. Marten) was very strongly impressed with the belief that both the Indian Government and the Government of this country, before the accession to power of the present Ministry, had not been sufficiently alive to the active progress made by Russia in Central Asia. The House was asked to express its disapproval of the general policy of the present Government; but from what had been already said in the debate, and the references that had been made to the Papers in the hands of hon. Members, the present war, he maintained, had been forced upon the Government by circumstances arising out of the policy of their Predecessors; and if they had pursued a timid or procrastinating policy they would have lost a great opportunity, in his opinion, of strengthening our Indian Frontier. The purchase of the Suez Canal shares; the assumption of the title of Empress of India by Her Majesty; the visit of the Prince of Wales to that country; were, he believed, all portions of a policy which had been pursued by the Government with great skill and perseverance, and which was calculated to uphold our great and glorious Empire.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: I understood the hon. and learned Member opposite (Mr. Marten) to say that the policy which the Government have recently pursued in India is not a new one, but is only the policy of their Predecessors, with some slight rectification. I think, in the face of the Papers, he will find it difficult to establish such a statement as that; and I think it entirely inconsistent with all that fell from the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for India. I listened with great attention to the very able statement he made to-night. It was a clear and consistent statement; but I thought it a little incomplete. It made clear the position which the Government occupied as to Afghanistan; but it left me a little in doubt as to the position which the Government think they occupy in regard to Russia. I understand, from the account given in the speech of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Stanhope), that the hostility—and the evidently increasing hostility—of the Ameer towards this country was an all-sufficient justification for the policy pursued. He told us that this hostility was in a measure due to the action we had taken with regard to his son, Yakoo Khan; to our refusal to complete with him a defensive and offensive alliance; that it was owing to the unfortunate action of previous Viceroys; that it was due to a variety of circumstances; but there was one thing which had not the slightest effect on the good will of the Ameer towards us, and that was the attempt to force upon him the residence of British officers in his territory. This statement was made on the authority of Captain Grey, who reported that Mahomed Shah had declared the Ameer would not object to receive European Agents in other places than Cabul. But the hon. Gentleman omitted to quote the statement which followed the one he read, and which is from the Governor General in Council, in which he says, in reference to this statement, that, looking at all the circumstances of the case, and the absence of all official record of a conversation of a private and confidential nature, he was not justified in founding an opinion that the Ameer was willing to receive a European Agent at Herat. Proofs are not wanting that both the Ameer and his father, Dost Mahomed, persistently, and on all occasions, objected to such a Mission. And what stronger proof could be afforded of this than the fact that he refused an alliance with his powerful neighbour and £100,000, rather than accept such a condition? What are the proofs the hon. Gentleman has given us of the unfriendliness of the Ameer? First, he tells us of the attempt to get up a "Jehad" against the British Government. But I believe that if there is any truth in what appears to be only a rumour—for though he tells us this upon the authority of the Governor General, it must be recollected that the Viceroy does not report from his own knowledge, but from Native and other sources—but suppose there is anything in this report that a religious war was attempted to be got up, it was directed against both Russians and English. The second proof of hostility is the refusal of the Ameer to accept the Mission. That refusal is a proof of his dislike at having the Mission thrust upon him, and not of his unfriendliness towards us. From the general argument, it appears the Government have thought these reasons sufficient to change the policy of their Predecessors; but what I wish to point out is that no intimation of this change was given to the House. When the hon. Gentleman the Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread) gave Notice of his Resolution I gave Notice of an addition thereto, in the shape of a censure upon the Government for not having, previous to declaring war, taken Parliament into its confidence, and for having withheld Papers so long and on inadequate pretexts. This was not in any sense hostile to the Motion of the hon. Member. Indeed, I hoped to have his support. I find, however, that, owing to a change in the order of the debate, which has transformed the Resolution into an Amendment, I am not able to propose my Resolution. Therefore, I withdraw it. But I do this the more willingly because I clearly understood from the speech of the hon. Member for Bedford that he proposed to include in his reasons for condemning the conduct of the Government, the grounds I purposed to set out in my addition. As it is, even if the failure to consult Parliament was not in itself the cause of war, and even if it cannot be shown that war might have been prevented if the House had had the previous opportunity of discussion, yet there is a great difference between consulting Parliament now, when the country is irretrievably committed to war, and of consulting Parliament before the war commenced. There may have been times of national peril and emergency, when it was impossible to take the opinion of Parliament before it became necessary to declare war; and there have been many and more frequent cases in which Parliament has been kept so fully informed of all the circumstances leading up to war that they were fully prepared for its declaration, and might even be said to have consented by implication. But in this instance we have been kept in absolute ignorance of what was going on, and not merely so, but we have been misled by statements and assurances that, if true to the letter, had the effect of throwing us off the scent. I do not attempt to deny that what has been done may be in strict accordance with Constitutional precedent. But I want the House to see that the use of this precedent, in the present instance, practically reduces the House of Commons to impotence, so far as influence over our foreign relations is concerned. Whatever might be the intention of the Government, practically, the effect of it is to deprive the nation of all control over foreign affairs. Some hon. Members have invented a convenient theory by which opposition is silenced in the presence of foreign complications. If we attempt discussion before war breaks out, we are hampering the Government in negotiations and endangering peace. If we wait until war is upon us, then it is said that, in an unpatriotic way, we are dividing the country in the presence of the enemy; while if we postpone discussion until the war is over, until arrangements are made, then we are told we are guilty of futile fault-finding and unnecessary retrospection. The thing, in fact, comes to this—that it is not the business of the House of Commons or the people to express an opinion on foreign affairs—this should be left to the responsible Advisers of the Crown—the House of Commons confining its functions only to paying the bill. I want to ask them to consider to what their practice will eventually lead. They mistake the temper of the people of this country—they reckon without their host—who think the people will consent to a system so fatal to the future destinies of the country. You may bring Parliamentary government into contempt; but the only result will be that public opinion will find expression in less satisfactory ways. You may diminish the influence of Parliament; but you increase that of public agitation. You may choke up the channel between the people and the Ministers of the Crown; but the stream will still flow on, and find a less safe and less convenient course. If, on general grounds, it behoves Parliament jealously to guard its just authority, in the present case we have special reasons for deprecating the treatment we have received. There has been a great change in the policy which has governed India for the past 40 years, and which has been advocated by leading Members of the present Government; and during the time that this change has been in progress, we have had frequent assurances from the Ministry that there was not the slightest intention of changing it. I do not taunt the Government with the fact that their utterances now are inconsistent with their previously expressed opinions. Circumstances may have changed, or, what is more probable, their view of the circumstances have changed. But I do complain that they have allowed us to believe no change was in contemplation. The Papers produced, and the speech we have heard to-night, show the extent and nature of this change, and the degree to which the old policy of masterly inactivity with regard to India has been abandoned, for what I call a policy of "masterful activity." Lord Cranbrook has drawn up the case for the Government in paragraph 10, and tells us how when he came into office circumstances demanded a policy of timely precaution—an admirable phrase; one of those phrases for which we are indebted to the present Government, meaning more than it appears to mean. I confess I do not understand how it is possible to reconcile speeches made in former debates by Members of the Government with the evidence we find in these Papers. The speech which my hon. Friend (Mr. Trevelyan) has already quoted from the

Mr. Chamberlain

Chancellor of the Exchequer I hope the latter will explain with satisfaction to us, who require no assurances of his good faith, but who are compelled to say that we have been misled by it. On August 9, 1877, the Chancellor of the Exchequer said—

"I have always demurred to the idea which has been put forward by some, that the best way to meet danger is to advance beyond our Frontier, and have always held that the true lines we ought to lay down for ourselves are these—to strengthen ourselves within our Frontier, and to do so by a combination of measures, moral and material."

And, again—

"The main lines of our policy are unchanged, and I believe the country will be satisfied with and will wish them to continue."—[3 Hansard, cccxxvi. 718-22.]

Yes, Sir; but would the country have been satisfied if they had known that at the very moment when these words were uttered our policy had been changed—that a policy of "timely precaution" was in full progress—and that an English Viceroy had actually been instructed by his Government to find a pretext—or, if he could not find one, to create one—to cover demands which they dared not openly avow? The other night the Chancellor of the Exchequer spoke with some indignation of a statement made by the noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition, to the effect that the war was being waged on false pretexts; but he did not appear to me to appreciate the exact nature of the accusation which I understood the noble Lord to bring, and which, in any case, I now venture to repeat. We do not accuse the Government of going to war on a pretext which to them appears insufficient; we do not accuse them of such grotesque wickedness; but we do say that the pretext held out to us is not the real one. We do not make this charge on our own authority; we make it on the authority of the friends and supporters of the Government. I find the semi-official newspaper, The Pioneer of India, of the 21st August, speaks of the Mission to Cabul as follows:—

"It is a measure for which the way has been carefully prepared by the policy of the Indian Government during the last two or three years, and it should begin the establishment of our relations with the most important State on our Northern Frontier on a satisfactory basis. Everything that Lord Lytton has done in connection with the North-Western Frontier has been directed towards undoing the blunders of the past. The work has been one of time, because the way had to be picked carefully. There has been a powerful, though wrong-headed, opposition at home to circumvent."

Now, how can this be reconciled with the assurance of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that at this time there was no change in the main lines of our policy with Afghanistan? I do not know whether it is a strictly Parliamentary practice "to circumvent" an Opposition, which I understand to mean "to take in." But it is not alone the wrong-headed opposition which suffer, but so also do the Parliament and people, from being kept in the dark. We have been told that the Russian Mission at Cabul, which took place after the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, is sufficient to account for a change in the policy of the Government; but I can point out that pressure upon the Ameer began years before this Russian Mission was thought of; and, in any case, the Russian Mission was certainly not a just cause of war against the Ameer of Afghanistan. The reception of the Russian Mission by the Ameer was, I believe, very unwilling on his part. I believe it to have been unwilling for one reason—that he delayed it for more than a month before he allowed it to enter his territory. But I say the reception of that Mission would be a very natural act, a mere act of self-preservation, after the warnings and threats which he had received from the Viceroy. He had been told by the Viceroy that very probably Russia and England would combine to wipe him out of the map; and I think it very natural that he should take the first friendly offer he received from one of the two Powers. Then we have the fact of the withdrawal of Sir Lewis Pelly's Mission, just at the moment when news came that the Ameer was prepared to assent, although unwillingly, to the demands which were made upon him. When you couple that with the peremptory manner in which the Mission of Sir Neville Chamberlain was carried through, and the violent language of the Viceroy about the earthen pipkin and the two iron pots, it certainly seems to me as though, on the part of the Indian Government at all events, there was a foregone determination to go to war, and to find in the Cabul Mission, or in something else, an excuse for a policy which was to end in a rectification of territory and a scientific Frontier. If the reception of an English Mission was the sole object of the Government, that might have been obtained on two or three occasions; but if a rectification of territory was what was wanted, then we can easily understand that such a policy as was pursued was a very sure and certain way of effecting the desired object. I desire to ask hon. Members whether, assuming that British interests would be served by such an alteration of Frontier as is now contemplated, whether we are to hold that British interests are altogether independent of considerations of right and justice? Does anybody suppose that we should have dared to avow or carry out such a policy in a European country? And is it sufficient to call a man a barbarian in order to discharge oneself of all obligations to treat him with common fairness and consideration? Are we to go on piling up one pretext after another; to act as judges in our own cause; and in this way to justify our policy of injustice and aggrandisement? Only carry this a little further, and it would be a justification of any invasion of national freedom and national independence. Only admit that a country has to follow the law of self-preservation without reference to others, and it is evidently a justification for an attack—say of France upon Belgium, or Germany upon Holland, or the absorption of Canada by the United States—and this deliberate attempt to substitute might for right in dealing with Indian Princes, and the law of force for the law of nations, is certain, in my opinion, to have a most disastrous effect upon the true foundations of our Indian Empire. The Duke of Wellington, writing a letter to Major Malcolm, said—

Recently a celebrated historian, who gave utterance to a similar sentiment, was very severely taken to task; but I do not suppose anyone would venture to doubt the patriotism of the Duke of Wellington. But what are we doing? What of this scrupulous good faith? What of our prestige in India? These we are willing to throw away in pursuit of the hazy phantom of a "scientific Frontier." What is a scientific Frontier? The Government have not vouchsafed to us at present any definition of what they understand by it. I do not suppose they would find it easy to get any two great military authorities to agree upon the exact boundary which should give us security; and if they did agree, who is there that does not know that agreement would have no finality about it? If you begin a policy of this kind it has no end. Each successive stage brings us one step nearer to the inevitable time when we shall find ourselves face to face with Russia, and any further rectification of Frontier will be only possible at the expense of a European war. It is a curious thing that whenever we have had the misfortune to be governed by Ministers who affect a spirited foreign policy, the country at once becomes a prey to apprehension and panic. At one time it is Spain which is the object of this unworthy fear; then France; and now it is Russia. We hear a great deal of a "great" England and of our Imperial destiny; and this great England, with enormous resources in men and money, is betrayed into an unworthy and undignified apprehension, which, I say, should never enter into its mind as long as it does not meddle with what does not concern it. Those take the truest estimate of Imperial greatness and power who believe that "when a strong man armed keepeth his house his goods are in peace," and none can make him afraid. Those, on the contrary, take a mean, unworthy view who are always going fussily about, going to war with some one, for fear that some one should anticipate them by going to war with them. I have only one point more to which I wish to call attention. I object strongly not only to the policy of the Government, and to the way in which it has been carried out, but also to the time at which it has been adopted. The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary lately rebuked an hon. Gentleman for speaking of Russia as an enemy of this country, and said the Queen was on friendly relations with all the European Powers. At the time of Sir Neville Chamberlain's Mission there was no emergency—we were in full enjoyment of peace with honour—at that time there was a slight revival in trade, which had been depressed so long. Now that revival is absolutely checked, and the nation's industries are prostrate—trade is worse than

I ever knew it before. I can speak with authority of my own district. Birmingham is fortunately situated in having so many industries carried on there that it does not suffer so much as other towns in times of bad trade, for if one trade is slack, the chances are that another trade will be busy. But, at the present time, I know no trade which is making any satisfactory return for the capital engaged in it; and I know of a great many which are being worked at a loss. In the district of Staffordshire things are still worse. The coal and iron industries are almost destroyed. Of 150 blast furnaces in South Staffordshire, less than 40 are at work; and there is not a month in which one or more are not added to the unemployed. I happen to be President of the Board of Arbitration which settles the wages of the ironworkers for the whole of the central district of England; and I have had, unfortunately, to my great regret, to award three successive reductions of wages, until they have touched the lowest point which has been known for 25 years, and there is not the slightest sign of seeing improvement. And yet this was the time—when there was no emergency, when there was no reason for haste—when the Indian Government chose, and which the Home Government approved, for taking steps which so greatly add to the prevailing distress and stagnation. I suppose it may be said that in criticizing and condemning the policy of Her Majesty's Government we are acting the part of a factious Opposition. Her Majesty's Government seem to think that the functions of a Constitutional Opposition is to shut its eyes and open its mouth, and take all the Government pleases to send them. But it was not always so. It was not in this sense that the Leaders of the Conservative Party used to understand the duties of an Opposition. In 1857, at the time of the China War—which, in my opinion, was as unjust and as immoral as the present war—Mr. Disraeli opposed the Government of the day, and supported a Vote of Censure upon them, which was carried; and afterwards, when Parliament was dissolved and Lord Palmerston appealed to the country, Mr. Disraeli, in an address to the electors of Buckinghamshire, wrote some words which are very apposite to the present occasion. He said of Lord Palmerston—

"With no domestic policy, he is obliged to divert the attention of the people from the consideration of their own affairs to the distraction of foreign politics. His external system is turbulent and aggressive that his rule at home may be tranquil and unassailed. Hence arise excessive expenditure, heavy taxation, and the stoppage of all social improvement. The general policy which I should enforce at this juncture may be contained in these words—'Honourable peace, reduced taxation, and social improvement.'"

Sir, we appeal from Lord Beaconsfield in 1878 to Mr. Disraeli in 1857. For my own part, I would not wish wiser words or better words in which to appeal to my constituents when the time comes—as I sincerely hope it may come very soon—when the nation will be called upon to decide between the two sides of the House. If its decision should be against us, we shall bow to it with what resignation we may; but until we know it to be given at the polling-booth I, for one, will not believe the nation will sanction a policy the military necessity for which is doubted and denied, and which, regarded from any ordinary standpoint of morality, is unjust in its objects, and dishonourable in the means by which it is sought to be obtained.

MR. RIDLEY considered the most satisfactory chapter in the Blue Book was that which recorded the success of Lord Mayo in gaining over Shere Ali as the real friend of this country. There were two policies to be pursued with respect to Afghanistan as a Frontier State; one was to have treated him as an independent Sovereign—in which case neither we nor Russia had any business to have a Resident at his Court—and the other was to say we would defend him against the assaults of foreign foes, provided his foreign policy met our views—and in that case we must have a British Resident upon whom we could depend to give us authentic information of what was going on in his Kingdom. As long as Russia did not interfere with Afghanistan we were content to stand aloof; but as soon as she sent a Mission to Cabul, and the new factor of Russian aggression came into consideration, it was necessary to provide in some more determined manner for the safety of the Empire under our control. Lord Mayo was satisfied that the Russians meant to be friendly, and that the fears of Shere Ali might be set aside; and Lord

Northbrook assured him he was safe under the assurances of Russia, but Shere Ali himself knew better. Before the ink was dry on the Treaty of Umballa we found that General Kaufmann was opening communications with the Ameer; and as Lord Northbrook chose to rely upon Russian assurances we had thrown the Ameer into the arms of that Government. These assurances reminded him of the Acts of Parliament which were passed at the time that the English were conquering India. England acted in a similar manner last century, when, in spite of the written law at home, we conquered India. But for that disobedience of the law, we should have been without half the Decan and half of Hindostan at this moment. Therefore, without considering the question of right, they could not close their eyes to the fact that the Russians had never ceased advancing in Central Asia since 1847, and the Ameer had a better chance of observing that advance than we had. Shere Ali, from his own Kingdom, could serve the Russians if he chose. He was on the spot, while we had to depend upon despatches at at least 1,000 miles from what would be the scene of action. It was, to his mind, clear from the first that the Russians meant more than they said when they wrote letters to the Ameer expressing hopes that he would be friendly to the Russian nation, and telling him that by good behaviour he might in time merit the favour of their good master the Czar. After these letters had been treated by Lord Northbrook in the way he had described, the relations between India and the Ameer entered upon a new phase; because in consequence of a disturbance which had arisen in reference to the boundaries of Afghanistan, it was considered necessary that there should be an interview between Lord Northbrook and the Ameer. This was after Shere Ali had received letters from Russia which had caused him apprehensions as to which he had received assurances. At that negotiation Shere Ali asked more than any Government of England could grant; and he was also told that, as there was no possibility of his being invaded by Russia, the question of guaranteeing him against the consequences of such an invasion could not be considered. From that point commenced the ultimate enmity of the Ameer, who began to think that he had better turn his eyes to what he thought might prove the strongest nation; and it also became clear that Russia meant more than courtesy in sending her first messengers, for she increased their number and the frequency of their visits, and showed a disposition to take steps which might favour her advance, either in Central Asia or in Hindostan. He thought the despatch quoted by the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread) would not serve his purpose; because it was based upon the supposition that Russia was not to interfere with Afghanistan. This was at the basis of their negotiations; and he therefore failed to see the force of the arguments used by those who had the direction of the Government of India at the period in question. If the Russians were not in Afghanistan, England need not be there; but the contrary state of facts applied with equal force; and he warned the country that it behoved it to take care of itself in this matter, if Russia was to be allowed to occupy a position from which she could pour her troops down through the Passes into India. He did not think the country could look with equanimity on such a state of things. Such a course reminded one of no parallel in history except it be that of that King who, while the battle was going on which decided the fate of his Sovereignty, retired to a little place apart, and meditated upon the fortune of the shepherd who had nothing to do with Kingdoms. He did not think they would be content to say—"Here on this mole-hill I will sit me down; to whom God will, be victory." That was not the course which would recommend itself to the country. Their fathers won the Empire of India with the sword and the bayonet, and India had, at all events, received some benefits. The ryot might be poor; but he knew now that what he sowed would be his to reap. He knew also that in India everyone was equal before the law; and he (Mr. Ridley) could not believe there were not some ties beyond those of military occupation which bound together the Indian Government and its subject-population. Such was the Empire they had received from their fathers, and it was their duty to see that it passed from their hands untarnished and the extent of its territory undiminished; and not only that, but that it passed to their descendants protected, in the first place, from the hands of a foreign invader; and, in the second place, by developing mutual interests and strengthening ties, increase the happiness, contentment, and freedom of the country.

MR. W. E. FORSTER congratulated the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down (Mr. Ridley) upon the ability he had exhibited in his first speech to the House. He must be allowed to say, however, that he thought it would have been a speech which would have been more appropriate in support of the Government had they acted in a determined manner towards Russia instead of against the Ameer of Afghanistan. The real question of importance that they had before them was this—whether the war with Afghanistan was necessary or not, whether it was provoked, and whether the Government could have avoided that war? There could be no more important question than that, and it seemed to him that it transcended all other questions before the House. As to the charges made against the late Government, he would be content to let them rest; and especially with reference to that 9th paragraph in the despatch to which so much reference had been made, he was quite content to leave that charge and its reply to the judgment of the country. He had not intended to say much upon one other question; but it was of so much importance that he must make some allusion to it. He referred to the question whether the statements made by the noble Viscount the Secretary of State for India were consistent with the facts in his possession? The Under Secretary of State for India passed very lightly over the speech made by Lord Salisbury in 1877; but it was of some importance that they should briefly consider it. In that speech Lord Salisbury said—"Our relations with the Ameer of Cabul have undergone no material change since last year." With what had since transpired that statement seemed to him wonderful. That speech was made in June, 1877, and on March 30 the Conference at Peshawur had been closed, and negotiations with the Ameer had been broken off, the Native Agent must have been withdrawn, and, in fact, that policy of not insisting upon the reception of Resident Agents—a policy supported by Lord Lawrence and Lord Mayo, and a change from which was resisted by Lord Northbrook and disapproved by half of Lord Lytton's own Council—a disapproval they heard nothing of until quite recently—that policy had been changed, and changed for months, and the result of that change was to break off negotiations with the Ameer; and yet Lord Salisbury stated there was no material change in our relations with the Ameer. Lord Salisbury also stated there was no reason for “any apprehension of any change of policy in our Indian Empire.” This was one of those statements which were literally true, but which were, he might say, naturally misinterpreted. There was no apprehension of change of policy, because the change had been already made for months. They had, however, a complaint to make far more important than any charge against the late Government, or any charge of inconsistency in the statements of Members of the present Government, and that complaint was, that a change in policy was made which resulted in war, and which most men experienced in Indian affairs thought must, and all knew might, result in war, and yet Parliament was allowed to separate without any consultation being held with regard to this change. He quite admitted that there would be a danger in depriving the Executive of the power of declaring war; it was an ancient and a proper Prerogative; but, like many another Prerogative, it depended on its being exercised in the spirit of the Constitution. He did not for a moment say [that under no emergency could a fresh line of policy be adopted without Parliament being consulted; but what he did say was that when there was not an emergency a fresh line of policy ought not to be adopted without some intimation to Parliament, as had been the case in the present instance. But now let him go to the main question, which was one of the most important that could come before the House or the country, and that was—were we engaged in a war in which we ought to be engaged? He would not go over the story told by his hon. Friend the Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread). He would not go back to the condition of affairs before Lord Lytton went out to India; though, at a fit time, he would be quite prepared to defend the acts of Lord Northbrook, Lord

Lawrence, and Lord Mayo. They all three carried out the same policy. The House at that hour—a quarter to 12 o'clock—would not wish to hear extracts; but would it allow him to refer to a letter that had appeared from Sir Henry Norman? Sir Henry Norman, who distinguished himself at Delhi, had been Indian Military Secretary. He was on Lord Mayo's Council, and was on Lord Northbrook's Council, and remained for some time on Lord Lytton's Council. On his return home, the present Government showed their confidence in him by placing him on the Indian Council. Sir Henry Norman, in that letter, said—

“My opinion was, and is, that up to the time of Lord Northbrook's departure the Ameer had no feeling of hostility to us, though he was somewhat out of temper, and was disquieted by writings which more or less pointed at measures distasteful to him. Any real resentment he may have subsequently shown is entirely due, according to my belief, to measures taken from April, 1876, to the present time.”

The writings to which he alluded were, he supposed, those of Sir Henry Rawlinson, whose book, published in 1875, recommending the annexation of a great part of Afghanistan, was doubtless in the Ameer's possession, and had much to do with his suspicion of the intentions and real desires of England. But the Ameer had not declared war against us. The question was, why we had declared war against him; what grievance we had against him; not what grievance he had against us. He was suspicious and angry about the course we adopted with reference to his son; but there was no reason to suppose he would commit any acts of hostility. Lord Lytton went out—he was not blaming Lord Lytton—under positive orders from Lord Salisbury to insist on the reception of permanent Agents, and then came the first overt act in our change of policy towards the Ameer—the letter dated July, 1876, insisting on the reception of such Agents. What was the next step? By arrangement with the Ameer our Native Agent at Cabul came to Simla in order to know what were the desire and objects of the Viceroy, so that he might convey information with regard to them back to the Ameer. Then came that remarkable conversation which the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State had passed over lightly—in his opinion, somewhat

too lightly. The Under Secretary of State for India (Mr. E. Stanhope) had stated that this conversation was confidential; but did hon. Gentlemen opposite suppose that the two statements—first of all, that if the Ameer did not do what was required of him rivals might be encouraged; or, secondly, that the Russians might wipe him out of the map—were not intended to be communicated by the Vakeel to the Ameer; and, if so, was it not to be expected that from the moment he received them he would be frightened, angry, and suspicious? Well, as a matter of fact, he did become very much frightened, and at last sent word that he was helpless; that he greatly objected to have English Agents sent to reside on his territory, but that if it was insisted on, he would send one of his Ministers to meet our Envoy; and after considering all the difficulties of his position, the Ameer said they might arrange that British officers might be brought to live on the Border. Here, therefore, was a great concession made by the Ameer; but the Ameer's Minister died, and the Conference was broken up. The hon. Gentleman's explanation of the reason why Lord Lytton closed that Conference he must confess he could not understand; nor could he make the account of it given by Lord Lytton himself consistent with the statement of Viscount Cranbrook. Lord Lytton had certainly said in his despatch that the Ameer had been inciting the Border Tribes against him, and preaching a jehad; but, so far as he (Mr. W. E. Forster) had been able to see from the Papers, no proof whatever of that statement was furnished. But, be that as it might, the Conference was broken up, the Native Agent was withdrawn, and nothing more was heard of any proceedings for a period of 14 months. And what, he would ask, was the position of the Ameer during that time? We had withdrawn our promise to protect him, and there was a positive statement in the despatch of Lord Salisbury to the effect that we had done so, for he said—

"Any illusions, therefore, which Shere Ali may have entertained upon this point have been effectually dissipated. He has further learned that the British Government will not undertake the formal responsibility of assisting him to defend his country from the attacks of external foes, or of supporting his dynasty against sedition, unless British officers are allowed to reside on the Frontier for the purpose of acquiring information for communication to their Government.—[Afghanistan, No. 1, p. 224.]

There was a curious letter at page 247, in which it is stated—

"I suspect that the coming of the English Mission is impossible so long as the Russians are here (or until the Russians have gone back)."

That brought out a remarkable coincidence of dates. That letter was written on the 19th of September—the very same day on which Lord Salisbury received a reply from St. Petersburg that the Russian Mission was a mere Mission of courtesy. He really saw no ground for proceeding to hostile measures with the Ameer. The threatening messages which had been sent to him were still rankling in his memory; and how could they, at a time when he was suspecting that he was the pipkin, as he was told, between the "two iron pots," expect him to refuse permission to the Russian Envoy to enter his territory? He hoped the House would consider—he was sure the country would, when they read the whole of these statements—that the Government were not justified in this war upon the Ameer. No doubt he was a barbarian, but he had his own feelings about independence; and the Government ought to have considered much more deliberately whether they should force their Envoys upon him. He might be told this was not a mere question of justice or injustice; that it lay much deeper; that this was a necessary war—necessary to the safety of India—and that they must not be led away by sentimental considerations of justice. Well, but what would be said if, instead of being a necessary and a wise war, it was an unnecessary and an unwise war? Suppose that, instead of securing the safety of India, it positively endangered it? Many people certainly entertained this opinion, and among them were some who knew much more about the matter than he did, or, for that part of it, than the majority of hon. Members knew. They were going to war with Afghanistan in order to guard India against Russia. But how? Was that object to be effected by conquering and annexing Afghanistan, and by extending our Frontier over that mountainous country until we met Russia at a disadvantage?

Mr. W. E. Forster

[“No!”] Some people had advocated that; he did not know whether the Government had done so. Well, then, should we leave Afghanistan independent? But in what a position would she be, and with what disposition towards us? This was not our first Afghan War; we had had another; and there was not one now that he could find to justify it. In this case, too, we should leave memories behind in a hostile Afghanistan, though we said our great object was to guard against Russia by having a friendly Afghanistan. There was a report that the Ameer had fled out of the country. If that were true, whom were we to put in his place? Was it another Shah Soojah? Then it was said we wanted to rectify our Frontier. Well, he would not enter into that question; but this he would say—that for every one competent military expert who said that the new Frontier was scientific there were two who said it was unscientific. One word about the only statement which the Government had vouchsafed as to their grounds for going to war before war was declared. The Government said in the most authoritative manner, through the lips of the Prime Minister, that they were bound to go to war, not because they had been provoked and were obliged in honour to do so, but because they wanted a rectification of Frontier. That confession of Lord Beaconsfield was, perhaps, the most cynical statement which ever fell from a Prime Minister. It was made on the 9th of November, when the Government had not yet got an answer to the Ultimatum sent to the Ameer. It was possible that the Ameer would have accepted the Ultimatum. There was not a single word in the Ultimatum about a rectification of Frontier; and yet the Prime Minister said we were making an arrangement for rectifying our Frontier. He blushed to hear it; and the only excuse he could find for the statement was that we were taking the Frontier, not from the Ameer, but from independent tribes. If so, why go to war with the Ameer? He was one of those who, whenever an important question arose, asked himself, when he opposed the Government—“What should I do if I were not in Opposition?” He, and those who acted with him, could not tell Gentlemen opposite the exact course they would take; but it might fairly be asked what would be the direction of their policy? He thought the enormous majority of those, both in and out of the House, who supported this Amendment would, first of all, say they would have “peace with honour.” That, however, was not very easy since the Government had chosen to plunge us into war. He believed the Opposition might go further and say—“We would take—and you ought to take—the very first opportunity of coming to honourable terms with the Ameer.” Having shown the enormous superiority of our strength, we ought to try to convince him that we returned to our old and disregarded our new policy. What was this old policy—the policy of Lord Lawrence, Lord Mayo, and Lord Northbrook? It was to try to convince the Ameer first, that it was neither our wish nor our interest to annex his territory, or to conquer him, or to take from him his independence; and, secondly, that it was our interest, and would be our intention, to secure him from any unprovoked attack by Russia. That was the assurance which Lord Northbrook gave to the Ameer; an assurance qualified by the necessary condition that the aggression was not to be provoked by the Ameer himself. That was our old policy, and it formed a strong contrast to the new one, which was to protect the Ameer against Russia, but only on the condition that he submitted to terms which he believed would destroy his independence. We might return to that old policy, though it would not be easy to do so, because the Government had made the Ameer suspicious and caused his people to share his suspicion. Having endeavoured to answer a question which might be asked of the Opposition, he desired in turn to put a question to Her Majesty's Government. He thought the country ought to know more about our relations with Russia in this matter. It ought to know something more about the understanding referred to by Lord Lytton, when he sent word to the Ameer—

He thought they had a right to ask whether there was an attempt at such an understanding with Russia now; and he would therefore repeat the question put by his hon. Friend the Member for Bedford—"Is there any probability of our having another secret Treaty with Russia?" If there were no secret understanding with Russia, he should like to know what was the meaning of Lord Lytton's statement, which certainly was not made without authority? They ought to know why, and upon what ground, Lord Lytton ventured to send such a message to the Ameer. Still more important was it to know how the matter stood now. It seemed to him almost impossible to believe that our relations with Russia in this business rested as stated in the documents which had been presented to Parliament. On the 8th of August, 1878, the Indian Secretary told the Foreign Secretary—

[First Night.]

"It is the Russian Cabinet alone which is responsible for the acts of its Agent; and it is the Russian Governor General of Turkestan, rather than the Ameer Shere Ali, who, with or without authority, is at this moment pursuing a policy of which the effect must be to seriously agitate the minds of Her Majesty's subjects throughout India."—[Central Asia, No. 1 (1878), p. 143.]

What did the Government do upon that? Lord Salisbury sent on the 19th to our Embassy at St. Petersburg a request that the Mission to Cabul might be at once withdrawn. On the 18th of September he received an answer that the Mission was of a conditional nature and one of simple courtesy. Yet war was declared against the Ameer afterwards; and in the Papers presented to Parliament one of the chief grounds for the declaration of war was alleged to be the formal reception of this Mission. Therefore, he repeated his question—"Have the Government accepted this explanation of Russia as satisfactory; and, if so, why did they make this reception of an Envoy one of their chief grounds of complaint against the Ameer?"

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Lord John Manners.)

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he presumed there would be no difference of opinion as to the necessity for the adjournment of the debate, or as to the desirability of continuing it on the next day (Tuesday). He presumed that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer would appeal to those hon. Gentlemen who had Notices on the Paper to give way. There was, however, one point which it was desirable to decide, and as to which some understanding ought to be come to that night. A very general opinion had been expressed by very many hon. Members that as there was very little Business on the Paper for Wednesday the debate should be continued on that day. If that were the wish of the majority of the House, there were two ways in which the object in view might be accomplished. They might either meet at the usual hour, or the Standing Orders might be suspended, and the debate continued at the ordinary hour in the evening. It was very desirable that some understanding should be arrived at; and he was sure that in this matter it would be the wish of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, as it was of himself and his Friends, to consult the convenience of the House.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, as his name was on the back of the Bill which was down for Wednesday, and as his hon. Friend who had charge of it was not present, perhaps, before the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer rose, he might be allowed to say a few words. This measure affected a large number of voters, especially in the large towns, like London, and it dealt with an entirely novel question, which had never before been discussed in that House. The matter had, however, been under the consideration of several Revising Courts, and it had engaged the attention of a great many local bodies in London and elsewhere. Therefore, it could not be assumed that the Business on the Paper for Wednesday was purely formal. There were also obvious objections to continuing the debate on the Wednesday. If it were commenced at the usual hour, 12 o'clock, he feared there would be a very small attendance. On ordinary Wednesdays hon. Members came down at some time in the day, because there was the certainty, at some time or other, of a division. But there would not be this attraction to bring them down next Wednesday; and there might be, therefore, the greatest difficulty in making a House. If, on the other hand, they were to meet in the evening, that would be very unusual. There was no absolute pressure of time which rendered this step necessary; while it was also open to the objection that many hon. Members had already made arrangements which would keep them away during the greater portion of the evening.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, this was really one of those questions which must be decided entirely by reference to the convenience of the House. No doubt it was desirable, as much as possible, to shorten the time for which hon. Members were to be detained in London at this season; and as there were a great many speeches to be made it would be an advantage if they could go on with the debate on the Wednesday. At the same time, he felt very strongly the force of the two objections which had been urged by the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke). He and the Government, and he was sure he might say the noble Lord opposite, were only anxious to fall in with what was the general feeling of the House. It appeared to him that the most convenient course, if anything were to be done in the way of altering their course of procedure, would be to take the debate in the morning, and not to attempt to meet in the evening. In the first place, five nights of consecutive debate was very hard work; and, secondly, a good many arrangements had probably already been made for the evening. On the other hand, Wednesday morning might be very well spent in the discussion. If a Sitting were proposed in the evening, it would be necessary for him to give Notice that evening that he would move the suspension of the Standing Orders. It would not, however, he believed be necessary to give Notice that evening of any formal Motion that the debate be taken on Wednesday morning. Unless he heard any decided expression of opinion that they should sit in the evening, he thought it would probably be better that he should not give that formal Notice, but that the debate should be continued on the Wednesday morning, if it were thought on the next (Tuesday) evening, after consideration, that it was desirable to do so.

MR. RYLANDS said, he entirely concurred in the views expressed by the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke) against the Morning Sitting on Wednesday. It was quite certain that they would have a very small attendance; and, in his opinion, the debate would be very inferior indeed. If they were to continue the debate at all on the Wednesday, his own feeling would be in favour of an Evening Sitting. It would, however, be very hard work to have five nights' debate in succession; and, therefore, he was decidedly in favour of not interfering at all with the Wednesday arrangements. They certainly could not interfere with them without creating very great difficulty and inconvenience; and the course proposed was certainly most unusual and unprecedented. He did not suppose there ever was such a proposal made before; and he certainly did not remember a previous instance where the Wednesday was taken for a purpose of this kind. He, therefore, hoped that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, if he did not feel very strongly on this matter, would not fall in with the suggestion.

MR. DILLWYN would remind the House that it would be very difficult to ascertain the feeling of hon. Members generally on the subject at that moment, for the great majority of them had gone home immediately after the Motion for the Adjournment. For his part, he was very strongly opposed to still further trenching on the privileges of private Members, who were continually being cut down bit by bit. If they consented to this alteration on the present occasion, it would be erected into a precedent to be followed at other times, and thus private Members would be deprived of the one day which still remained to them on which to bring on their Bills.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON entirely agreed in the course suggested by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Since he conferred with his right hon. Friend earlier in the evening, he had ascertained, so far as he had been able to discover what were the feelings of Members, that it would not be in accordance with the wishes of the majority in the House that the debate should be continued on Wednesday evening. It would, therefore, be unnecessary to give formal Notice that night of a Motion to suspend the Standing Orders. This discussion would call the attention of hon. Members to the subject; and no doubt by the next day the Chancellor of the Exchequer would have been able to ascertain what was the general feeling of the House as to the continuance of the debate.

TENANTS' IMPROVEMENTS IN TOWNS (IRELAND) BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MAJOR NOLAN, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill for the security of Tenants' Improvements in towns in Ireland, said, there was another Bill of very nearly the same nature introduced by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Cork (Mr. M'Carthy Downing), and he would wish to explain that the two Bills were not quite the same. Though his own Bill might be very useful, it would also be very necessary that the Bill of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Cork should be introduced. His Bill was one which would remedy a very crying defect in the legislation of Ireland at the present moment. In 1870 the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich brought in a Bill to protect the improvements of tenants in Ireland, and it not only protected their improvements, but also gave to a large number of tenants in Ireland the right to a certain compensation for disturbance. The Bill which he (Major Nolan) wished leave to introduce would not in any way interfere with or extend the disturbance clauses of the Land Bill of 1870 to tenants in towns; but the object of the Bill would only be to allow those tenants the right to compensation for such bond fide improvements as they had actually made. That was to say, that if under the Bill which he proposed the tenant was disturbed, he should not be in any way worse off with regard to his improvements than if he resided in the country. As, however, he saw the House was somewhat impatient, he would merely ask leave to introduce his Bill.

Motion agreed to.

Bill for the security of Tenants' Improvements in towns in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Major NOLAN, Mr. PATRICK MARTIN, and Mr. O'SULLIVAN.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 50.]

ANCIENT MONUMENTS BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill to provide for the better protection of Ancient Monuments, said, that the Bill was now introduced as passed by the Select Committee which sat last Session; but that he had accepted some verbal Amendments which the Chairman of Committees had been so good as to suggest. The object of these Amendments was to give even greater security to the owners of property, and they had been most willingly accepted by those interested in the Bill, whose great object was to preserve these interesting monuments, but who had every wish to respect existing rights. He hoped the Amendments might satisfy some, at any rate, of those who had hitherto felt it their duty to oppose the Bill.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to provide for the better protection of Ancient Monuments, ordered to be brought in by Sir JOHN LUBBOCK, Mr. BERESFORD HOPE, Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN, and Sir RICHARD WALLACE.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 50.]

BOROUGH FRANCHISE (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. BLENNERHASSETT, Bill to assimilate the Borough Franchise of Ireland to that of England, ordered to be brought in by Mr. BLENNERHASSETT, Major O'GORMAN, Sir JOSEPH M'KENNA, and Mr. RICHARD POWER.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 49.]

LANDLORD AND TENANT (IRELAND) (NO. 2) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. DOWNING, Bill to amend the Law of Landlord and Tenant in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. DOWNING, Mr. BUTT, and Mr. SHAW.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 51.]

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, 10th December, 1878.

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY FOR INJURIES TO THEIR SERVANTS—LEGISLATION.

QUESTION.

EARL DE LA WARR asked, Whether it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce a Bill this Session on the subject of the liability of employers for injuries received by their servants; and, if so, whether it was likely to be brought in at an early day?

EARL BEAUCHAMP, in reply, said, he was not surprised at the Question of the noble Lord; because he stated, in answer to a similar Question last Session, that the Attorney General had promised to bring in a measure on the subject this year. He was unable to state the provisions of the Bill, or the time at which it would be introduced.

TURKEY—CONVENTION FOR THE SUPPRESSION OF THE SLAVE TRADE.

QUESTION.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY wished to put a Question to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs of which he had given him private Notice. Could the noble Marquess inform him whether there was any hope of the establishment of a Convention with the Ottoman Porte for the suppression of the Slave Trade in the Red Sea and elsewhere?

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY, in reply, said, that for some time negotiations had been going on, and he had no reason to despair of coming to an agreement on the subject with the Porte. In fact, the only objection he had heard on the part of the Porte was rather one as to the means than as to the end. The Turkish Government appeared to prefer an exchange of notes to a Convention; but he believed there was no difference between them as to the substantive nature of what was proposed.

CENTRAL ASIA—MERV AND BOKHARA.

QUESTION.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If he can confirm the statements made in Nos. 129. and 132. of the "Central Asia Correspondence (No. 1)," with reference to the submission or annexation of Merv to Persia; whether Merv is now generally recognized as Persian territory; and whether he can give any further information on the subject; also to ask whether the whole of the territory known as Bokhara has been formally incorporated in the Russian Empire?

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: The noble Earl asks me if I can confirm certain statements made in certain Papers of the Central Asia Correspondence. All I can answer is that the noble Earl himself possesses in the Papers all the information we have on the subject; and therefore I am not in a position either to confirm or contradict any of the statements. Merv, I may say, however, is not generally recognized as Persian territory; and I do not believe that submission or annexation to Persia is recognized by the inhabitants of Merv itself. No doubt the noble Earl will be able to gather further information on the point in the course of the debates. In reference to Bokhara, I am happy to say that it has not been "formally incorporated in the Russian Empire."

AFGHANISTAN (EXPENSES OF MILITARY OPERATIONS).—RESOLUTION.

Order of the Day for resuming the debate on the Amendment to the Viscount Cranbrook's Motion, read.

EARL GREY: My Lords, after the long debate that has already taken place, I will not abuse your Lordships' patience by attempting to enter into a full discussion of the subject before us; I will only ask for your attention to some rather desultory observations on two or three of the most important points which have not, I think, received all the consideration they require. In the first place, I would remark that I was surprised to find so little said last night by the noble Viscount the Secretary of State for India (Viscount Cranbrook) as to the justice of the war. The noble Viscount cannot be ignorant that its justice has been denied by no small number of persons of some authority; we had, therefore, I think, a right to expect that in stating the case of Her Majesty's Government he would have brought forward some arguments to show that the war is a just one, according to those rules as to what is right or wrong between nations which are generally recognized. According to these rules, as laid down by all the greatest writers, it is held that no nation ought to declare war against another unless it be either to obtain redress for some great wrong, for which it has asked and been refused reparation, or else for self-defence. It is true that a war may be one of self-defence, though no actual hostilities have been committed against the nation which begins it; if there is good evidence that hostilities are meditated, in such cases nations may, in self-defence, anticipate an intended attack. But to justify war on this ground, the danger which it is meant to avert must be a certain and a serious one. Last night the noble Viscount did not tell us that any such danger existed; all he said was that for some time the Ameer has exhibited a feeling of enmity and ill-will against us. This may be true; but it is no ground for war. It often happens that accidental circumstances create for a time a very bitter feeling in one nation against another; such a feeling has more than once existed between this and other countries. Great ill-will has occasionally been shown against England by France, and by the United States; but it has never been supposed that we ought to make this a ground for going to war with the people that entertain such a feeling, if no actual wrong is done to us; and between nations, as between individuals, temporary irritation generally passes away, if nothing is done to carry it into action. Now, the noble Viscount did not allege that anything had been done by the Ameer of which we had any right to complain, except that he had declined to receive British officers in his dominions. The noble Viscount argued at some length to show how reasonable it was that we should ask to have British officers on the Afghan Frontier to give us accurate information of what was done there if we were to protect the Ameer against attack. I quite agree with the noble Viscount—we should have been very imprudent to promise to the Afghans protection against attacks unless we were allowed the proper means of assuring ourselves that they had not provoked these attacks. The refusal to admit British officers gave us a perfect right to say to the Ameer—"If you will not receive them you must not reckon on our protection;" but I cannot understand what right we had to say—"You shall accept our protection and assent to the conditions on which alone we can give it, and because you refuse we will make war upon you." I cannot understand how we are entitled to act thus towards an independent Prince. As the noble Viscount has not informed us upon what grounds he holds a war thus entered into to be just, according to the rules I have quoted as laid down by the best writers, I am unable to answer arguments of which I cannot guess the nature, and I can only say that, in my judgment, the war is an unjust one, and therefore a national crime. I pass from this topic, and I have next to call your attention to the fact that neither in the noble Viscount's speech, nor in any that has yet been made, has the slightest explanation been given as to the advantages Her Majesty's Ministers hope to gain by the war. We have heard a great deal as to its being necessary for the safety of India to prevent the extension of Russian influence in Asia, and especially in Afghanistan; but not a word has been said to prove that the extension of Russia would be a source of danger to our Indian Empire, or to show how that danger is to be averted by the war. I suppose that the danger which is apprehended is an attack on our Indian Dominions either by a Russian Army or by an Asiatic Army assisted and directed by Russians. But if this is the danger against which we are seeking to take precautions, I would remind you that the noble Earl at the head of the Government has told us that the base of operations from which Russia would have to move to the attack of India is so distant, and the line of communication so exceedingly difficult, that he has no apprehension that any Russian Army which would cause us any danger could be brought to the valley of the Indus. To fear invasion from the Afghans is equally absurd — the whole Afghan population is not supposed to exceed 3,000,000 or 4,000,000; and though the men are brave, and capable of making excellent soldiers under proper direction, they are altogether destitute of military science and discipline; and the ease with which they have just been defeated by a comparatively small British force when defending very strong positions in their own hills shows how idle it is to suppose that any force they could raise could attempt an offensive war against the British Army defending our Frontier. Nor could the union of two such weak enemies when combined together have any chance of success in attacking us. I think, therefore, the idea of an invasion of India by a Russian or a united Russian and Asiatic Army may be dismissed from the minds of rational men. In the fears which have been expressed on this subject I can see nothing but a revival of an old panic terror, which many years ago led this country into one of the greatest mistakes it ever committed, and brought upon it a great disaster. Forty years ago much alarm was excited by accounts which reached this country of the doings of Russian Agents in Persia and Afghanistan; and the Government of that day, in order to counteract the projects imputed to Russia, adopted measures which led to the first Afghan War. I had then the honour of being a Member of Lord Melbourne's Cabinet, and I earnestly endeavoured to convince my Colleagues that the policy they were entering upon was wrong. I then thought that the fear of Russia, on which it was founded, was a great delusion, and that in striving to guard against an imaginary danger we were incurring a real and a serious one. I now think the same of the similar policy of the present Government. Since this question has attracted so much consideration, I have referred to a correspondence I had in October, 1838, with Lord John Russell, who was then the Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, and I find that I argued then, as I argue now, that we had really nothing to fear from Russia, and that if we had, the best course we could take for the security of India was carefully to avoid, as much as possible, any meddling in the shifting politics and intrigues of the semi-barbarous States of Asia, to enter into no Treaties with them, not to disturb ourselves about what might go on among them, or to excite fears among our Indian subjects by showing that we were ourselves afraid, but to pursue the even tenor of our way, striving by good, and especially by economical, government, by measures for improving the means of communication, for extending education among the people, and raising them in the scale of civilization, to increase the welfare and the resources of the inhabitants of India, trusting that we should thus most surely increase our power there, and be enabled to bid defiance to every attack. These, my Lords, were my views in 1838; and if I am asked how it happened that I continued in the Government when the Afghan War was undertaken, I answer, that I was young in those days; that I was associated in the Cabinet with men older than myself, and of far greater experience and ability; that the Chief of that Cabinet (Lord Melbourne) was a man on whose judgment I had very great reliance, and whose continuance in the post he then held I considered of much importance with reference to our domestic interests; and it seemed, therefore, to me that I should have been guilty of presumption if I had left the Government because I could not bring round my Colleagues to an opinion in which I found that I stood alone. Accordingly, though my opinion was not shaken, but confirmed, by discussion, I continued in the Government; and, of course, as I did so, I accepted my full share of the responsibility for what was done, and it was my duty not to show, by word or sign, that I disapproved of it. But now, my Lords, that these things have become matters of history, as my noble Friend on the cross Benches (the Earl of Derby) said last night, there can be no objection to my mentioning what took place 40 years ago; and I am anxious to do so, in order to show to your Lordships that I am not now supporting an opinion lightly or hastily adopted, but, on the contrary, one formed after much reflection 40 years ago, and from which I have never since seen occasion to depart. I have also thought it advisable to refer to the discussions which preceded the first Afghan War, because the result of what was then decided affords a significant warning as to what may happen now. But let me proceed with the argument I was pursuing. Supposing it to be proved that I am wrong in believing that it would be wise to trust for the safety of India to the effects of good and of economical government, and of measures calculated to increase the welfare of the people, and, therefore, their contentment and attachment to their Rulers, and that prudence really requires that we should endeavour to check the extension of the influence of Russia in Asia—suppose this to be admitted, I should still maintain that the policy of Her Majesty's Government has been wrong, and that the course they have been pursuing is calculated not to check, but to increase the influence in Asia of Russia, and to diminish our own. This, my Lords, is the proposition which I shall endeavour to establish. We have been told that it is the interest of England that Afghanistan should be strong, should be independent, and should be friendly. I accept the statement as correct; and then I ask you, whether we have made Afghanistan stronger by having already destroyed a great part of her military force? When I say we have destroyed a great part of her force, I am not referring only to the number of the Afghan troops who have been killed or wounded, but to the far larger number who have been dispersed and disorganized, to our having captured many of her guns and dismantled her forts. We have already done much to break the military power of the Afghan State; and if the war goes on we shall, no doubt, do much more. Instead, therefore, of making Afghanistan strong—as we want her to be—we are making her weak. Will that make her independent? When she has been weakened, and her own military force has been broken, she must necessarily become dependent on some other Power, and, owing to the course we have taken, that Power can only be Russia. Lastly, you say you want to make Afghanistan friendly to us, and what have you done for that purpose? You found that the one thing which was, perhaps, of all others the most distasteful to the Afghans was the notion of having a British Mission established in their country. Successive Rulers of the country, its Chiefs, and its people, were all united in their strong objection to allowing an English Envoy to reside among them. And, with their passionate love of independence, they were quite right in this objection. I do not believe that it would be possible for an Envoy of the Indian Government to reside in Afghanistan without his being led to interfere in its internal affairs in a manner which would gradually bring that country under the control of the Indian Government. You must remember that civil war is almost a chronic disorder in Afghanistan, and especially when the death of its Ruler leaves the succession to be fought for by the many competitors who always come forward to contend for it; when civil war is not actually raging intrigues and feuds go on among the different Chiefs and parties, and in their disputes a British Envoy must find it hardly possible to avoid interfering, while his doing so would lead little by little to the power he represents being brought into play and assuming the control of the Government. It may be true that this would be greatly for the advantage of the Afghans; that they would gain greatly by being placed under such a system of administration as our Government would be capable of introducing; and that it would be much better for them than living under such a barbarous Government as they now do; but surely we have already enough upon our hands without undertaking the task of accomplishing by force the internal reformation of Afghanistan. And, certainly, it is not what the Afghans want. It was said by one of themselves that they could endure anarchy, civil war, rapine, and bloodshed, but they could not endure a master; and seeing that the residence of a British Envoy among them is the first step to their being brought under the yoke of a foreign master, they are passionately opposed to it. I submit that when this is their feeling, and when they have more than once been promised that they should not be asked to receive a British Envoy against their will, it was not wise to turn round on our former declarations, to insist on sending them an Envoy, and to make war upon them when they refused to receive him. Surely this is not the way to make Afghanistan friendly to us. We know the effects of the former war; we know for how many years the enmity and hatred it engendered against England survived in the minds of the Afghans. The present war is likely to excite those feelings in a still higher degree, for we have not now even as much pretence for it as we had before, when we professed to invade the country as the Allies of the rightful heir to the Crown, and for the purpose of restoring to him the power of which he had been, as we contended, wrongfully deprived. I think I have shown to your Lordships that it is difficult to understand how this war can tend to make Afghanistan strong, independent, and friendly as Her Majesty's Ministers tell us they desire it to be; but I should like to go a little further, and ask them distinctly to explain what are the advantages they hope to obtain, and what is the state of things they seek to establish by the success of our arms? Do they mean to annex Afghanistan to the British Dominions, or, what comes to the same thing, to set up a puppet King to reign over it, under the advice of an English Resident, and maintained on the Throne by the military power of England? If so, the experience of France in Algeria may give some notion of the enormous difficulties of the task you will have to undertake, though the difficulties the French had to contend with in Algeria were less arduous than those you will have to face in Afghanistan. Afghanistan is described to us as one of the most rugged and impracticable countries in the world. It consists mainly of ranges of high and rocky mountains divided by narrow defiles, with some good land in the valleys, but scarcely able, on the whole, to produce enough food to maintain its inhabitants, who are brave, fierce, barbarians, utterly averse to the restraints of a settled Government. It is a country from which it is simply impossible to draw a revenue of any consequence towards paying the expense of governing it; while it is so unfavourable for the operations of regular troops, that the cost and difficulty of governing it against the will of the people would be enormous. Whatever little revenue it might be possible to levy would have to be collected with the aid of military force, which would also be required every time that an act of violence or disobedience to the law had to be punished; so that considering the war-like habits of the people I am informed that, in the opinion of men well qualified to form a judgment on the subject, 30,000 men, of whom one-half must be British soldiers, is considered to be the smallest number that would be required for the maintenance of order. Have you considered what the cost and inconvenience of this would be? If not, you ought to do so before you undertake so ungrateful and so unprofitable a task, which, in the end, you will probably be compelled to abandon. I do not mean to say that the Afghans will be able to drive you out of their country by force; no, but the troops you could maintain there would be so harassed and worn down by the continual hard work imposed upon them, the difficulties of governing the country would be so great, that in the end you would find it practically impossible to persevere in the attempt. Well, then, if, foreseeing the probability of this result, you determine not to take possession of Afghanistan, what other course will you take when you have brought the war to a successful close? Will you depose the Ameer? If so, who is to be put into his place? Is there any Prince you can raise to power who has sufficient weight and authority to hold it without your continual support? If not, to appoint a new Ameer, only able to govern by British bayonets, would be but a different and more inconvenient mode of taking possession of the country. Perhaps you contemplate—indeed, I see no other course that would be open to you—leaving the Ameer in possession of the greater part of his territory, only requiring him to give up to you so much of it as you may want for what is called the “rectification of your Frontier,” and to agree to such a Treaty as you may dictate to him. If this should be your plan, I suppose the Treaty the Ameer would be called upon to sign would bind him to be your friend; to receive a British Envoy and as many officers as you may consider to be necessary to watch what is going on in his country; to send away the Russian Mission, and to enter into no further communication with the Russian authorities; and, lastly, to surrender the territory you wish to get for the purpose of making a scientific Frontier. These would be the probable provisions of a Treaty imposed on the Ameer at the end of a successful war; and I want to know what you would gain by them? You can hardly suppose that by compelling the Ameer to sign a Treaty declaring himself your friend, you will make him become a friend? Is this in human nature? and, above all, in Eastern human nature? It is certain that you will have made him, on the contrary, a bitter enemy, looking out for the first occasion of using to your detriment whatever power you may leave to him. But then you will have expelled the Russian Agents from Afghanistan! Do you really suppose that by causing the recognized and official Agents of the Russian Government to be sent away from Cabul, you will have thrown the slightest difficulty in the way of its communicating with the Ameer? There will be no want of channels through which more frequent communications than ever will be carried on between the Russian Government of Turkestan and the Ameer, who will greedily listen to every suggestion offered to him as to the means of annoying and injuring England. Nor do I think that you will gain much by acquiring the right of sending a British Envoy, with officers to assist him, to Afghanistan. Your Lordships have been told that this is necessary, because without it you cannot get the information your interests require as to what is going on in that country. But will you get that information? My noble Friend near me (Lord Lawrence) gave us last night a striking description of the position in which British officers found themselves when sent some years ago to Herat and Candahar with the unwilling consent of Dost Mahomed. They were treated as spies and enemies; they could hardly move a step without a guard to protect them; and they were cut off from all means of observation or of gaining information, because anyone who ventured to communicate with them became a marked man, and was in danger of his life; and this not from the Government, but from the population, for the population and the Chiefs were even more averse to the residence of British Agents among them than the late or the present Ameer. My noble Friend says that he was told by Major Todd that he could, from passing merchants and others, get better information at Peshawur, where no one was afraid to speak to him freely, as to what was going on at Herat than he could obtain at Herat itself when he was staying there as an Agent of the Indian Government. There remains the advantage of the scientific Frontier you are to obtain by taking territory from the Ameer. Now, my Lords, we know that military authorities are divided on the question whether our Frontier would or would not be made stronger by being advanced; and I find that those who recommend its being advanced have been very careful not to define the exact line of the Frontier they would substitute for that which we have. Perhaps this may be because they have not found it possible to find any new line of Frontier which would not be open to all the same objections as our present one. After reading what has been urged on both sides, it certainly appears to me that the arguments of those who consider our present Frontier better than any we could obtain by pushing it forward are much the strongest on the principles of common sense. But assume—and I am willing for the purposes of argument to assume—that, as a mere question of military science, our Frontier might be made stronger by being advanced, still you must remember that this is not all that you have to consider; you must also take into account the effect on your moral power of your ending the war by taking territory from the Ameer. Your Lordships are aware that when the assumption of the Government of India by Her Majesty in place of the East India Company was proclaimed, it was solemnly declared that Her Majesty desired no extension of the territory which thus came under her direct authority, and would strictly respect the rights of the Princes of India and of the States adjoining her Dominions to the territory they then held. Her Majesty's declaration was received with the greatest satisfaction, and with confidence by those whom it affected. Will that satisfaction and confidence continue to be felt? The Indian Princes know that both Dost Mahomed and his successor had been more than once assured by Viceroys of India that they should not be pressed to receive British Envoys contrary to their own wishes. They have now seen that the Ameer has been pressed in the harshest manner to receive a British Envoy, and that his refusal to do so has been made the pretext of the war waged against him. If they now see that the war is ended by depriving him of a part of his territory, may they not think that to gain this territory was our object from the beginning, and that for this purpose we picked a quarrel with the Ameer? Is not this the more likely to be the light in which they will view the subject, when even before the war began it was publicly stated, by no less an authority than the Prime Minister of England, that one of its objects—I am not sure he did not say its main object—was to obtain a scientific Frontier. Will not the confidence hitherto felt in the promises and declarations of the British Government be thus shaken; and will not this cause a loss of moral power, for which the improvement of our Frontier will be, indeed, a sorry compensation? I must now return for a few moments to another point on which I have already slightly touched. I said, my Lords, that I do not apprehend any evil to the British Empire in India from the extension of Russian dominion in Central Asia. I am quite aware how largely that dominion has been extended in the last few years. I listen with the same incredulity as most of your Lordships to those disclaimers of having any ambitious schemes of conquest and aggrandizement which we are in the habit of hearing from Russian statesmen on behalf of their master, and to their assertions that his only motive in all his enterprizes is pure and unselfish philanthropy. I attach no value to these fine speeches; and certainly I am no admirer of the rule of Russia in the countries subject to her. The cruel oppression of Poland by her has been notorious; but not only in Poland, and other conquered Provinces, but in her own original dominions the Government of Russia seems to me to be one of the worst that exists in any civilized country, and the least favourable to the welfare and advancement of those who live under it. Still, when I consider what is the condition of Central Asia, the scenes of rapine and bloodshed continually going on there, while civil wars, and wars with each other, habitually lay waste the petty States into which this vast region is divided, and that this state of things has prevailed for centuries, without the smallest symptom appearing that any improvement is likely to take place while these wild tribes are left to themselves, I cannot but think that it would be well for the world if they could be brought even under so harsh a rule as that of Russia, and could be made to submit to order and discipline by her stern compulsion. Nor do I entertain the slightest objection to her undertaking this task. I know that not years, but generations, must go by before she can create in these countries a Power formidable to us; and looking to the bad use—as I think it—which she makes of her resources and of her military power in Europe and in Western Asia, I am far from regretting that she should find employment for a part of these resources and of this power in a region where she may possibly do some good, and can certainly do no harm. On Russian authority we learn that the dominions Russia has already acquired in Asia cost her not less than £1,000,000 sterling annually beyond all the revenue they can be made to yield, and that the demand upon her Army for troops, barely sufficient to keep this territory in subjection, is inconveniently heavy. As she increases her possessions in this quarter, these burdens will also increase; and I do not see how we could wish for anything more likely to keep her out of mischief elsewhere than that she should continue her career of conquest in Central Asia. I deeply regret that Her Majesty's Ministers, instead of wasting so much needless jealousy on the conduct of Russia in Central Asia, had not more carefully watched and resisted her proceedings in other quarters where they were really dangerous, and should have become her accomplices in perpetrating one of the worst acts of spoliation of modern times, by taking a strip of territory, to which she had not the shadow of a claim, from Roumania. This iniquitous proceeding was injurious not only to Roumania, but to Europe, by bringing Russia again to the banks of the Danube, from which it had been one of the most useful results of the Crimean War to drive her back. Instead of showing their jealousy of Russia by adopting a new and hazardous policy on our Indian Frontier, Her Majesty's Ministers would have done better if they had acted on this feeling when there was real occasion for it, and refused to be her accomplices in the nefarious act I have referred to. I believe that by the policy they adopted towards Afghanistan they have seriously diminished their means of hereafter counteracting the designs of Russia in Europe. The step taken by the Government in bringing Indian troops to Malta was disapproved by many friends of mine, but I did not agree in their opinion. Though the advantages it ought to have secured for us were afterwards recklessly thrown away, I believe that at the time it was taken it was a wise and politic step on the part of Her Majesty's Ministers thus to show that when the interests of the great British Empire were menaced India, as an important part of that Empire, would help to defend them. But I fear that for a long time to come we have deprived ourselves of this most valuable resource by plunging into war with Afghanistan to guard against an imaginary danger. By rendering that country hostile, and thus creating a new demand upon the services of the Indian Army, you have made it difficult for that Army to spare any force to assist you elsewhere. Instead of this, I believe that your policy has made it necessary to send more English troops to India. Now that you have sent a considerable force beyond the Passes, I think that, in order to maintain your communications and provide for the security of India, you ought to lose no time in increasing your European force there. Though I feel that I have already trespassed too long on your time, there is one more point on which I must say a few words before I sit down. The Amendment moved by my noble Friend expresses the willingness of the House to concur in granting the money necessary for bringing the war to a safe and honourable conclusion. I am ready to vote for this Resolution; but I think it right to explain that in doing so I do not mean to assent to any grant for further offensive operations against the Afghans. Believing the war to be an unjust war, I cannot join in any Vote for affording the means of carrying it further. My noble Friend (Earl Granville), whose absence from indisposition I much regret, said the other night that it might be illogical to profess to consider the war unjust, and at the same time to be ready to grant money to carry on the war; but in spite of its being illogical this was what he intended to do, and that for the sake of our gallant soldiers he was ready to grant whatever Supplies were necessary for their welfare and for carrying on the war with vigour. No man will more gladly than myself assent to whatever may be proposed in order to secure the safety and welfare of our gallant soldiers who have so greatly distinguished themselves in the operations that have already taken place; but it would be quite a different thing to give our sanction to Votes intended to afford the means of carrying on the war with vigour—that is to say, of engaging in further offensive operations against the Afghans. This, my Lords, if we consider the war to be unjust, would, in my opinion, be something much worse than illogical; and, for my part, I will not vote for giving a single shilling for such a purpose. I regard the war as unjust; and I therefore consider that in waging it a national crime is committed, and that we shall everyone of us be responsible before God if we consent, as Members of this House, to abet and encourage it. I must add that my vote for the Amendment of my noble Friend is meant to be one of decided opposition to the Resolution moved by the noble Viscount, declaring the assent of this House to the use of the Indian Revenue for the payment of the expenses of the war. This, I think, would be most unjust to the people of India. My noble Friend on the cross Benches (the Earl of Derby) has explained his reasons for regarding the present state of the Indian finances as unsatisfactory. I entirely concur in this opinion. I believe the people of India to be already over-taxed and to require relief. We know what heavy burdens have been thrown on the Indian Treasury by successive famines; we know, too, that various public works which are urgently wanted, and some of which would greatly assist in averting future famines, have been postponed, owing to the difficulty of finding money to carry them on. In such a state of things it seems to me that to employ the Revenues of India in carrying on an unrighteous war not to the advantage, but probably to the detriment, of India, would be most unjust. The people of India have not been, and could not be, consulted on the subject; they are not responsible for what has been done. It is the people of England who are responsible; for they, through their Representatives, have given Her Majesty's Ministers the power to take the measures which have had the result which we see. The cost of the war ought, therefore, to fall on this country and not on India; and on that ground I must vote against the Resolution of the noble Viscount.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, before making some observations upon the very interesting speech to which your Lordships have just listened, I owe it to the respect which I feel for my noble Friend the late Secretary of State who spoke last night on the cross benches (the Earl of Derby) to refer to one subject on which he touched, and on which I think some misunderstanding prevails out of doors. My noble Friend referred to what is called the Constitutional question of the right of the Executive to recommend to the Sovereign a commencement of war without a previous appeal to Parliament. I heard from my noble Friend what I expected to hear—a free and full admission that in any step which the Government have taken they have only acted within the limits of their Constitutional power. But my noble Friend proceeded to say that a time might come when there would be a disposition in the country to consider whether, as a people governing themselves, some alteration in the present rule might not be desirable, and some principle established by which a previous appeal to Parliament should be insisted upon. Upon that question itself, which is only a question of theory and of future consideration, I should not think it right to delay your Lordships with more than a few sentences; but I think it as well, since the subject has been mentioned, to point out to your Lordships that there are connected with it considerations very much wider and larger than those to which my noble Friend referred. My Lords, if it is to be a rule of the Constitution that an appeal should be made to Parliament before war is declared, it must be distinctly understood that that is a rule to be applied to all wars and in all circumstances; because you cannot leave it to the Government to decide that the rule shall be applied in some cases and not in others. Now, my Lords, let it be remembered that so far as the Executive Government are concerned there could not possibly be a rule more conducive to their ease and comfort. Nothing could be more agreeable to them than to shift the responsibility of war from their own shoulders to the shoulders of Parliament. I speak, I am sure, for many of those who have held office of State under the Crown. If it has been their fate to recommend to the Sovereign a commencement of war, I think they will agree with me that nothing more serious, no duty more irksome, could well be imagined. My next observation is this. If you appeal to Parliament, you must lay before Parliament all the secret information which the Government possesses. We have not in this country any Secret Committees, such as are possessed by other countries, to which information can be communicated which cannot be made public to everybody. And I would ask your Lordships to consider how it would be possible in Parliament, as it exists in this country, to have a discussion upon the subject of a war with all the secret information which the Government possesses. You must adopt one of two courses. You must either give Parliament an imperfect knowledge of the case, or you must reveal to Parliament information which might utterly frustrate the object you might have in view in making the war. And the matter does not end there. The existing rule of the Constitution of this country in this matter is not, as some people imagine, an ancient remnant of Prerogative right adhered to and preserved for the purpose of increasing the power of the Sovereign and of the Executive Government. It is a rule which was maintained at the very best period of the Constitution, and maintained advisedly and deliberately, and I believe there is no rule which is better for Parliament itself. Parliament at present has this very great advantage—as soon as war is commenced and Parliament is appealed to to support it, Parliament is able to take a wide and general view of the object and purpose of the war, and also of its probable results. If Parliament is dissatisfied, it has nothing to do but to come to those votes which would lead to the appointment of another Executive, and that other Executive would have the advantage, not indeed of being able to stop the war, but of preventing its being carried on in the spirit of the policy in which it was originally undertaken. Supposing, however, Parliament to be the authority which had commenced the war, it could not recede from what it had undertaken, and the war would have to be carried on, whatever changes might occur, to the bitter end. There is another consideration to be borne in mind. If it is to be proposed that the power of commencing war should emanate from Parliament, I would remind your Lordships that a very small part of the object which my noble Friend appears to have in view would be accomplished. You cannot stop at the commencement of a war; you must go further back. In the conduct of foreign affairs there is scarcely an interview with an Ambassador—there is no part of the policy of the Government pursued from day to day—which may not in some circumstances and in some contingencies lead to war; and if you say that war must not be undertaken without the consent of Parliament, you must not only have a Secret Committee to judge of the war, but you must have a foreign department of Parliament conducting the foreign affairs of the Government. It is quite impossible that you should take the commencement of the war as a matter separate from the whole conduct of foreign affairs. I pass now from that subject to the more immediate object of the present Motion of the noble Viscount. My Lords, I know that this Motion has been freely called out-of-doors a Party Motion. I am not going to give it any such name. I have no right to speculate upon the motives of those who originated it or of those who support it; and I desire in any observations I have to make not to refer in any shape or form to any question of Party. My Lords, I have in my time paid some attention to the conduct of Indian affairs; and I must say there is nothing which has ever filled me with a deeper feeling of respect than the position in the Government of India of those who are the Ministers of India in this country and of those who are the Viceroy's of India abroad. I believe there is not one of those distinguished persons I have known who has not endeavoured to conduct the Government of India for the benefit of India, and for no purpose or object of Party. The Ministers of India at home and abroad have a most difficult part to fill. They are in a position of almost perfect isolation; they have to undertake a work of great difficulty, of great responsibility, and of great importance, requiring great detail of information upon subjects as to which information is difficult to acquire. If all goes smoothly, they get no thanks; if anything goes wrong, they are held accountable. My Lords, I believe nothing could be more disastrous than to make questions relating to the government of India the subject of Party warfare in this country. Looking at the Government of India as I do, I feel that those engaged in it are entitled to every consideration and respect in this House; and I think if it had been my fate to be Viceroy of that great Empire I should have looked with some degree of indulgence and sympathy upon my successors. I will simply look at the policy that has been pursued in India for the purpose of ascertaining the history of that policy. We are accustomed to speak of Afghanistan; but I am not sure that we at home can realize exactly the position of that country with reference to our Indian Possessions. Let me give your Lordships an illustration of what appears to me to be the position of Afghanistan. I will ask your Lordships to suppose that the northern part of Scotland was not incorporated with England, and that it was held by an independent race very much less civilized than we are—a race independent and warlike, and as numerous as the population of Afghanistan; and I would ask your Lordships further to suppose that to the north of Scotland there was an extension of land representing somewhat the features of Central Asia, in which there was a Power of great influence, of great strength, and of great energy, and one which had shown a tendency to move southwards. Let me ask your Lordships further to suppose that between this country and Scotland there was a belt of mountains something like that to the south of Afghanistan—a belt of mountains with three or four Passes, impassable except at those Passes, and the Passes were in the hands of the people of Scotland. If that were so, and if, further than that, we began by having with the Sovereign ruling in Scotland a Treaty of friendship, and if we found afterwards that that Treaty of friendship was acted upon in this way—the subjects of this country were not allowed to pass into Scotland, and we were utterly unacquainted with what was going on inside Scotland, and we had reason to believe that was going on which might result in injury to this country—then I ask you this question: Would we here in this House—and I speak to those on one side as much as to those on the other—gravely and calmly discuss a point of diplomatic etiquette? Would not, rather, both sides of the House be urging the Government of the country to take those steps which were absolutely necessary to make secure the position of this country in regard to this northern neighbour? Let me ask what has been the policy with reference to Afghanistan in India during the last 10 years? I heard with great interest the noble Earl who spoke just now state what his opinion had been for the last 40 years of the advances which had been made in Central Asia by a great Northern Power. We all know the consistency of the noble Earl; and I have not a doubt that he has maintained, without hesitation and without alteration, the views which he says he maintained in the Cabinet of 1839—that the steps which the Cabinet took at that time to improve, as they thought it necessary, our position in India were taken against his wishes. My noble Friend says how he would deal with the advances of Russia: he would take no notice of them. That is the policy which he says ought to have been pursued in 1839; and that is the policy which he thinks ought to have been pursued ever since. I turn from that policy—the policy of the ostrich—and I look to the policy which has been laid down by the highest authorities in India. You have it stated in moderate compass, and yet one which makes the statement too large for me to refer to in words. Let me remind you of what occurred in 1868. A very interesting Paper was drawn up by Sir Henry Rawlinson, admitted to be one of the best judges of the subject who could be found. That Paper considered the question which my noble Friend has referred to; it considered at great length the position of India with regard to Afghanistan, and it pointed out four dangers, differing in degree. The first was that to which the noble Earl has referred—the possibility of an invasion of India by a Northern Power through Afghanistan. You may say that is not very likely and it would be a very difficult task—an invasion of the country against the will of the Ruler of Afghanistan. The second danger was an invasion of India in which the Northern Power and Afghanistan would assist each other. The third danger was action by Afghanistan itself upon our Frontier and upon the northern part of our Indian Possessions. The fourth danger was a progress of a Northern Power into Afghanistan, gaining influence and settling itself there, making Afghanistan a centre of intrigue and a harbour for discontented persons, to the injury of our Indian Possessions. These are the dangers which are described and explained at great length by Sir Henry Rawlinson. You will find they were submitted to the Government of India of that day, when the noble Lord at the Table (Lord Lawrence) was Governor General. Did he or the other eminent persons to whom the Paper was submitted take the view of the noble Earl, that all this was mere chimera—that Sir Henry Rawlinson was the victim of a scare, and that the best policy was to take no notice of what Russia was doing? Nothing of the kind. I find the Memoranda which were written upon the essay of Sir Henry Rawlinson, beginning with the despatch of the Governor General in Council, and including the Minutes which are enclosed in that despatch from some of the best authorities—the Lumsdens, Sir D. F. M'Leod, and Colonel Taylor—all of them differing as to the degree of danger and as to what should be done to meet the danger; but all these eminent and experienced persons admitted that the danger pointed out by Sir Henry Rawlinson to a greater or less degree did exist. But it is in these Papers we find a definition of the policy which has been advocated as the policy of the noble Lord at the Table. I am not entering into this with the least desire to cast the slightest reflection upon any person concerned; no doubt they all stated what they conscientiously believed to be the course we ought to pursue. I will refer to one sentence in which Sir Henry Rawlinson stated what his opinion was of the course that ought to be adopted in the Government of India. Having described what he conceived to be the danger of the situation, he thus continues—

“Another opportunity now presents itself. The fortunes of Shere Ali Khan are again in the ascendant. He is already in possession of Herat, Candahar, and Ghizni, and is expected, either in person, or as represented by his son, Mahomed Yakoob Khan, to be soon installed at Cabul. He should be secured in our interests without further delay. Provided that he is unentangled with Russia, the restoration of his father's subsidy and the moral support of the British Indian Government would probably be sufficient to place him above all opposition and to secure his fidelity. If he has been already tampered with, his expectations, of course, will be higher. It may, indeed, be necessary to furnish him with arms and officers, or even to place an auxiliary contingent at his disposal; but whatever the price it must be paid, of such paramount importance it is to obtain at the present time a dominant position at Cabul, and to close that avenue of approach against Russia.”—[Afghanistan, No. 1, p. 38.]

That was the opinion of Sir Henry Rawlinson; what was the opinion of the noble Lord, then Sir John Lawrence? I will take along with the policy of Sir John Lawrence that of one of his great supporters, Sir Richard Temple; they both stated their opinions, and this was that of Sir John Lawrence, writing as Governor General in Council—

“The following are the only fresh measures which we could bring ourselves to recommend:—We think that endeavours might be made to come to some clear understanding with the Court of St. Petersburg as to its projects and designs in Central Asia, and that it might be given to understand, in firm but courteous language, that it cannot be permitted to interfere in the affairs of Afghanistan, or in those of any State which lies contiguous to our Frontier.”—[Ibid. p. 45.]

Now, my Lords, divesting this language of what is mere courtesy, it means simply this—that those who are conducting at home diplomatic relations with St. Petersburg should tell Russia distinctly that any interference with the affairs of Afghanistan or any State contiguous to our Frontier would not be permitted—would be a casus belli. That is the meaning of words of this kind. This view was repeated in a separate Memorandum, in which the words used were—

“We might also endeavour to come to some mutual arrangements, and to an understanding with Russia; and, failing that, we might give that Power to understand that an advance towards India, beyond a certain point, would entail on her war, in all parts of the world, with England.”—[Ibid. p. 61.]

That was the policy advocated at that time. Is that the policy of the noble Lord now? If I caught correctly what fell from the noble Lord last night, he said—

“I think, now, if Russia will not enter into satisfactory arrangements with us about Afghanistan, or, having made them, allows her officers in Central Asia to violate them, that ulterior measures should be taken in England to protect India.”

That is the policy—to take ulterior measures in England to protect India. What Sir Richard Temple says is—

“Without, therefore, at all objecting to what Russia is doing in Bokhara, we have a right to ask, for our own interest and safety, that she abstain from all interference in Afghanistan (including Herat) and Yarkand. As our relations with Russia are at present friendly, we might, I submit, make diplomatic representations to her on the subject. . . If after that she persisted in interfering within the prohibited limits, it could only be with a view of injuring us, and our Government would know how to take the steps which alone could properly be taken under such circumstances. In that case Russia would have to look to her own safety in various parts of the world.”—[Ibid. p. 67.]

That is the policy of the noble Earl who spoke last. That is a clear and decided policy; it is the world at war, and India supine and quiescent: make diplomatic representations at home in England; tell Russia, in firm and courteous language, you will not allow her to interfere with Afghanistan; do nothing in India towards Afghanistan; make no Treaty with Afghanistan in India; make no offer of alliance to Afghanistan in India; leave all that to take care of itself; but let the Government at home, in its diplomatic intercourse with Russia, tell Russia we shall go to war with her in every part of the world. Call this a policy of inactivity! I call it a policy of desperate and dangerous activity. But it is at the wrong time and place. It is an activity after the evil is done. It is an activity of reprisals, not of prevention. You have a great country, in the fate of which you have the highest interest; you have the greatest interest that it should be friendly to you; that it should not be alienated from you—that it should not be corrupted by those beyond it; but in place of doing anything to secure firmly its friendship, instead of taking steps to prevent its being corrupted and alienated, you leave it open to corruption and alienation, and make your whole policy to rest upon threats to those outside that they are not to interfere with it. Was there ever a policy which was so little consistent with what our knowledge of human nature is? And I ask your Lordships how is it to be supposed that a policy of that kind is to be called a policy of inactivity? But let us see how this policy works when tried, for it has been tried, and the moment it was tried it broke down. In 1873 the attention of the then Viceroy (Lord Northbrook) was called to the advances of Russia. He wrote a despatch to the Secretary of State at home, and this is what he said. Your Lordships will remember that before the despatch arrived a particular paragraph of it was sent home by telegraph to be communicated by the India Office to the Foreign Office that it might be laid before Russia. This is the paragraph—

"We think it for interests of peace that Russia should know our relations with Afghanistan, and we say in paragraph 18:—'Although we have abstained from entering into any Treaty engagement to support the Ameer by British troops in the event of Afghanistan being attacked from without, yet the complete independence of Afghanistan is so important to the interests of British India that the Government of India could not look upon an attack upon Afghanistan with indifference.'"

The Viceroy was not going so far as Sir Richard Temple—he only said very mildly, but intelligibly, that the British Government would not look on any attack on the independence of Afghanistan with indifference.

"So long as the Ameer continues as he has hitherto done in accordance with our advice in his relations with his neighbours, he would naturally look for material assistance from us; and circumstances might occur under which we should consider it incumbent upon us to recommend Her Majesty's Government to render him such assistance. I propose to inform Cabul Envoy of sense of this paragraph."—[Ibid. 102-3.]

What happened? It was sent home to the Duke of Argyll. He thought it a very proper thing to send it to the Foreign Office to be communicated to Russia; but what did the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs say? I am sorry the noble Earl who was then Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs is not in his place; but I mention the fact not to cast any blame upon him, but in order to show how this policy worked when it was tried. What did the noble

Earl do? The noble Earl replies to the Under Secretary—

"I am to request that you will state to the Duke of Argyll that Lord Granville would not think it desirable to communicate to the Russian Government, as suggested by the Indian Government, a copy of the former despatch, and so convey to it indirectly an intimation that any aggression by it on Afghanistan would be resisted by Great Britain with force of arms."—[Central Asia, No. 1 (1878), p. 208.]

So that when the moment came for that to be done which Sir John Lawrence said ought to be done—the moment it was proposed by the Indian Government to inform the Foreign Office, that the Foreign Office might inform Russia, that any aggression on Afghanistan would not be viewed with indifference—the Foreign Office declined to do it. Why? Because it would be conveying to Russia indirectly an intimation that any aggression on the Ameer of Afghanistan would be resisted by Great Britain by force of arms. The communication was not made, and thus the great policy upon which the Indian Government had rested up to that time utterly broke down. The noble Earl the other night, who was formerly Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Earl Granville), said—"You ask me what my policy would be with regard to Afghanistan. I will tell you: I would follow the course pursued and advised by those three Viceroys—Sir John Lawrence, Lord Mayo, and Lord Northbrook;" but when in the Foreign Office he did not follow that policy. I want your Lordships to consider what effect this policy produced upon the person principally concerned—upon the Ameer of Afghanistan. The noble Earl who spoke last night from the cross-Benches said it would be quite useless and impracticable to inquire what it was that had affected the temper and disposition of the Ameer of Afghanistan. In the view of my noble Friend it would be quite useless, because he approved the policy of the Government up to the end of the year 1876, and had nothing to complain of in it; therefore it was immaterial to consider what was the effect produced on Shere Ali up to that time. But when he said it was impracticable, I cannot quite agree with him. Generally speaking, it is most unprofitable work to take the opinion of bystanders as to what is passing in men's minds; but as regards the Ameer, we have a singular official history on that subject. If you look at these Papers, you will find what I can only call a series of pictures given by Shere Ali himself in his letters, as to how he became affected in regard to his foreign relations from year to year. I doubt whether the records of diplomacy contain anything more graphic. I think they may be termed "The Progress of Diplomacy," because they give the very beginning of the end—the first communication of Russia sent to Shere Ali, and the subsequent communications from us, which produced such an impression on his mind. Your Lordships will recollect what took place in 1869 with Lord Mayo. At that time the Ameer was thinking very little about foreign affairs. I do not observe that the name of any external Power was mentioned, or that anything as to his external relations was referred to; but what he was very anxious about were the internal concerns of his country. He had hardly taken his seat upon the Throne; he was exposed to very great dangers and intrigues on every side; and what he did want was that Lord Mayo would give him an assurance to maintain his family on the Throne, and to assist him if he should be disturbed by internecine causes. Your Lordships know what took place. Lord Mayo did not give him all he wished—he did not enter into the engagement which the Ameer would have liked; but he satisfied him as to the friendship of the British Government, and used this expression—that they would view with displeasure any attempt made inside Afghanistan to disturb him on his Throne. The Ameer went away so far pleased, having had an assurance given him which he had never had up to that time. That was his position at the beginning of this history. What is the next step? A somewhat singular and a very important one in the Ameer's career. He had received the first letter from Russia, and he was in a flutter of excitement on the subject. Your Lordships will find it in the Central Asia Papers at page 108. It is a communication from the Ameer. He expressed his anxiety to know why Russia should write to a State with which she was already in friendly relation. He thought she must have some sinister design. He says there was reason of apprehension, for already Bokhara had submitted to Russia. He forwarded the letter to the Indian Government; and in a most humble and respectful way he besought the Indian Government to tell him what answer he should return. Major Pollock, at Peshawur, on the 26th of May, 1870, says—

"With the above came a forwarding letter from His Highness the Ameer to my address, and one from the Cabul Agent, to the effect that the Ameer was much troubled at the receipt of the letters from the Russian authorities at Tashkend, for the following reasons:—1st. What reasons can the Russians have for writing letters in a friendly strain to a State which has already friendly relations with the British Government? . . . There is room for apprehension, for the King of Bokhara has already submitted himself to, or become a dependent of, Russia, and it would not be surprising to find Russian officials establishing themselves on the actual border of Afghanistan. If (which God forbid) they should so establish themselves on the actual border and harbour our enemies, what hope is there of the borders of Turkestan, Balkh, and Herat remaining on a satisfactory footing without full ('kamil') arrangements being made, and it is impossible that such complete measure can be carried out for the protection of these borders without the help and assistance of the British Government, with which the Afghan Kingdom is allied."

Nothing could show more precisely the state of mind in which the Ameer was in 1869. What is the next picture in this series of transformations? Your Lordships will find it at page 197, in a letter to our Envoy at Cabul. He said—

"His Highness in private said that he gathered from this murrasila that it was the wish of the Russian authorities to establish a regular and frequent correspondence with the Cabul Government. What demands careful thought in their inconsiderate language is, that notwithstanding that the Russian Government must have thoroughly apprehended and been convinced that the weal or woe of the Afghan State is entirely bound up in and associated with that of the British Government, still when writing about boundaries they make use of this unguarded expression, which may indicate God knows what intentions in their minds, viz., 'for as much as the slightest alteration in intention leads to displeasure between parties, it destroys entirely the harmony which may exist between them.' Further, when the Governor of Turkestan writes in his letter that the instructions of his Sovereign are to avoid all interference with or annoyance to his neighbours, it is a cause of astonishment that the Russian interpretation of harmony with neighbours is a strange one, for in but a few years they have extended their possessions from the foot of the Throne of Russia to the borders of Bokhara, and now style the Afghan State 'their neighbours,' oblivious of the fact that Bokhara and Khiva intervene. If (which may God forbid) the country of Bokhara and Khiva becomes theirs, and their Frontier is extended without the intervention of any buffer ('pardah') to the limits of Afghanistan, which may indeed be truly styled the Frontier of Hindustan, God only knows what line of policy or demeanour they will adopt towards Afghanistan, and what troubles may be in store for the Afghan and English Governments."

That was the letter in 1872. Nothing could be more friendly, nothing could show more complete reliance on the British Government than this letter of His Highness then, as in former cases, requesting the Viceroy to tell him what answer to make. There were one or two more letters in the same strain. Well, my Lords, what was the answer? What did the Indian Government tell the Ameer? I find the Indian Government replying as follows:—

"Should His Highness the Ameer allude to these letters, and manifest the apprehensions which his courtiers entertain, the Agent should be instructed to state that the Viceroy and Governor General in Council sees in them no ground whatever for apprehension, but rather additional reason for believing that the Russian authorities desire to maintain none of the relations but those of amity with the Government of Afghanistan."—[Ibid. p. 202.]

That was the only consolation the Indian Government gave him in his distress. He was very much alarmed at the Russians coming across the Frontier; but the Indian Government cheered him up by telling him that those communications which alarmed him were only a proof of the friendship of the Russian Government. That brings us to the next scene, in 1873. Your Lordships have, I believe, heard a good deal about this already, and I shall refer to it very briefly. We have the impression on the Ameer's mind as to the danger he was in, owing to the movements of Russia, in what his Agent communicated to us. His Agent said—

"Time has approached very near when the Russians, after taking possession of Urganj and Merve Shajehan, will make communications for exercising some influence in my kingdom. It is as clear as daylight that as soon as the Russians will take possession of Merve Shajehan, the Turkomans will necessarily take refuge in Badkhash in Herat, and if they do not desist from their misbehaviour, viz., from causing injury to the Russians from time to time, the Russians will undoubtedly send messages to the Afghan Government that either the Turkomans should be prevented from aggression, or permission should be given to them (the Russians) to punish these hostile tribes. Under those circumstances, such difficulty will present itself to me that even the British Government with regard to the interests of the Afghan and English Governments being identical, will have to adopt very serious measures for its removal."

"The British Government should take my views and reflections into most careful consideration, and be kind enough to sympathize with Afghanistan, otherwise I have not at all received any peace of mind whereon I can place perfect reliance and remain quiet or free from anxiety. Should the British Government intentionally overlook this matter with a view to temporizing for a few days, it is their own affair, but I will represent my circumstances in a clear form in detail without time-serving hesitation."—[Afghanistan, No. 1, p. 111.]

Nothing could be more clear than the meaning of the Ameer when he gave us this intimation. He said, in effect—"It is your affair as well as mine. If you adopt a time-serving policy I cannot help it. I have warned you; I have delivered my own soul." I own, my Lords, I was very much surprised the other day at a statement which I saw from the noble Duke, whose absence we must all regret, (the Duke of Argyll). The noble Duke said that in 1873 the Ameer either was or pretended to be very much afraid of the Russian advance, and that he held out the bait which was thought to be most tempting to catch the Indian Government. I do not know how that is. I have read the whole of these Papers—there is a deal more in the same strain—and I must say I have never seen expressions which conveyed to my mind more clearly the convictions of a man really and thoroughly alarmed. But if it was the view of the Secretary of State at that time that the Ameer was only pretending to be alarmed and was holding out a bait to catch the Indian Government, I can very well understand the course which was taken with regard to the alarm of the Ameer. I will say a little more of the documents which passed in 1873. I am going to refer to them not for the purpose of casting a shadow of blame on any person connected with the events of that year, but because it is absolutely necessary that your Lordships should see what was done in 1873 in order to judge of the policy of 1876, because the policy pursued in 1876 was a policy to remedy that which had been overlooked or, at all events, not done in 1873. I will take the telegram which was sent home by the Viceroy in 1873 to the Secretary of State. I was very much surprised, I own, as to the controversy which has arisen upon the construction of that telegram. I shall adopt myself implicitly the construction which the noble Lord (Lord Northbrook) tells us the Government of the day put upon it, and that he put upon it. But, while adopting that construction, I must tell your Lordships the construction which I put upon it. The Viceroy had informed the Government at home of those apprehensions of the Ameer, and had proposed to give the Ameer some assurances of assistance. This is what the telegram of the 26th of July says in reply—

“Cabinet thinks you should inform Ameer that we do not at all share his alarm, and consider there is no cause for it: but you may assure him we shall maintain our settled policy in favour of Afghanistan, if he abides by our advice in external affairs.”—[Ibid. 108.]

Now, my Lords, I have been accustomed all my life to study the meaning of documents, and I will tell you frankly what I think this document means. The Ameer told the Viceroy that he was very much alarmed at the advance of the Russians, and he asked for some new assurances in the circumstances of his new position. He never suggested to the Viceroy that the Indian Government was going to fall short of anything that had been promised by previous Viceroys—by Lord Lawrence or Lord Mayo; he never suggested it for a moment. He never suggested that the Indian Government was going to recede from any engagement made with him; but what he did suggest was that the changed state of affairs required that something new should be done—that some engagement must be entered into, some promise made to him, which had never been made before; that the policy pursued by Lord Lawrence and Lord Mayo was all very well in its way and well suited for the time when it was adopted, but that the time had arrived when he must have something more definite, something more tangible, than the engagements previously given by the Indian Government. That was what the Ameer meant; but the meaning of the telegram from home was that we did not share the alarm of the Ameer, and that we meant to pursue the policy we had pursued all this time. What happened? Communications were made to the Ameer, and how were they taken? The first complete communication to the Ameer was in the shape of a despatch from the Governor General, which your Lordships will find at page 116. It said—

“The result of the communications between the British and the Russian Governments has been, in my opinion, materially to strengthen the position of Afghanistan, and to remove apprehension of dangers from without. . . . I have had some conversation with your Envoy on the subject of the policy which the British Government would pursue in the event of an attack upon your Highness’ territories. A copy of the record of these conversations is attached to this letter. But the question is in my opinion one of such importance that the discussion of it should be postponed to a more suitable opportunity. I do not entertain any apprehensions of danger to your Highness’ territories from without, and I therefore do not consider that it is necessary that your Highness should at present incur any large expenditure with a view to such a contingency. My hope is that having received the foregoing assurances, your Highness will now be enabled to devote your undisturbed attention to the consolidation and improvement of your internal government. The British Government desires to see your Highness’ country powerful and independent. It is my determination to maintain the policy which has been adopted towards your Highness by my predecessors, Lord Lawrence and Lord Mayo, and I repeat to your Highness the assurance given you at the Umballa Durbar, that the British Government will endeavour from time to time, by such means as circumstances may require, to strengthen the Government of your Highness, to enable you to exercise with equity and with justice your rightful rule, and to transmit to your descendants all the dignities and honours of which you are the lawful possessor.”

How did the Ameer understand this, because that is the next evidence we have on the subject? If I had been the Ameer I should have said to myself the substance of all this is that nothing is to be done. I asked for a new engagement, and I am told to wait till a more convenient time. The Ameer wrote back after a short interval to the Governor General. I will not read the letter, since your Lordships have seen it. What the Ameer says is, in substance, this, and I may remark that the tone of the letter is such as was never adopted in a communication to a Viceroy of India before. To say that the tone of the letter is not courteous is saying much too little. Apart, however, from the discourteous tone, the Ameer, in substance, says—“I come to you for relief and for engagements suited to the position in which I find myself. You are going to retire from what Lord Lawrence and Lord Mayo proposed; but I come to suggest that you must do something more than was promised by either of them, and you tell me that you are going to resume their policy. If so, what is the use of your going through the ceremony of having these long interviews?" Your Lordships have heard the Ameer's opinion about the letter he had previously received from General Kaufmann. Well, his answer to the next letter he received from General Kaufmann was this—and your Lordships will be amused at the change of tone. I do not think the reply of the Ameer, dated the 16th of November, 1873, was submitted to the Indian Government. It was written on his own inspiration, and here it is. He says to the Russian Governor General at Tashkend—

"I received your kind and friendly letter dated the 1st August, 1873, on 22nd idem, and was extremely gratified with its contents. The cause of the delay of a few months in the dispatch of a reply to it is evident, viz., first you went to St. Petersburg, and afterwards you were occupied in the Kharism expedition. I hope you have now returned in health and comfort to Tashkend, and I have, therefore, considered it advisable to take the opportunity of sending a reply to your murrasilla. I am much gratified with the contents of your letter explaining that His Imperial Majesty the Emperor of Russia is anxious for the peace and welfare of neighbouring States, and that you have considered it one of your most pleasing duties to report to His Majesty that you have had every reason to be satisfied with me, and that I have upheld the friendship existing between us. It is as evident as daylight that at present His Majesty is a great and powerful Monarch, and it is, therefore, becoming that neighbouring States should enjoy tranquillity and convenience. This policy will tend to confirm the friendship existing between His Majesty and these States."—[Central Asia, No. 1 (1878), p. 8.]

Did ever such a change in the same number of months come over a Correspondence between two Potentates? Compare this with the letter sent to our Viceroy only a few months before and see what a difference there is. Yet I am told that the mind of the Ameer continued the same, and that up to the time of the late Viceroy's arrival in India there was no change on his part. My Lords, it was done at the end of the year 1873. It was finished then, and there was no change afterwards. So much for the letters; but I must call in two witnesses to speak on this subject.

First, there is the late Governor General. What does Lord Northbrook say as to the feeling of the Ameer in the year 1873. His Lordship says—

"His language after the return of his Envoy, Noor Mahomed Shah, from Simla in 1873 was certainly far from satisfactory; but we are disposed to attribute it either to his impression that we were so anxious for his support that by assuming an attitude of dissatisfaction he might obtain further assistance from us; or to his disappointment that we did not give him the distinct pledge he asked that the British Government would protect him under all circumstances against external attack, coupled perhaps with his discontent at the result of the Seistan arbitration."—[Afghanistan, No. 1, p. 134.]

I am not here dwelling on the question as to whether it was right or wrong to refuse to give the pledge which the Ameer asked for. I am now dealing merely with the question of fact. Is it a fact that the mind of the Ameer was changed at this time? Lord Northbrook, at all events, makes no doubt about it. Next, I will take the evidence of our Native Resident at Cabul. Writing in January, 1875, but speaking of the previous year, he says—

"Considering then the external and internal state of Afghanistan, I am firmly convinced that now is the time for the interference of the British Government with a view to the peace of that country and the tranquillity of Hindoostan. The following are a few of the reasons why the Government of India should interfere in the affairs of Afghanistan:—For a long time the British Government has been anxious to establish amicable relations with the Ruler of Cabul, but without success."

And then he goes on—

"The possible inclination of the Ameer towards another party (Russia?) owing to the silence and apparent apathy of the British Government."—[Ibid. p. 146.]

That is what our Resident at Cabul at the time of the late Viceroy reports to him as his opinion of the feeling of the Ameer. Now, what evidence have we on the other side? The noble Viscount who moved the Amendment told us last night that Sir Henry Norman, who was on the Council of Lord Northbrook and that of Lord Lytton, had addressed to the newspapers a letter, in which he said that up to the time of the departure of Lord Northbrook the Ameer had no feeling of hostility to us, and that all his hostility was due to the measures taken in 1876, and since that time. The noble Viscount dwelt very much on that letter as a proof that it was the conduct of the present Government which has caused the hostility of the Ameer. My Lords, I wish to speak with great respect of Sir Henry Norman. I have heard some persons say that that letter was one which ought not to have been written to the newspapers; but I do not express an opinion on that point. I do not know what the habits of Indian Councillors are; but they appear to me not to be very reticent, and they seem to use considerable freedom in their communications to the newspapers. However, I do not say anything about this letter, except to express my opinion that if it had been kept back for 24 hours it would never have been published at all. Strange to say, when it was published in the newspapers, it appeared side by side with another letter from the Ameer himself. Side by side with Sir Henry Norman's letter, saying that the whole of the hostility of the Ameer had been occasioned by the events since 1876, there appeared a letter from the Ameer stating just the reverse. Unfortunately, therefore, the noble Viscount's witness is discredited by the person principally concerned. The Ameer says the hostility occurred at the time when the late Viceroy interfered with him on the subject of the treatment of his son. I must say that the late Viceroy was in a very unfortunate position in regard to that subject, for I observe that General Kaufmann wrote on the same subject to the Ameer. General Kaufmann told the Ameer that he had acted quite right towards his son, and that the first thing necessary was that parental rights should be enforced. The late Viceroy, writing in a different strain, told the Ameer that he was quite wrong. In these circumstances, I am not surprised at the Ameer preferring the advice of General Kaufmann to that of the late Viceroy. At all events, I think we may remove from this discussion the testimony of Sir Henry Norman. Let me now say a word or two about these occurrences in 1873. I repeat that I blame no person whatever, for it is very easy to be wise after the event—to go back and say what ought to have been done five or six years ago. I do not propose to adopt that course. But I appeal with confidence to your Lordships on both sides of the House, whether if you had to do over again what was done in 1873, you would not then have promised to give the Ameer the assistance he asked for? I cannot entertain a doubt that, by an overwhelming majority, you would have said it would have been a happy thing if we had taken that opportunity, as Sir Henry Rawlinson advised, of obtaining the friendship of the Ameer by conceding all that he asked for. Well now, my Lords, the transactions of 1873 were the justification for the conduct of the Government in 1876. I refer to the Mission of Sir Lewis Pelly. I am not going into the details of the history of that Mission; but I have heard it said that that Mission was an attempt to force upon the Ameer British Residents in Afghanistan. I entirely deny that statement. There is no foundation for it. The whole of that Mission—the whole of the proposals made by Sir Lewis Pelly, and the proposals made before Sir Lewis Pelly met the Ameer's Envoy—proceeded on the avowed and the distinct condition that there was to be no force whatever applied to the Ameer, and that he was to understand it was not a question of forcing anything upon him. I was surprised to hear the noble Earl speak of this as an attempt to force. What were the facts? They were that the Envoy who was sent to Cabul was supplied with an aide mémoire to show to the Ameer and to the Durbar at Cabul what the advantages were which we were prepared to give in return for the concession of having British Agents resident in Afghanistan. He was told that the Government were ready to make with him, in the form I have described, engagements of a character such as before he had asked for; but that if he wished for those engagements, there must be a consideration on the other side; that that consideration must be the presence of British Residents, not in Cabul, but on the Frontiers of his territories; and that this was absolutely necessary in order that we should carry out the engagements which we were about to make. Well, what happened at Cabul? Your Lordships have the narrative of the meeting which took place, and of the Durbar held before the Envoy was sent to meet Sir Lewis Pelly. The Durbar distinctly understood that the condition which was to be the sine quâ non of the negotiations was the admission of British Residents. They met again, and at last they agreed to accept that condition; and it was on that footing that the Envoy came to meet Sir Lewis Pelly. What happened afterwards? Let me remind your Lordships, in the first place, as to the question of these British Agents, that the policy of having British Agents in Afghanistan has never been disputed. It has been admitted by the late Governor General, as well as insisted on by the present Viceroy. Let me remind you of what was said on this in the time of the late Governor General. Writing in Council he said—

“We agree with Her Majesty’s Government that, having regard to the present aspect of affairs in Turkestan, it would be desirable that a British officer should be stationed at Herat. The appointment, it is true, would be attended with some risks, and the usefulness of the measure would depend on the discretion of the Agent who might be selected. But if an officer of experience and sound judgment were chosen who possessed the full confidence of the Ameer and the Afghan officials, we should anticipate great advantage from the arrangement.—[Ibid. p. 133.]

And your Lordships will remember that in 1873 the late Viceroy himself proposed that a British officer should go into Afghanistan and survey the whole of the boundaries of that country. Was there any reason to suppose that the Ameer would not be prepared to receive British Residents as a concession in return for advantages which were to be given to him? Here, again, I have got the concurrence of the late Viceroy and his Council. Their testimony on the subject is quite explicit. I do not agree with what fell from the noble Earl who spoke last, that any engagement on this subject had been given to the Ameer either by Lord Mayo or by anyone else on behalf of the Indian Government. I believe the correct statement on this point is the one given in the despatch of the Governor General in June, 1875; and I am quite satisfied with the conclusion which the Governor General and his Council then came to as to the intentions of the Ameer. He says—

“On the whole, however, we think that either the Ameer himself or his Minister, Noor Mahomed Shah, did in confidential communications with Captain Grey express a readiness to accept at some future time not far distant the presence of British Agents at places in Afghanistan, excepting Cabul itself. But our impression is that the intimation was intended to be contingent either upon the receipt of far more substantial assistance than was promised the Ameer at the Umballa Conferences, or upon the conclusion of a Dynastic Treaty, that is, upon obtaining the

THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK: Read the next paragraph.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I am anxious not to omit anything which in fairness ought to be read.

THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK: The next paragraph is not in my hands; but it simply states that the impression was that this was not information which could be so relied upon as to found on it any representation to the Ameer.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I do not see the alteration which that makes in these matters. I am anxious to state the thing as favourably to the noble Earl as I can. As I understand the view of the noble Earl, it is this—They state that the Ameer required some terms to be offered to him as a condition to his receiving British Agents. That is exactly the conclusion which I have given. If you had proposed to the Ameer to put Agents in Afghanistan without giving him something in return, he would never have consented; but he was quite prepared, when the subject was last mooted to him, for the consideration of the advantages which were to be given to him, to consent to the admission of British Agents. And I wish to remind your Lordships that it is a complete misapprehension to say that the Ameer had manifested an absolute objection to receive British Agents in his territories. Nothing of the kind. I take the evidence which the Governor General and his Council have given as to that. They say it is a question of bargain, and that was exactly how Sir Lewis Pelly was ordered to deal with it. He was ordered to make a bargain; he was armed with the power of offering the Ameer very great advantages and benefits, and was directed to ask in return, as a matter on which the Ameer was to be a free and a consenting party, the admission of British officers into Afghanistan. That bargain was not accepted. What occurred at the Conference? It has been said that the object of Sir Lewis Pelly was to pick a quarrel at the Conference with the Ameer and his Envoy. I have read with some care the narrative of what took place at the Conference; and I am bound to say that anything more unlike an attempt to pick a quarrel than Sir Lewis

Pelly's conduct I never read. Anything more careful, more elaborate than his explanations, more patient than his attention to all the complaints of the Envoy I never read. The Conference went on from day to day and from week to week. The whims and the caprice of the Envoy were indulged; he was allowed to speak day after day without interruption. Sir Lewis Pelly presented the advantages which he had to offer in the most attractive form; everything which patience, temper, and long experience could enable a man to do to make a Conference successful was done by Sir Lewis Pelly. But what was the conduct of the Envoy? In the first place, when he arrived, although our resident Agent told us that the Durbar at Cabul had agreed to the terms that were to be offered with regard to British Agents, the Envoy professed himself to be entirely without power to assent to such an arrangement. What was his argument? It was this—"You offer to me certain advantages, certain assistance, certain promises, and a certain Treaty with the Ameer, but you are bound to do this already. My interpretation of the Treaties which already exist between Afghanistan and Great Britain already binds you to do all that you now propose to do." Nothing could be more absurd than that statement. That was really the climax of Oriental ingenuity. What did the Envoy do? He said—"You point out to me in great detail the position of Afghanistan and the advantages which it will derive by being protected by Great Britain from any aggression of Russia: but I must remind you of what you told me three years ago. Then you read to me extracts from your despatches with Russia, and read to me assurances by which Russia promised not to meddle with Afghanistan, and that it was not within the sphere of her influence. Then now," says the Envoy—"I cannot think that all these assurances could be given between two such religious Governments like those of Russia and Great Britain, and by excellent and religious Envoys, and Secretaries of State, and after all there is the slightest reason to fear Russia's interfering with Afghanistan. He turned against us the despatches of 1873, which assured him that there was no danger to his dominions, and in that way the Conference continued until the

Envoy died. But what was happening at Cabul all this time? Your Lordships will find it in the Central Asia Papers. Russian messengers were going to and from Cabul, and seldom was there a day when one was not present there, holding conferences and consultations with the Ameer. The Ameer was collecting troops on his Frontier; he was communicating with the Akhoond of Swat, the Patriarch of the Mahomedans, for the purpose of raising a religious war; while all the time the Envoy was wasting time, getting adjournments of the Conference for a week or a month, and insisting that he had no authority to give that which was a sine quâ non of a settlement. I should like to know, in these circumstances, what other course the Governor General ought to have pursued than the one he took when the Envoy died? It is said the Viceroy states that another Envoy was coming to agree to all our proposals. If the Viceroy had shut the door against any fresh overtures which the Ameer wished to make, I could have understood the suggestion that there was a precipitation and a want of indulgence towards the Ameer, although I do not think there would be any justification for saying that he wanted to pick a quarrel with him. The Mir Akhor, the only person on the spot, said he had no authority. The proceedings at Cabul being such as I have described, the Viceroy directed, as he was bound to do, the Conference to be closed; but it was intimated that the door would be kept open for the Ameer—as was actually done for more than a year—in order that he might come forward and accept those terms which he had in writing, and which he perfectly well knew would be agreed to by the Indian Government. Well, my Lords, that is the case with respect to the Conference with Sir Lewis Pelly; and up to this point my noble Friend (the Earl of Derby) said he agreed with the policy of the Government, that he was quite satisfied with the way in which the Conference was closed, and the despatches had stated the position of affairs at the end of the Conference. What my noble Friend objected to, he said, was what occurred afterwards. Now, my Lords, what occurred afterwards? More than a year elapsed. The Ameer kept himself back; he made no overture; he showed no disposition to accede to what we proposed; and then he received an Embassy which was sent to him on the part of the Russian Government. My noble Friend said he received that Embassy under compulsion. So far as the evidence in these Books is concerned, there is not the slightest evidence, that we can find, that there was any compulsion before the reception of that Embassy; and, so far as we have information which is not in these Books, all the public information goes the other way, and leads us to suppose that there was no compulsion whatsoever, but that the Embassy was received without anything like duress or pressure on the part of Russia. Well, my Lords, the noble Earl who spoke to-night asked what right or authority had we to require that our Envoy should be received? My Lords, I have seen that asserted elsewhere; and the case of Afghanistan has been likened to the case of some European Power with which we might have no relation by way of Treaty, but which we might require to receive an Embassy, and it is said that such a State might refuse to receive it. I shall not, my Lords, stop to inquire whether that would be so, because our relations with Afghanistan were of an entirely different nature. We had a Treaty—a Treaty of friendship—with Afghanistan; and it was absolutely necessary, in order to discharge our obligations under it, that we should have a right, in the ordinary way, to information as to what occurred in that country. But, in addition to that, Afghanistan is a country which had professed for years to lean upon us, and the Treaty was entirely connected with ourselves. Well, my Lords, when it was proposed that Afghanistan should be made a neutral zone, the Indian Government and the Russian Government declined it, on the ground that our relations with Afghanistan were not such as to enable us to look as neutrals upon that country, or to enable us to be bound by a Treaty forming Afghanistan into a neutral zone. And if your Lordships look at the Central Asia Papers you will see that the opinion of Russia and the opinion of Afghanistan also was this—that we had the power by Treaty to force upon Afghanistan a certain line of conduct with respect to the tribes and people of the country. Therefore, my Lords, in that state of things, it is idle to talk of the question of our right to send an Envoy to Afghanistan as if it was a question of sending an Envoy to the King of Dahomey, or to any country with which we have no Treaty relations whatever. We had, therefore, a perfect right to send an Envoy, and the only thing which led us to forbear from doing so was this—that the Ameer told us that if the Envoy of one Christian Power was received, the Envoy of another Christian Power would be received also. But the moment the Envoy of Russia was received and our Envoy was rejected, that excuse fell to the ground. My noble Friend (the Earl of Derby) said—"You ought to have taken this course with the Ameer—you ought to have allowed him very much more time. You ought not to have called upon him for an answer to your request at the time you did; and if you had given a greater lapse of time what would have happened would have been this," and, speaking with an appearance of almost absolute authority, my noble Friend told us what would then have occurred. Well, in the first place, I must remind your Lordships that the concession of a longer period would have meant the concession of the whole winter. It would have been the giving up of all the time necessary for purposes which might have to be accomplished. But what my noble Friend said was this—"If you had given a longer time, I can tell you what would have happened. The Ameer would have gone to Russia; he would have said to Russia, 'I have received your Embassy, and now I am called upon to receive a British Envoy, and I want to know whether if I resist you will see me through it, and fight for me?'" Then, says my noble Friend, it is perfectly certain that Russia would have said she would do nothing of the kind; that she would not fight; that he might make the best terms he could; and I think I heard my noble Friend say—but I am not quite sure of that—that Russia would have mediated. But, my Lords, what would be the state of things then? We should have given up the whole winter to Afghanistan on the chance of Afghanistan going to Russia and Russia saying she would not stir, and advising the Ameer to make terms with us, and, perhaps, offering to mediate. Well, I should like to know what would have been the result of that policy, which would have left the Ameer the master of the situation during the whole winter upon the chance that Russia might have come forward to mediate between England and Afghanistan—between England, the protector, and Afghanistan, the protected country. Yet my noble Friend would have had us leave the Ameer master of the situation, trusting to the chapter of accidents which might happen in the course of the winter. But might not the Ameer also have said that he now saw exactly what this great Power was going to do? That if he allowed the time given him to pass, possibly it would do him no harm; that he would trust to the lapse of the winter months, set us at defiance, and treat us as he had treated us hitherto. What, my Lords, would have been the result? My noble Friend says—"Well, but you have made war upon Afghanistan; but was there no one else? Is Afghanistan the only country which has done you wrong?" And my noble Friend admits that we have good reason to complain of what has been done and intended by Afghanistan; but he asks, Have you not cause of complaint against Russia also? I do not know whether my noble Friend meant to represent as his policy that he would have had us engage in a war with Russia. I rather think that what my noble Friend intended to convey was this—that inasmuch as he could show logically that if we went to war with Afghanistan we should go to war with Russia, therefore we should go to war with neither. That seemed to be the drift of my noble Friend's argument. Well, I can give my noble Friend two short answers, each of which is, I think, conclusive. If it had been the case that we should have gone to war with Afghanistan because the Ameer received a Russian Envoy, then I quite understand the argument that in that case we should have gone to war with Russia also for having sent an Envoy. But, my Lords, the mistake made by my noble Friend is, that we have gone to war with Afghanistan for having received a Russian Envoy. We have never said it; we have never thought it. What we have gone to war with Afghanistan for was for not receiving our own Envoy. That is the first answer. Here, my Lords, is the other. We requested Russia to withdraw her Envoy, and the Envoy has returned. We asked Afghanistan to receive our Envoy, and she refused. And yet the argument is, that because we have gone to war with the second, we ought to have gone to war with the first. Why, my Lords, it seems to me the most absurd thing in the world to say that we should go to war with Russia because the Ameer had refused to do that which we naturally and necessarily required him to do. Now, my Lords, I own I cannot help regretting the Amendment which has been moved by the noble Viscount. I said at the beginning that I was anxious not to treat this as a Party question; and I hope I have not said a word which would make anyone think that I desired to represent the conduct of any Party in these transactions in a Party spirit. But, my Lords, I know how this Motion will be looked at out-of-doors. It is very seldom the House of Lords has a Motion brought before it on a question of Supplies. The jurisdiction of this House as regards Supplies, as your Lordships all know, is very peculiar and very limited. I never heard of any case in which this House could interfere by an Amendment on a Motion of Supply until the Act of 1858 for the government of India was passed. Parliament, in passing that Act, provided that the House of Lords should have a power in regard to Supplies that it never before possessed; it provided that the Revenues of India for particular purposes—purposes of external war—should not be applied without the consent of both Houses of Parliament. The consequence is, that the House of Lords, as it appears to me, has upon this question a jurisdiction co-ordinate with that of the House of Commons. Well, it is a very singular thing that upon what I think is the second occasion at most on which that power has come before your Lordships to be exercised, a Motion should be made which would have the effect, if carried, of stopping the Supplies. The noble Earl is much too candid—much too straightforward—to put any disguise upon a matter of this kind. There is no doubt that, as the noble Earl says, it would have the effect, if carried, of annihilating the means of providing for the troops in India out of the Indian Revenues; and as this House has no jurisdiction over any other Revenues the very liberal offer made in the Preamble of the noble Viscount's Amendment must be taken for what it is worth,

This, then, is a Motion calling upon your Lordships who have power over the Revenues of India to stop the payment out of those Revenues of the troops now engaged in Afghanistan. My Lords, what object is to be gained by this Amendment? The noble Viscount (Viscount Halifax) says, in his Motion, that his object is to bring the war to an honourable conclusion. For my part, I cannot, for the life of me, see how the war, which, in the opinion of the noble Earl who spoke last (Earl Grey), is unjust, impolitic, and even criminal, can be brought to an "honourable conclusion." It can be brought to a conclusion, of course, like everything else; but how it can, under the circumstances, be brought to an "honourable conclusion," I confess, is more than I can understand. The noble Viscount, for his part, gave us a great deal of information with regard to Afghanistan of a not very encouraging kind. He said he knew Afghanistan very well, and that it was a terrible country. If our troops went into the valleys they would be surrounded by tribes from the hills; and if they went upon the hills they would not be able to get water from the valleys. If we sent small bodies of troops into the country they would be cut to pieces; and if we sent large bodies of troops the expense would be intolerable. If they went to Candahar they would be in great danger; and if they did not go to Candahar they would be in greater danger still. The noble Viscount fills the air with these sinister prophecies, and proposes to bring the war to an honourable conclusion by stopping the Supplies. Well, my Lords, I regret the course that has been taken by the noble Viscount. I believe it will be misunderstood in this country and still more in India. Our troops are engaged in a war which I am satisfied the great majority of the people of this country—and I believe the majority would be much greater were the question thoroughly understood—consider to be a war which could not have been avoided for the honour, for the dignity, and for the safety of our Indian Empire. That I take to be the feeling of this country; in India, I believe, there is no difference of opinion whatever; and in the face of that a Motion is proposed of the character I have described, a Motion which will be regarded here—and which I am certain will be regarded in India—as made for Party purposes. In considering a Motion of this kind, whatever may be the result of it, we are bound, in theory at least, to assume that, if carried, it may lead to the embarrassment or removal of the present Government. That, my Lords, is a very small matter. I am satisfied that if one Government in this country is removed, another will be found, without difficulty, to take its place. But if you endanger, or imperil, our Indian Empire, we can only lose it once. We have heard of the saying, "Perish India!" I do not stop to inquire by whom it was used or when; but, my Lords, I would say this—I care not what becomes of this or any other Government; I say, "Perish Governments;" but I implore your Lordships, in the vote which you are about to give on this question, to do nothing which will impair, or shake, or endanger the stability of our Indian Empire.

LORD SELBORNE said, he could not help being struck by the remarkable contrast presented by the speech of his noble and learned Friend (the Lord Chancellor) and that made by the Secretary of State for India (Viscount Cranbrook) at the opening of the debate. The Secretary of State for India treated the question before the House as being in no respect a financial one, and passed at once to a general defence of the Government policy. His noble and learned Friend, on the contrary, seemed to regard the financial aspect of the question as of vital importance, and assumed the effect of the Amendment before the House, if carried, to be a stoppage of the Supplies for the troops now engaged in Afghanistan. He (Lord Selborne) ventured to say that no such consequence was involved in the Amendment. The supporters of the Amendment thought it their duty to express their opinion on the policy of the Government which led to the war; but that duty being discharged, they would not only be ready, but, on the face of the Amendment, they professed to be ready to vote all the necessary Supplies for the conduct of the war. If any particular Member of their Lordships' House was of opinion that no portion of the Revenues of India ought to be applied to the war, he could have no objection to vote for the Amendment, because after its adoption he would be perfectly free to abide by his opinion. If, on the other hand, the majority of those who adopted the Amendment should be of opinion it was right to provide Supplies for the war out of Indian Revenues, there would be nothing to prevent their agreeing to such a step. He did not see that there was any inconsistency whatever in the views of those who thought the war unjust and impolitic, and who, nevertheless, professed a desire to bring it to an honourable conclusion. What they wished to avoid was anything which could disgrace or discredit the British arms, or endanger the safety of our gallant troops, who were now acting under orders as to the justice of which they could have no responsibility and no concern. At the same time, it would be necessary to put an end to the war as quickly as possible, due regard being had to the conditions he had specified. It was, therefore, mere rhetoric to speak of there being any inconsistency at all in the matter. His noble and learned Friend had said that in some quarter the cry had been raised of "Perish India!" He was not aware that such language had ever been employed. What he believed really did happen was that a distinguished historian, speaking at a public meeting in a manner, perhaps, not sufficiently guarded to obviate perverse misconstruction, said, in effect, that it would be better that their dominion in India should perish than that they should be disgraced by doing what was unjust and wrong. He did not, of course, mean that India should perish; but merely to express, in as strong language as he could, his abhorrence of what was unjust and wrong. When a man used the proverb "Fiat justitia ruat cælum," he did not mean that he wished the heavens to fall, but only that he wished justice to be done. No doubt this noble and learned Friend was thoroughly persuaded of the soundness of his own arguments and the justice of his own conclusions; but what could be the advantage of winding up with a suggestion that those who were in favour of this Amendment, or anybody in the House or out of it, wished India to perish, or was not fully convinced that the safety of India would be best promoted by that course which was most just, most honourable, and most wise, in dealing either with the Ameer or anyone else? His noble and learned Friend had said, that this was not a case for Party warfare: and had added that some sympathy should be shown to successors in office. He wished heartily that these questions had not been treated by anybody, or at any time, in a sense which would admit of the suggestion of Party warfare, or of there being any question between successors and predecessors in office; but was it not the despatch of the Secretary of State for India that raised questions between successors and predecessors in office, and showed, perhaps, less sympathy and indulgence than even the noble Lord would recommend not towards successors, but towards predecessors? Was not the able speech of the Secretary of State, of which he had no other complaint to make, almost from the beginning to the end an impeachment of the policy of his predecessors in office and of former Governors General more than anything else? The moment that despatch was written, no other course was open to the Government. It was not possible for them to vindicate their own policy except by accusing their predecessors of want of foresight and error of judgment, and by saying that the war was the result of the policy pursued by their predecessors. If a comparison of policy with policy had been imported into this discussion, it had been so imported because the present Government had presented its policy in contrast with that which preceded it, with the object of showing that the former policy was wrong. Another preliminary point touched upon by his noble and learned Friend was what was called the Constitutional question. There was no doubt whatever that the conduct of the Government in calling Parliament together was strictly within the Constitution; but what had been said, truly and wisely, by the noble Earl on the cross Benches (the Earl of Derby) was this—that it was of essential importance in these great matters not to strain the Constitution. The strength of the Constitution lay in keeping habitually within it when dealing with vital interests of the State. They could not revoke important public engagements by which the whole future of the country might be affected and all its resources might be pledged by afterwards turning out Ministers; they could not undo a war and restore a state of peace by passing a Vote of Censure upon those whose policy led to the war; and therefore it was essential that those who would act wisely, and really in the spirit of the Constitution, in those affairs which were necessarily intrusted to the Sovereign, should carry Parliament with them, as far as possible, in the preliminary policy as well as in the final one, and take Parliament into their counsel, so that it should have a substantial voice and judgment in these great matters, not only when it was too late, but before it was too late. Surely no stronger illustrations of the advantages of that doctrine could be adduced than those that were mentioned by the noble Earl (Earl Grey). An arrangement was sprung upon the country by surprise—which it might have disapproved if it had known of it before it was actually made—by which we were pledged, under all circumstances, to defend Turkey against foreign enemies, if Turkey would shape its domestic policy according to our views. What could be a stronger illustration of the danger of straining those powers of the Crown, than that such enormous engagements should be irrevocably contracted without Parliament being consulted before it was too late? So with regard to a war of this sort. It was not, as the noble and learned Earl had put it, that Parliament must always be consulted before going to war at all, and that secret information must be disclosed, but that Parliament must be consulted whenever and as soon as it is practicable. There might be occasions when it would be impossible, and when Parliament would not expect it to be done. No doubt great powers were given to the head of the State in order to provide for emergencies; but when a course of policy was definitely foreseen, and Parliament could be consulted without detriment to the interests of the country, then surely it ought to be taken into council as soon as possible. And the complaint was that this had not been done. For three years—during 1876-7-8—the Government had pursued a course which had led to war, and they paraded their policy as different from that of their predecessors, and on that account claimed credit for it. Yet so far from letting Parliament know the change which was going on, when they were pressed to take Parliament into their council, they unfortunately gave answers which everybody but themselves understood to represent the exact contrary of the facts. This was not acting in the spirit of the Constitution, and this was the only sense in which that question was raised. When the noble and learned Earl was instituting a comparison between Afghanistan and Scotland, he should have been glad to know whether the large map theory or the small map theory would have illustrated that argument best; but at the end of that course of instruction he failed to get any light from the comparison, and thought, on the whole, that it was a somewhat round-about process to go to the geography of Scotland for the purpose of understanding that of Afghanistan. The noble and learned Earl was loud in his praise of the foresight of Sir Henry Rawlinson, 10 years ago: but the predictions in the paper of Sir Henry Rawlinson had not been entirely verified. No railways had been constructed between the Caspian and the Sea of Aral, nor had steam navigation been established on the Oxus, so that the anticipated changes on which most of Sir Henry Rawlinson's alarm was founded had not been carried out. The opinions and actions of Lord Lawrence and his advisers were not correctly represented by saying that they did nothing but recommend England to make arrangements with Russia. Both Lord Lawrence and Lord Northbrook had done all that was wise and necessary for safety, not with reference only to communications with Russia, but also with reference to our relations towards Afghanistan: thinking, for the best possible reasons, that it would be inexpedient to do other things, the effect of which might have been to involve us in danger instead of improving our position; there was no ground whatever for the representation, that either of them recommended activity of reprisals and not of precaution. Was it fair to represent the Indian Government of that day as saying that nothing should be done in Afghanistan but merely to threaten Russia? He read the Papers very differently. His noble and learned Friend, adverting to what fell from the noble Earl (Earl Granville), the other evening, had said that noble Earl was now ready to follow a policy which he had declined to follow in 1873. What was the ground for that assertion? Simply this—that the Indian Government had suggested the communication to Russia of a particular despatch, urging that she should not interfere in the affairs of Afghanistan; which despatch his noble Friend (Earl Granville) then thought it inexpedient to send—and why? Because other communications had then recently passed between Russia and this country resulting in an arrangement upon that very subject; and if that Indian despatch had been sent, it might reasonably have given offence to Russia, as implying that we doubted her sincerity. But what had that to do with the Afghan policy,—to which his noble Friend and the Government of which he was a Member then as much as now adhered? It was true, Lord Northbrook did not give the Ameer the unconditional assurance of support at home and abroad which he wanted. His noble and learned Friend asked if we had to do over again now what was done in 1873, was there a man in their Lordships' House who would not give the Ameer the assurance he then asked for? He (Lord Selborne) did not believe there was a man in that House, not even excepting the noble and learned Earl himself, who would do it. He could not conceive any circumstances under which this country could possibly be justified in giving an unconditional guarantee against all enemies at home and abroad to the Ameer, and this was all that Lord Northbrook had refused to do. The present Government never offered to do anything of the kind, and would not have been justified in doing so if they had. If the late Government was to blame for not being alarmed about Russia in 1873, what were they to say of the Government of 1876, who, in the month of May, by the mouth of the Prime Minister, on two successive occasions, thus stated the condition of mind in which they then were, and wished all the world in and out of India to know it? In March, 1876, Mr. Disraeli, in the House of Commons, on one day said—

“I am not of that school who view the advances of Russia in Asia with those deep misgivings that some do. I think that Asia is large enough for the destinies of both Russia and England.”—[3 Hansard, ccxxviii. 500.]

And on the 5th of May he repeated those views, and added these words—

Lord Selborne

“So far from looking forward with alarm to the development of the power of Russia in Central Asia, I see no reason why she should not conquer Tartary any more than why England should not have conquered India. I only wish that the people of Tartary may gain as much advantage by being conquered by Russia as the people of India from being conquered by this country.”—[3 Hansard, ccxxix. 139.]

No doubt the Cabul Envoy, on the 12th of February, 1877, referred to certain things which happened in Lord Northbrook's time, as instances of what the Ameer considered objectionable interference with the internal affairs of Afghanistan; the intercession for Yakooob Khan, and the presents sent to a dependent Chief; and he objected also to the Seistan arbitration; but the attempt of Lord Lytton to impose on the Ameer the necessity of receiving British officers as Residents in his Kingdom was at the same time stated by the same Envoy to be in his view a much more serious interference, and greatly more objectionable than anything else. It was the same Envoy who stated, that while Lord Northbrook remained in India nothing had occurred to disturb the friendship which subsisted between the Indian Government and the Ameer. It was said that something had passed at the time of the Umballa Conference which justified the Indian Government in its new demands, and that the Ameer had been at that time willing to receive British Residents. There was, however, a difference in the testimony of the best informed persons as to what had occurred at that time. Mr. Seton-Karr, who was then the Indian Foreign Secretary, had stated, in an official letter written at that very time, that the Ameer was told we did not want British officers as residents at Cabul or anywhere else in his dominions, as he said they would do him harm in the eyes of his people. And at page 94 of the Papers would be found this passage from a despatch of Lord Mayo—

“The policy that we had endeavoured to establish may be termed an intermediate one, that is to say . . . we distinctly intimated to the Ameer that, under no circumstances, should a British soldier ever cross his frontier to assist him in coercing his rebellious subjects; that no European officers would be placed as Residents in his cities.”

He did not know what might be Lord Mayo's reasons for giving that assurance; but Lord Mayo said it was a distinct intimation to the Ameer. The only conclusion which could safely be acted upon, under these circumstances, was that drawn in a passage of Lord Northbrook's despatch, which unfortunately the noble and learned Earl had not quoted, but which would be found at page 132, paragraph 20. It was as follows:—

"Looking to all the circumstances of the case, the absence of any formal record of the alleged admission, its entirely private and confidential nature, and the uncertainty as to its scope and intention, we consider that we should not be justified in founding any representation to the Ameer regarding the Mission of a British Agent to Herat upon the assumption that he had, when at Umballa, expressed his willingness to agree to such an arrangement."

Nevertheless, Her Majesty's Government had thought fit to act upon the contrary view. Supposing it was advisable to attempt to get these Agents at Herat and Candahar, he did not think that would dispense with the necessity of obtaining information from Cabul, for which we should still have to depend upon Native Agents: and the importance of the object could hardly be sufficient to justify a new departure in policy for the sake of it. If, however, it was as important as the Government considered it to be, what was the course which a wise politician would have taken to accomplish the object he had in view? He would have put the bait before the fish first that he might swallow the hook. Instead of that the Ameer was ordered to swallow the hook first, as a condition which must precede his getting the bait afterwards. Instead of saying—"We want to have British Residents in your territory," a wise politician would say—"We wish to make a Treaty upon the most beneficial terms to you. Of course, we must have reasonable safeguards, but they can be discussed afterwards." Then, if the advantages offered proved attractive to the Ameer, when we came afterwards to settle the conditions, we might insert one about Residents, and unless the objections to Residents were, from the nature of the case, really insuperable and likely to throw his dominions into confusion, the Ameer would most likely have agreed to that condition. But to say at the commencement of the discussion—"We will not negotiate with you at all, unless you assent to this condition"—why, if we intended to invite failure we could not possibly have taken a better course. It had precisely the effect predicted by Lord Northbrook and his advisers—it ended in the loss of all the influence we had previously gained. His noble and learned Friend protested against the use of language which imputed to the Government an attempt to force British Residents on the Ameer. But force could be applied, morally as well as physically; and, if moral force could be employed by saying, in the most direct and unceremonious way, that the stronger intended to impose his own terms upon the weaker, that was the course which had been taken in the present case. To be sure that language was not held to the Ameer; it was to the Native British Envoy; but it was Lord Lytton's object, and his direction to the Envoy, that at least its general tenour should be communicated to the Ameer. Even deducting all the strongest phrases, about iron pots and pipkins, as meant to be translated into something more civil, the effect would still be menacing and would come to this—"If you don't do all we want, you will lose our protection, and your dominions will be effaced either by us, or by Russia with our consent, from the map of Asia." And after all, when Sir Lewis Pelly's Mission had taken place, when the Ameer's Envoy was dead, and his successor was expected with instructions to concede all that was asked, the Government of India suddenly changed their front, and broke up the Conference; saying, that in the actual situation of affairs they thought it would be no longer useful to prolong the controversy. If Russia could have dictated a policy, surely that was the very policy she would have dictated. It was telling the Ameer, in point of fact—"You must make your own arrangements with Russia, if you wish to be safe." Because the Ameer would not grant that which Lord Mayo said they would never ask, he was treated as a criminal. A more utterly suicidal and destructive policy, if the object were to strengthen our influence in Afghanistan, he could not possibly conceive. Well, when we had said and done all this, we nevertheless ended by giving to the Ameer a distinct pledge, approved by Her Majesty's Government at home. On the 15th March, 1877, Sir Lewis Pelly assured Syud Noor that the British Government had no sort or kind of quarrel with the people of Afghanistan, and closed the Conference by this declaration—

“Meanwhile, the Afghan people may rest fully assured that so long as they are not excited by their Ruler, or others, to acts of aggression upon the territories or friends of the British Government no British soldier will ever be permitted to enter Afghanistan uninvited.” [Afghanistan, No. 1, p. 220.]

He wanted to know how had that promise been kept; what acts of aggression on the territory of friends of the British Government had been committed by the Ameer when the present war was declared and when British soldiers entered Afghanistan? Sir Lewis Pelly went on to say—

“The Ameer, therefore, so long as he remains faithful to those Treaty stipulations which your Excellency has involved on behalf of His Highness, and which the British Government fully recognizes as still valid, and therefore binding upon the two contracting parties, need be under no apprehension whatever of any hostile action on the part of the British Government.”—[Ibid.]

Had the Ameer broken those Treaty stipulations? He found no stipulations in the Treaty that the Ameer should receive our Envoys at any time we might please to choose, with or without escort, or that he should hold no communication with Russia. On the contrary, he had for several years with our knowledge been communicating with Russia. What were our engagements? We engaged to respect the territory of Afghanistan, “now in His Highness’ possession,” and therefore not to send British soldiers uninvited into Afghanistan to rectify our Frontier, nor to force by menace British Residents into the Ameer’s cities. His noble and learned Friend had said there was nothing in the Papers to show that the Ameer was unwilling to receive a Russian Envoy. That statement was, however, not correct, as appeared from the following telegram from the Viceroy to the Secretary of State, dated July 30, 1878—

“British Native Medical Officer lent some time ago to Ameer returned on leave to Peshawur, the 21st instant, reporting that Kaufmann, with troops, had reached Karki, and was personally proceeding to see Ameer. Afghan officials at the Oxus tried to stop him, pending Ameer’s orders; but he declined to obey them. Ameer thereupon sent orders forbidding opposition to Russian officers. Native Doctor heard Ameer tell his Minister in durbar, 7th July, that Kaufmann, or officer of equal rank from Tashkend, had crossed Oxus on road to Cabul, refusing to be stopped.”—[Ibid. p. 227.]

This expression “refusing to be stopped” was repeated in a telegram from Major Cavagnari, and in a subsequent letter from the Ameer himself. All the evidence in the Papers, whether more or less, was to the effect that the Russians would not be stopped when the local officers objected to their proceeding. He could not but express his profound dissatisfaction both at the conduct of the Indian Government in September, 1878, and at the justification which had been offered for that conduct. It had been said that the Ameer repeatedly, steadfastly, and obstinately refused to receive our Mission. He ventured to say there was no ground for that statement. On the contrary, the Ameer offered to receive our Mission, provided that he were allowed a short and reasonable time, and that it was not pressed upon him in a manner derogatory to his independence. Sir Neville Chamberlain sent a letter on the 18th of September, asking—

“Am I authorised to endeavour to detach the tribes permanently from the Ameer’s control? . . . It should be clearly understood that our doing this will be viewed by the Ameer as an act of hostility.”—[Ibid. 242.]

The authority so asked for was given, and the course so suggested was taken, before the Ameer had given any answer to our requests. The Ameer was willing to consent to receive the Mission, provided a short and reasonable delay was allowed, and that it was not forced on him in a menacing and offensive manner. That delay was refused, and what was the excuse for the refusal? That if it had been granted, it might have been necessary to postpone military operations until the end of the year, although we had not declared war against the Ameer, or intimated our intention of doing so. He would very much rather, as an Englishman, have given the Ameer the time he asked for, and then have acted as might have been just if he did not keep his word and receive the Mission, even although we might have been put to some military disadvantages in consequence. Some previous Governments of this country had been charged with “meddling and muddling.” If he were at all disposed to use such epithets, he thought, looking at every single step which had been taken in that matter, that the policy which had been pursued in it might be called one of bullying and blundering. If our object was to strengthen the influence of this country and obtain ascendancy in Afghanistan, he was wholly unable to conceive what possible course of policy more calculated to defeat that object could have been followed than that which had been adopted. At every step errors had been committed that were entirely unnecessary, and this war, in consequence, was completely unjustifiable. He could only repeat the question of the noble and learned Earl on the Woolsack, and ask—Was there ever a policy so little consistent with our knowledge of human nature? He would not enter into the remoter political considerations as to what might be the consequences of this war. He was no great admirer of the peculiarities of Russian government, nor would he by any means be prepared to justify all the acts of Russian policy in Asia, or in Europe. Nevertheless, he had always held it to be the wise and true policy of this country, for the sake of the peace and benefit of all European nations, and for the safety and welfare of our Indian Possessions, to endeavour to be upon as good and friendly terms with Russia as Russia would permit us to be. It seemed, however, as if the whole policy of the Government had, unfortunately, tended in the opposite direction. Even while they assisted in the negotiation of peace they continued to brandish the sword at a great Power with whom it was our interest, as far as possible, to live in amity; and when they were, by their own confession, not in a position to make what had happened in Afghanistan a cause of quarrel with that great Power, they yet took measures against Afghanistan without adequate justification, which, though they might not provoke any immediate manifestation of the hostility of Russia, still must be felt by that country to be hostile in principle and spirit to her as well as to Afghanistan. He did not pretend to say what the consequences might be; but he said we were engaged in a war which, in his humble opinion, both might and ought to have been avoided, and of which he could neither see the necessity nor the justice. He must, therefore, support the Amendment of his noble Friend.

LORD HOUGHTON said, that the noble Earl who began that debate (Earl Grey), with the great candour which was, perhaps, the most remarkable part of his character, had told them that, notwithstanding that he had many years ago held a different opinion from that of his Colleagues as to the manner in which Afghanistan ought to be regarded by the Indian Government, he had not thought it his duty to leave the Government which prosecuted the war with that country to an end. He drew from that confession of the noble Earl the deduction that the present question was one on which both sides of the House ought to show much indulgence towards each other. He did not believe that any personal discussion of that matter could be advantageous or useful. If Indian Governors General and Secretaries of State were to go on criticizing each other, or imputing to their predecessors errors not only of judgment but of morality, it would be impossible to secure the services of independent or honourable men, or to govern our great Dependency with anything like the unity of purpose and the security with which it had been governed for more than 100 years. He was old enough to remember the time of Lord Auckland, and the war to which the opener of the debate had alluded. The former war in Afghanistan was prosecuted for the same purpose as the present one; but there was this difference between the two—that the former war was a case of suspicion, and the present war was a case of certainty, as against Russia. The different temper in which the former war was dealt with by Parliament, as compared with the present occasion, was illustrated by the fact that Lord Auckland was not made the object of serious political animadversion in either House, but was considered to have acted to the best of his judgment, even although the issue was so disastrous. He could not vote for the Amendment now before their Lordships. The words of the Amendment were that the war was unnecessary; and, therefore, everyone who voted for it would, in effect, say that Her Majesty's Government were spending the blood and the money of the country in a war which might well be avoided, and for which they themselves could offer no complete vindication. The noble Earl who spoke first that night (Earl Grey) laid down very distinctly the lines within which the advancing morality of the world now confined the right to go to war. He (Lord Houghton) would go further, and say that the first and the growing impression of the civilized world, notwithstanding the enormous standing armies which now existed—notwithstanding the great wars which had of late years occurred—was this—that no war was justifiable that was not a war of self-defence. It was solely because he believed this war to be one of self-defence that he could not support the Amendment. If the Ameer was to be made the centre of the picture—if Afghanistan was a separate country, the relations of which with India were such as those of Scinde—both sides of the House would be very apathetic with respect to such a State. Hours had been spent in speeches as to the character of the Ameer, and as to whether this or that message ought to have been sent to him at a particular time; but what had such matters to do with the real question before their Lordships' House? He was very much of the opinion of Lord Napier of Magdala, who had said in a Memorandum of May 30, 1878—

“We have unfortunately managed Shere Ali badly. Perhaps it might not have been possible, with our scruples, and his want of them, to have managed him advantageously; but it must be admitted that we have not given him the reasons to unite himself with us that he naturally expected.”—[Afghanistan, No. 1, p. 225.]

He would not go into the question of our relations with Afghanistan; but he would ask, why had they been entered into? Would they have been, had there been nothing behind the Ameer? If the Ameer was an independent Sovereign the case would have been different; but there was no pretence for regarding him as an independent Sovereign. All the arguments, therefore, as to International Law and the personal treatment of the Ameer were of very small relative importance. Afghanistan lay between the great, consolidated Empire of India, and the great, growing, progressive, and aggressive Empire of Russia; and although the comparison of Lord Lytton, that it was like an earthen pipkin between two iron pots, had much better have never been made, it described exactly the Ameer's position. So long ago as 1870—as appeared by the Papers on the Table of their Lordships' House—a Russian official, writing in that capacity to the Ameer, said that, though they were distant neighbours, they should live in harmony, and assured him that Russia would not interfere in the internal affairs of Afghanistan, and gave as one reason that that country was under the protection of England, with which Power Russia was on the most friendly relations. Russia, therefore, knew long ago the relations which existed between England and Afghanistan; and when hostile feelings grew up between Russia and England, necessarily and naturally those feelings extended to Afghanistan. He would only say of the conduct of Russia in those matters that she acted towards us under the influence of the uncertain faith with which she had been in the habit of dealing with Oriental nations; and nothing had more alienated from her the confidence of the English people than her action in Afghanistan. He (Lord Houghton) viewed our present military expedition as directed to prevent Afghanistan from getting beyond the range of English authority, and possibly getting into the range of Russian authority. The story of Khiva must have produced the impression on the mind of the Ameer that Russia was not only a great, but an unscrupulous Power, and he felt that he must have the present certainty of protection from England, or that his only alternative was to place himself under the protection of Russia; and this consideration, doubtless, led him to adopt the course which he had taken. The present was, as he had said, a war on the part of England of self-defence. Much adverse criticism had been bestowed on the Prime Minister's desire for a “scientific Frontier;” but if by this was meant a Frontier that could be easily defended, he saw no great harm in it. Indeed, a scientific Frontier in that sense would be practically useful and right. As to the two opinions held by military authorities, he would not feel justified in giving a vote which implied that he thought one side was right and the other side entirely wrong. He was informed, however, that a new idea held among the strategists of India was that of a delimited Frontier which should not include any large portion of Afghanistan, nor make us responsible for the administration of any large portion of it. It seemed that a Frontier might be devised which should secure us absolutely against any future conduct of the kind now resented, even though the Ameer admitted Russian influence and intrigue into his country. He could only say that if by a very limited annexation of Afghan territory a Frontier could be obtained which would render India practically safe from invasion on the North-West, it would be very desirable to have it. The Government might, in fact, incur serious blame if they failed to rectify an indefensible Frontier when a legitimate occasion for doing so arose. Another reason why he could not vote for the Amendment was that the effect of a difference of opinion among us with regard to the war could not fail to be unfortunate at the present moment; because, declaring as it did the war to be unnecessary, it would cause great pain to our gallant soldiers, who were now shedding their blood for us in Afghanistan.

THE MARQUESS OF BATH said, that it was perfectly consistent to be prepared to give every support to our troops in the field, and to conclude the war without injury to our dominions in India, yet, at the same time, to condemn the policy that had led to the war, and the means by which that policy had been carried out. He would not trouble their Lordships with the question of Prerogative. It seemed to him that whatever might have been the use of the Prerogative, and whether or not the Government was justified in declaring war without the consent of Parliament, what Parliament had to complain of was this—not that they had declared war without its previous consent, but that they had for some years studiously concealed from Parliament the change of policy that had led to the war. If the case of the Ameer was as good as it had been made out by the Secretary of State and by the noble and learned Earl on the Woolsack, it was rather unfortunate that the Government should have gone to war with him. The Ameer knew that England was bound to defend him against aggression from the North; and therefore he did not care about obtaining a formal guarantee of our protection, except with regard to possible disturbance within his own dominions, which was properly refused him both by the late and the present Administrations. As to the increasing power of Russia in Central Asia, it was a pity the Secretary of State for India (Viscount Cranbrook) had not sat in that House long enough to have heard his Predecessor (the Marquess of Salisbury) ridicule the idea of Russia's advance involving any danger to us, though it might occupy some future generation of statesmen. Certain subjects of a personal nature could not be disposed of by calling them personal matters, for they affected the credit of Ministers and of the country. The Question asked in the House last June by the Duke of Argyll was clear and distinct, and so was the reply of the noble Marquess. That reply was received by the House and the country as an assurance that there was no change in the policy of the Government and no danger of any disturbance in our Indian Empire, and as such an assurance it was acknowledged by the noble Earl (the Earl of Northbrook); but when they looked at the Papers on the Table they saw that when the noble Marquess made that statement the Government were trying to press an Envoy upon the Ameer at Herat, and that our relations were getting worse every day, and that the feeling of the Ameer against England was becoming more embittered. But suppose it were possible, as the noble Marquess contended, to accept the construction he had placed upon his words, what did it come to? A Minister of the Crown in that House conveyed to the minds of those who heard him erroneous impressions with regard to the policy he was pursuing; and, knowing that those erroneous impressions were received as true, considered he was justified, because it was possible to put another construction upon his language—at variance with those impressions, and not at variance with the truth. Nothing would be so fatal to a man's character in private life as the suspicion that there might be a second and undiscerned sense in the meaning of his words; and any statesman would lose consideration with the public when it was known that an occult meaning must be looked for in his words—different from the meaning they conveyed, from the meaning those who heard them believed them intended to convey. The country had been kept in the dark on this question, and had been misled. The Indian Press had been encouraged to write in favour of warlike measures, and to give to steps ordered from home the appearance of an Indian origin. The incidents connected with the repulse of the Mission had been misrepresented before the true account was received; the whining reply of the Ameer had been characterized as insulting to an extent not borne out by the text; Minutes had been published by the Government to support their policy, and others opposed to it kept back; and all to involve us in a war in which certain victory would bring little credit, and could only add embarrassments to an overburdened Indian Exchequer. He attributed the sufferings which had been caused to the people to the policy adopted by Her Majesty's Government to secure "Peace with honour"—honour for themselves; for the country—peace, without repose or prosperity; the costs, the troubles of war, without its glories.

THE EARL OF JERSEY felt he owed no apology to noble Lords for the course he was about to pursue. Some noble Lords who usually sat on that (the Ministerial) side of the House had declared their intention to vote against Her Majesty's Government; while on the other side some who, he might say, were unconnected with official Opposition had declared their intention of voting for the Government. He thought the course which he intended to take was consistent alike with the interests of Party and the honour of his country. The noble Marquess had just sung a terrible dirge on lesser England; but he could not believe that the Ministers would in any way be affected by that expression of opinion. They had heard what the real opinion and intention of the Government was, and he, for one, was prepared to support that opinion. As for the remarks of the noble Marquess he would leave the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to explain himself, and he had no doubt he would do so in a manner satisfactory to the House and the country. The noble Earl who commenced the debate that evening (Earl Grey) told them that the war was illegitimate, unnatural, and criminal. These were certainly strong expressions; but the noble Earl had failed to make out that Her Majesty's Ministers had pursued an illegitimate course in calling Parliament together, or an unnatural course in looking after our interests in India, or a criminal course in supporting by the Army of England the honour and interests of the Empire. The noble Earl had stated that it would be impossible for an English Envoy to live in Afghanistan; but he did not seem to think that a Russian Envoy would be in danger at Cabul. The speech of the noble Lord the Secretary of State for India would find many an echo out-of-doors. He laid down the basis of a clear and intelligible policy—a policy to which, on more than one occasion, Russian Ministers had given their adherence—that Afghanistan should be beyond the sphere of Russian action. But the acts of Russia did not always tally with her words. Her policy was, no doubt, a very subtle one—she sent friendly letters to the Ameer containing accounts of the success of the Russian arms, and even a Russian Governor General was able to tell the Ameer that he could not refuse to receive a Mission, because it was sent by the Emperor of Russia. The late Viceroy of India said we had no right to take umbrage because the Ameer had chosen Russia as an Ally; but it was the unanimous opinion of statesmen and generals that England could not allow Russian influence to be predominant in Afghanistan. It was said the Ameer was independent; he was not so in the ordinary meaning of the term. He was obliged to us for money and arms, and he came to us to answer his letters. This was more like pupilage than independence. It was said we should have allowed the Ameer more time for deliberation; but when a great danger was to be averted it was right that timely precautions should be taken. Russian promises had been accepted by them as men of honour long enough, but they now knew what those promises were worth; and when the Ameer took for his Ally the enemy of this country it was time to take action. If there was a time when it became necessary to avert an open danger by war, there was surely a time when it was necessary to avert an insidious and lurking danger by taking proper precautions. He could not help thinking that Russian policy towards India had been based on deception and aggression. Were the Government to allow Russian intrigue to increase at Cabul? While we were negotiating with the Ameer, Russian influence would be growing. Russia knew how to wage an unofficial war; and the time might come when the Afghan troops might be thrown into Her Majesty's territory, officered by others than Afghans. While we were negotiating Russia would have been preparing for war, and Her Majesty's Government would have been held responsible for their own inaction. Fortunately, they decided to take action in time. Her Majesty's Government decided that if responsibility was to be incurred they would incur it; that they would not hesitate to act; and that before the serpent was hatched they would break the egg. If Her Majesty's Government had not hesitated to incur responsibility, he trusted their Lordships' House would to-night share that responsibility. But Her Majesty's Government had incurred something else. They had been made the butt of the speeches of every rampant orator and every disappointed statesman. Upon their heads had been showered abuse of every kind, because they preferred their duty to their country to following the vain crotchets of irresponsible men. It was only a short time ago that he read the speech of a Member of Parliament who likened Her Majesty's Government to pick-pockets. Fortunately, they were indifferent to charges of that kind, and, instead of answering them, preferred to be consistent in their duty. He trusted they would continue to do so; that they would remain firm in the policy they were now pursuing; and that when the heat of Party passion had passed away—when the clouds which now hung over the plains of Roumelia, as well as the mountains of Afghanistan, had been dispelled by the resolute attitude of Her Majesty's Government—the people of this country would not forget the debt which they owed to them; and that of them it might be said, as had been said of other statesmen—

“Not once or twice, in our fair island story,
The path of duty was the way to glory.”

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON said, that when those who did not approve the policy of the Government contended that Parliament should have been consulted before war was declared they were told that such a doctrine was altogether un-Constitutional, and tended to interfere with the Prerogative of the Crown. On the other hand, when war had been declared, they were told by his noble Friend opposite (the Earl of Jersey) that if they challenged the policy of the Government they were forgetting what was due to the gallant services of our Army. These two objections destroyed each other. There was one thing, however, which was satisfactory in this debate, and that was that it was now admitted on all hands that the policy pursued by Her Majesty's present Government differed widely from that which had been pursued up to the time they entered office. They had been told by the noble Duke (the Duke of Somerset) that changed circumstances required a changed policy, and by the noble Viscount opposite (Viscount Cranbrook) that it was foolish to think that the policy pursued towards Afghanistan in 1878 should be the same as that of 1868. But then we were reminded, in justification of this altered policy, of the course of events in Central Asia, and of the progress and designs of Russia. He was not insensible to that progress, or trustful of those designs; though he was not one of those who were accustomed to attribute to the Government of Russia and its agents supernatural abilities and supernatural wickedness. But one of the main reasons why he should vote for the Amendment of the noble Viscount was that he was convinced that in this case, as in that of South-Eastern Europe during the last year or two, Her Majesty's Government had, unintentionally, no doubt, but steadily and very successfully, played the game of Russia. He would undertake to establish that assertion in a few moments out of the Papers which had been laid on the Table of the House. There was an old saying—“Forewarned is forearmed;” but Her Majesty's Government had continued to pursue the policy against which they had been warned. His noble Friend (the Earl of Northbrook) had told Her Majesty's Government that if they were to insist upon the policy of the noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Salisbury) the effect would be “to throw Afghanistan into the arms of Russia at the first opportunity.” That policy had been insisted on, and it had thrown Afghanistan into the arms of Russia at the first opportunity. Not only did the noble Marquess, in 1875, require that the Ameer should be called upon to receive British officers at Herat and Candahar, but he also urged the Viceroy to find some occasion for sending a Mission to Cabul and to press that Mission very earnestly upon the Ameer. That the noble Marquess did, notwithstanding the opinions of the most competent officers in India and of his noble Friend who was then Viceroy. Therefore, he had a right to say that Her Majesty's Government had adopted a course which was effectually playing into Russian hands. It had been amply shown, too, in the course of the debate, that the means by which it had been sought to obtain the object in view were even more ill-advised than the object itself. The first letter to the Ameer asking him to receive a Mission was dated on the 5th of May, which was, by a remarkable coincidence, the very day upon which the noble Earl (the Earl of Beaconsfield) told the House of Commons that he had no fear of Russian advance in Central Asia. Perhaps sufficient attention had not been paid to that first demand for the reception of a Mission. He had the pleasure of knowing Sir Lewis Pelly personally, and was aware that he was a gentleman of great intelligence, and a zealous public servant, who might be employed to great advantage in many situations. Still, he thought the choice of Sir Lewis Pelly was in this case singularly unfortunate, because he was the principal disciple of General John Jacob, who was, if not the inventor, at all events the chief supporter of what was called the "forward school" of Indian policy, whilst the fact of his being the author of a work entitled The Views and Opinions of General Jacob, in which the taking of Quettah was advocated, with a view to an advance on Candahar, would render him most unacceptable to the Ameer. It was a remarkable circumstance that until the demand for Sir Lewis Pelly's Mission was made there was no Russian Agent permanently residing at Cabul. After the Conference at Peshawur the Ameer was left to his own devices, and yet some noble Lords were astonished at his turning to Russia. For his own part, he thought it extremely unfortunate that the Ameer should have turned to

Russia; but, really, Her Majesty's Government gave him the best possible reason for doing so. Again, with respect to the steps taken after the reception of the Russian Mission at Cabul, it seemed to him (the Marquess of Ripon) that they were in many respects specially calculated to defeat the object which the Viceroy had in view. The moment Lord Lytton heard of the death of the Ameer's favourite son, Abdoollah Jan, he ought to have paused. He must have known, surely, that the grief of Shere Ali was such, when he lost his former son, that, although a civil war was raging in his dominions and he had all but lost his Throne, he shut himself up for many weeks in Candahar and refused to be seen. The noble Lord, then, might have imagined what would be his grief on the death of his favourite son; but, notwithstanding, the demand was sent, and the acceptance of the Mission forced upon him even before the 40 days, the formal time of mourning, had expired. No wonder that the Ameer felt great irritation. The noble Viscount opposite told them last night that the letter of condolence sent to the Ameer on the death of his favourite son was not answered in a reasonable time, and that this was considered a grave insult by Orientals; but what would be thought here in the West if a man professing to be the friend of another who had sustained such a bereavement should, at the same time that he sent a letter of condolence to his friend, also write to him about a most disagreeable matter of business? Such a proceeding would naturally be resented by the receiver of the communication. There was, indeed, one explanation of these proceedings which was sometimes put forward by supporters of the Government, and which had been hinted at that night, by which it was said that they had all along desired to take advantage—to use a phrase of the noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Salisbury)—of any circumstances which might enable them to obtain that rectification of Frontier, which was their real object in Afghanistan. He did not say that the Government had pursued that course. The language used by the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Beaconsfield) at the Guildhall gave only too much colour to the theory; but he did not find it in the despatch of the noble Viscount, and he would not charge any

English Minister with conduct so utterly unjustifiable. He would now ask their Lordships to consider what was the character of the contest in which they were engaged. Sir Henry Rawlinson, a supporter of the policy of the Government—if, indeed, he were not its author—in his recent article in The Nineteenth Century, said—

“War with Afghanistan is to be deprecated beyond all other wars, because, however it may end, it will leave behind it a heavy legacy of debt and the hatred of people who ought to be our friends.”

Such, then, was the war in which Her Majesty's Government had involved the country. For what ends was it being pursued? In the course of this discussion they had had two speeches from Members of the Government, and two alone. What had been the cause of this unusual silence he could not say; but before the debate came to a close the Government ought to give the House some inkling at least of the objects and purposes with which they were prosecuting that contest. At the present moment they knew nothing about them. The noble Viscount (Viscount Cranbrook) had told them the previous day that we must be paramount and supreme in Afghanistan. Upon these words a very wide construction could be placed; and he thought the Government were bound to tell Parliament, from whom they were asking Supplies, whether the war was merely to be waged to punish the Ameer for the insult he was said to have offered us, to obtain satisfaction for that insult, and to carry out the objects stated in the last paragraph of the last despatch of the noble Viscount (Viscount Cranbrook), or whether it was intended to procure a rectification of Frontier—of which there was no mention in that despatch, although it had been mentioned in the Prime Minister's speech. If the last was their real object, what was the extent of the spoliation which was concealed behind the dark word “rectification?” Was it to be the rectification recommended by Sir Henry Rawlinson, which was the military occupation of Western Afghanistan; or what we were told in the newspapers was the policy of the Government of India—to occupy the triangle of Jellalabad, Cabul, and Candahar; or was it to be a more limited rectification, starting from Jel-lalabad and passing down the mountains to the South-West, which would have the effect of transferring to our rule some of the wildest and most savage tribes on the face of the earth? To these questions the House had a right to demand an answer. Their Lordships were told that if they were not prepared to refuse the Supplies they ought not to pass censure on the Government; but in the case of the war with China—which he had believed to be unnecessary and unjust, just as he believed the present war to be so, and against which he, in common with Members of the existing Government, had voted—no such doctrine as that had been recognized. It would be unjust, he fully admitted, that the Government should be severely condemned if, in the course of a series of long and complicated transactions, they had made some mistakes of detail. But, in the present case, the root of the evil lay in the policy itself, which the Government had adopted. They had deliberately rejected the principles that for nearly 40 years—from the time of Lord Ellenborough, the Duke of Wellington, and Sir Robert Peel, down to that of the present Administration—had governed our conduct towards Afghanistan, and which had been acted upon without exception by every Ministry at home and every Governor General in India; they had embarked on their novel policy in spite of the warnings of the men best qualified to speak; and the result had been to fulfil to the letter the predictions of those whose counsels they had rejected. Their Representative in India—the Viceroy—for whose conduct they were fully responsible, had pursued the policy thus entered upon in a manner which would have wrecked a better cause; he deliberately closed the Conference at Peshawur when he knew that if he waited for a few hours all his demands would be conceded; and he had thrown the Ameer into the arms of Russia, as his noble Friend (the Earl of Northbrook) had foretold; and then, when at length he was brought face to face with the inevitable consequences of the course which he had pursued, he so conceived and executed his attempts to extricate himself as to render their failure certain. It was against such a policy, begun so rashly, carried on so unwisely, concealed so studiously from Parliament, marked on more than one occasion by a dark stain of injustice, and ending in the establishment of a Russian Mission at Cabul, and in war with a people with whom it was our interest to be friendly, that he protested that night; and he should vote for the Amendment in order to clear himself from all complicity with proceedings which he believed in his conscience to be so deeply injurious to the reputation and to the interests of the country.

VISCOUNT MIDLETON considered that the conclusions at which the noble Marquess who had just spoken (the Marquess of Ripon) had arrived were strangely at variance with the facts of the case. What were those facts? The basis of our relations with Afghanistan was admitted to be the Convention entered into by the Government of India and the late Ameer Dost Mahomed. Upon his death, eight years afterwards, there occurred one of those struggles which seemed to be the normal condition of Afghanistan after the demise of one of its Rulers. It was not until the year 1868 that any formal acknowledgment of the present Ameer on the part of our Government was made, and since that time he had many grievances to bring forward against us, the head and front of which—and this occurred during the holding of his office by the noble Earl the late Viceroy (the Earl of Northbrook)—had reference to our preference for his eldest son, whom he desired to put aside in favour of his son by a favourite wife, and this grievance he mentioned with some bitterness in his recent reply to the Ultimatum sent to him by the present Viceroy. It had been asserted that there was no change in the bearing of the Ameer towards us. Such an assertion could not be maintained. His bearing had greatly changed since the days of Lord Mayo; and he had no doubt that had that noble Lord lived the personal influence he exercised over the present Ameer would have saved us from the trouble in which we now found ourselves. About the time of the War of Succession Lord Russell took note of the progress of Russia in Central Asia, and he received from the Government of that country assurances that their objects were purely commercial and pacific. In 1867 similar assurances were received from Russia, and they were repeated to Mr. (now Sir)

Douglas Forsyth in St. Petersburg by the Russian Chancellor, who, in 1873, wrote to the same effect, stating distinctly that “we consider Afghanistan altogether beyond the sphere of Russian operations.” Their Lordships were aware how those promises were kept. In 1873 the noble Earl the late Viceroy pointed out in one of his despatches that the advance of Russia in Central Asia could not but be regarded with anxiety in Afghanistan. The change in the Ameer’s conduct towards us in 1873 was, he believed, entirely owing to his distrust of the confiding simplicity of the Government of that day. The conduct of Russia in seeking to ingratiate herself with the Ameer, in breach of her solemn assurances, was a matter into which he would not enter further than to say that it seemed to him fully to justify the desire of the present Government to obtain the admission of English officers to Cabul and other places in the Ameer’s dominions. He did not see why Afghanistan should be treated differently from the Native States in India in which we had established Residents. When Tippoo Sahib declined to receive our Envoy we marched troops into his dominions, with what result they all knew. The course taken by the Government in the present instance was very similar to that pursued towards Tippoo Sahib, and he anticipated for it an equally auspicious termination. If the case for the reception of our officers in Afghanistan was strong before, it was doubly strong when it transpired that a Russian Embassy had been received with every mark of favour at Cabul, while our Native Agent was only allowed to transmit to us such information as the Ameer or his officers thought convenient. With regard to the question of the Frontier, he would only remind their Lordships that the defenders of India, when they encountered their invaders in the plains, had invariably been worsted; and that the same lesson was taught by the collapse of the Turkish resistance in the late war as soon as the Russians managed to cross the Balkans. A scientific or strategic Frontier was therefore a matter of vital importance to India; and whatever the opinions entertained in reference to it 10 or 12 years ago, no one could maintain that we ought to be guided by them in the altered circumstances of the present day. Her Majesty’s Government could not have done more than they had done, and they ought to have done no less; their measures had been dictated by prudence and common sense; and an adverse vote at this crisis would cripple the energies, if it would not paralyze the arm, of England.

THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK: My Lords, in addressing some remarks to your Lordships this evening, I wish to commence by expressing the gratification which I have felt at the gallantry which has been shown by Her Majesty's Forces in the field in Afghanistan. I wish also to express my confidence in the officers in command of those Forces—Sir Samuel Browne and General Roberts—who have conducted successful operations in the field, and General Stewart and General Biddulph, who have had no such opportunity yet, but who, I am sure, will justify their reputation when they have that opportunity. Having been personally acquainted with those officers, I believe that better selections could not have been made. The spirit which Her Majesty's British and Native Forces have evinced on this occasion cannot be surpassed; and I may be permitted to say that the general efficiency of the Army is, in my opinion, mainly due to the administration of my noble and gallant Friend Lord Napier of Magdala, who was for many years Commander-in-Chief in India, and of my gallant Friend Major-General Sir Henry Norman, who for a long period was Secretary to the Government of India in the Military Department, and afterwards the military Member of the Council of the Viceroy. The general arrangements for the campaign, so far as we know them, reflect great credit upon the Commander-in-Chief in India, Sir Frederick Haines, who will, I am sure, satisfactorily discharge his responsible duties; and particularly upon the Quartermaster General's Department of the Indian Army. I must further express my satisfaction—not surprise—at the expressions of loyalty received by the Viceroy from the Native Princes of India, some of them my personal friends. The Maharajah of Gwalior and others have offered their personal services and those of their troops. Having so recently filled the office of Viceroy in India I cannot pass these offers by without expressing my gratification.

I will now say a few words on the main question of the Address. Your Lordships are asked to assent to the application of the Revenues of India to defray the expenses of the war in Afghanistan. My Lords, I entirely agree with my noble Friend who recently filled the office of Governor of the Presidency of Madras (Lord Napier and Ettrick) in regretting the course Her Majesty's Government have taken. It would have been right, just, and generous to have decided at once that no portion of the expense should fall upon the Revenues of India. I consider the war to be the direct consequence of the state of affairs in Europe, and not to have arisen from anything immediately connected with our Indian Empire. For that reason, if for no other, India should not be called upon to bear the cost. Moreover, India has suffered recently from two severe famines; the people are impoverished; and the state of the finances is far from satisfactory. True, the noble Viscount opposite (Viscount Cranbrook) told us that the Indian Government expect a surplus of £1,250,000 above the Estimates this year; but this is exactly what I anticipated in the discussion of last year. The reason of this surplus is the extra taxation unnecessarily imposed upon the people of India for the purpose of raising what is called a Famine Fund. The new taxes, which press upon the poorer classes, and which I believe to be unpopular and impolitic, ought to be taken off as soon as the condition of the finances will allow of it.

I entirely agree with what has fallen from the noble and learned Earl on the Woolsack, that it would be a subject for regret if Indian questions came to be regarded as Party questions. I have never considered them to be so; and it was a gratification to me to hear the complaint of the noble Duke (the Duke of Somerset), that there had been no great meeting of the Liberal Party called together upon this question. As regards the speech of the noble Viscount who introduced this subject (Viscount Cranbrook), I have nothing personal to complain of. He is right in saying that there has been no reticence on the part of the Government in producing Papers, and he has a perfect right to criticize my public conduct. I am the last person to complain of any such criticisms. What I am now about to say is the result of my actual experience in India. The noble and learned Earl on the Woolsack has given an account of the objects of the British Government, during the last 10 years, in dealing with Central Asia and Afghanistan. During that period there have been two Administrations—five years under Mr. Gladstone, and five years under the noble Earl opposite. I was Viceroy in India during two years under Mr. Gladstone's Administration, and two years under that of the noble Earl; and as far as I know—and so far as my dealing with these affairs enables me to form an opinion—I have not been able to find out any difference whatever in the objects which the British Government desired to secure with regard to the progress of Russia in Central Asia, or to our dealings with Afghanistan; bearing in mind, of course, that the general line of policy must be modified by the progress of events. Having filled the high office of Viceroy in India, I think it is absolutely necessary, to avoid any misconception in discussing the policy of the British Government towards Russia in regard to Central Asia, for me to say that the Government of India, while I had any connection with it, has not been actuated by the fear of any attack upon India by Russia. We never believed that such an attack was possible; and we were of opinion that if anything of the kind were possible the strength of the British Empire in India and in this country was amply sufficient to render such an attack futile, and disastrous only to those who might make the attempt. The Governments of England and of India have never looked upon the progress of Russia in Central Asia with the eyes of that school of which Sir Henry Rawlinson, who has been quoted by the noble and learned Earl on the Woolsack, is the most able exponent. In 1869 the Government of India said—

"We by no means share in the exaggerated apprehensions expressed in many quarters as to the danger to British rule in India which may arise from an extension of Russian influence in those countries lying to the South and East of her enormous possessions in Asia.

"We believe that the influence of a civilized European power over wild and savage tribes cannot be otherwise than beneficial.

"We would therefore heartily assist in establishing a frank and clear understanding with Russia as to the relative position of British and Russian interests in Asia."—[Afghanistan, No. 1, p. 102.]

In accordance with these principles, they suggested that, as it was for the interests of both countries that a wide border of independent States should exist between the British and Russian Frontiers, it would be desirable that Russia should be invited to adopt the same policy with regard to the independent States which come under her legitimate influence, as the Government of India had pursued with regard to Afghanistan and the independent States within their influence. Her Majesty's Government entered into negotiations with Russia for this purpose. Russia accepted, in 1873, the boundary of Afghanistan suggested by the Government of India in the time of Lord Mayo; and it was arranged that Russia should, to the best of her ability, prevent the Native States on her side from creating any disturbance in Afghanistan; while, on the other hand, we engaged to exercise our influence to prevent the Ameer of Cabul from transgressing the boundaries of his dominions. These negotiations took place under the Administration of Mr. Gladstone; and again, under the Administration of the noble Earl opposite, similar negotiations took place in 1878. The Government of India entirely concurred with the views expressed by the Home Government in these negotiations; and one of the last despatches I sent home when I was Viceroy expressed the concurrence of the Government of India in the arrangements made by the noble Earl now sitting on the cross benches (the Earl of Derby). It is but fair to the Russian Government to add that, during the time that I was in India, they loyally carried out the engagements into which they had entered.

The noble and learned Earl on the Woolsack, and the noble Viscount opposite (Viscount Cranbrook), have accused the late Government of having pursued a timid policy, and alluded to a paragraph in a despatch of the 30th of June, 1873, in which the Government of India, when I was Viceroy, suggested that Her Majesty's Government should make a plain declaration to the Russian Government that the British Government would defend Afghanistan in the event of unprovoked attack; and they have said that this was not done. The Government of India always urged upon Her Majesty's Government—perhaps in terms a little stronger than the Foreign Secretary of the day may have liked—the expediency of speaking in the plainest language to the Russian Government both of the independence of Afghanistan and of the inconvenience which might arise from the further progress of Russia in the direction of India. I do not want to pit the policy of one Government of Her Majesty against another; but as that policy has been indiscriminately attacked by one Member of the present Cabinet, I am afraid I cannot depend upon other Members of the Cabinet to defend it. However, in the Central Asia Papers lately laid before Parliament, there is a despatch written by the noble Earl on the cross benches (the Earl of Derby) to Lord Augustus Loftus in June, 1877, in which the noble Earl quotes a despatch from Earl Granville, dated January, 1874, and says—

“His Lordship thought it right to state candidly and at once to the Russian Government that the independence of Afghanistan was regarded by Her Majesty's Government as a matter of great importance to the welfare and security of British India, and to the tranquillity of Asia.”—[Central Asia, No. 1 (1878) p. 111.]

The Government of India, in 1874, were much concerned about some probable movements of the Russians in the direction of Merv, not on account of any apprehension of danger to British India, but because such an advance might lead to difficulties between Russia and Afghanistan; and at the time when the late Government resigned that question was particularly prominent. The Government of India wrote pressing to the Home Government to speak frankly to Russia—to tell her of the inconvenience that might arise from that advance, and to do what was possible to prevent it. The noble Earl (the Earl of Derby) wrote in the strongest terms to the Russian Government, and said that the advance of the Russian arms in the direction of Merv would impose on Her Majesty's Government the necessity of making a corresponding advance, in order to allay apprehensions and to remove misconception from the minds of the people of those countries. On reading those words, and the words used by Earl Granville in 1874, I felt that the intention of the Government of India had been fully carried out by Her Majesty's Government. It seems to me, therefore, that the inference drawn by the noble and learned Earl on the Woolsack and the noble Viscount opposite as to the conduct of Mr. Gladstone's Government, and of their own Government, is entirely unfounded. Both Governments, notwithstanding the objections of the noble and learned Earl, actually used much the same language to Russia as the Government of India—rightly, as I believe—had suggested. With respect to the opinions of Her Majesty's present Government on the position of Russia in Central Asia, it is hardly necessary to do more than to refer to the speech of the Prime Minister in the House of Commons in May, 1876, when he said he was “Not of that school who view the advances of Russia in Asia with those deep misgivings that some do.”—[3 Hansard, cccxviii. 500.]

He said that Asia was large enough for the destinies of both Russia and England

“At no time,” he added, “has there been a better understanding between the Courts of St. James and St. Petersburg than at the present moment; and there is this good understanding because our policy is a clear and a frank policy.”—[3 Hansard, cccxix. 139.]

I think that those were wise words. They seem, from the Papers laid before Parliament, to have given great satisfaction in Russia, and they show that the policy of both Governments towards Russia was up to that time one and the same.

So much for our policy with regard to Russia. With regard to Afghanistan and other neighbouring States, the policy of the Indian Government was thus expressed by Lord Mayo before he died—

“The cardinal points of the foreign policy which the Government of India should steadily pursue may be briefly described as follows. . . . We should establish with our Frontier States of Kheilat, Afghanistan, Nipal, and Burmah, intimate relations of friendship; we should make them feel that though we are all-powerful, we have no wish to encroach on their authority; but, on the contrary, that our earnest desire is to support their power and maintain their nationality; and that if severe necessity arise we might assist them with money, arms, and, perhaps, in certain eventualities, with men. We could thus create in those States outworks of our Empire, and assuring them that the days of annexation are passed, make them practically feel that they have everything to gain and nothing to lose by endeavouring to deserve our favour and support."

The noble Viscount opposite (Viscount Cranbrook) seemed the other night to have some difficulty in describing what our "settled policy" towards Afghanistan was. If the noble Viscount had been longer in the India Office he would have found out that the policy was clear and decided. I do not want to add anything myself to the explanation I have read, and I have read it because the policy ought to stand clearly before your Lordships. When Lord Mayo was in India the first application he made of that policy was in dealing with Afghanistan, in consequence of the arrangements made by his predecessor, Lord Lawrence, for the support of Shere Ali, and that a meeting should take place between him and the Viceroy. I am not going over again the history of the Umballa Conference. Although Lord Mayo, when he met Shere Ali, could not comply with all his wishes, the result of the Conferences which then took place was by no means unsatisfactory. I wish to add my testimony to the testimony of those noble Lords who have said in this House that the personal influence and the generous confidence inspired by Lord Mayo were of substantial public advantage in dealing with the Native Princes of India, and almost, if not quite, disarmed the suspicions of one who was the most suspicious of a suspicious race. My Lords, Shere Ali was not less suspicious when, in 1873, I had to enter into some negotiations with him. I will not trouble your Lordships with any long account of them, they have been so much before the House; all that I shall say is that upon that occasion, having received authority from Her Majesty's Government, I gave Shere Ali assurances in respect to assistance from the British Government, under certain circumstances, very much in the terms I read just now when describing the general policy to be pursued towards States which adjoin British India. There were in the speeches of the noble Viscount and of the noble and learned Earl on the Woolsack certain statements with regard to those negotiations which I cannot accept. Of course, I know that the assurances which I gave to Shere Ali did not come up to the expectations he entertained. At the same time, when the noble Viscount brings forward the Prime Minister of Shere Ali, who conducted the negotiations in 1873, as evidence to show that the assurances which I then gave were vague, I cannot accept the extract read by the noble Viscount as conveying a correct account of the views of the Prime Minister. The noble Viscount read an extract from the Conference between the Prime Minister and Sir Lewis Pelly on the 8th of February, 1877, and which will be found at page 204 of the Afghanistan Papers. It is true that the Prime Minister then said that the nature of the assistance to be given to Shere Ali was left obscure, both in my writings and sayings; but this remark applied only to my first interview with the Prime Minister; and if the noble Viscount had taken the trouble to read the Report of the next Conference, on the 10th of February, given in the very next page of the Papers, he would have found that the Prime Minister proceeded to relate how he had afterwards discussed the subject completely with the Foreign Secretary, and how at a subsequent interview with me "all the subjects were thoroughly discussed, and so nothing was left unconsidered." The Prime Minister, who, I must say, gave a very accurate account of the transactions of 1873, throughout the Conferences with Sir Lewis Pelly, in 1877, so far from complaining that the assurances given by me in 1873 were vague and undefined, was actually trying to meet the complaint put into his mouth by Sir Lewis Pelly that they were vague and inconclusive, and that, therefore, it would be necessary to make a new Treaty with the Ameer.

There were, no doubt, some causes which led the Ameer to be dissatisfied with the Government of India. In the first place, both he and the Persian Government were dissatisfied with the arbitration which the British Government had undertaken, and which was ably and impartially carried out by Sir Frederick Goldsmid, to settle the boundary of the two countries in Seistan. Then Shere Ali was offended at the advice I gave him to keep faith with his son, Yakoob Khan. I need not defend my conduct in having done this, for no noble Lord has taken exception to it.

The noble Viscount (Viscount Cranbrook), having been so short a time in office, cannot be expected to know much about these details; but he entirely misapprehended the facts of the case when he charged me with having sent the message to the Ameer by a "common messenger." My Lords, I sent it by the ordinary channel of communication with the Ameer—the Native Agent of the British Government who was resident at his Court. That was, in fact, the only channel of communication I could have employed; and it was precisely the same channel that was used by Lord Lytton to conduct the recent negotiations with the Ameer. The noble and learned Earl on the Woolsack—and I cannot say that I am surprised at any error into which he may have fallen, for the subject is very complicated and difficult—has said that there was a great contrast between my letter to Shere Ali with regard to his son Yakooab, and that written to him by General Kaufmann, the Russian Governor General of Turkestan, in the year 1875.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: It was in the year before.

THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK: I certainly understood the noble and learned Earl to say 1875; but the letter was written by General Kaufmann before I went to India. In fact, it was written in 1871, when Lord Mayo was Viceroy, and related to different events. I feel that I need not dwell long upon the other ground of complaint which the Ameer had against the Government of India—namely, the sending a Native gentleman to carry a present to the Ruler of Wakhan, who had been civil to some British officers who had visited his neighbourhood. There was some misapprehension about this affair which I explained to the Ameer; but I insisted upon his permitting the messenger to proceed, as I thought his objections were unreasonable. The noble Viscount has commented upon this transaction as if I had been disposed to go to war with Afghanistan upon the matter; but your Lordships will readily understand that there were other ways of dealing with the Ameer if he had refused; and, in fact, he did what I wished. As regards all these sources of complaint on the part of the Ameer, I apprehend that no noble Lord would wish the Government of India to do everything which the Ruler of Afghanistan wanted him to do—that would have been a course entirely undignified and quite improper. I hold that the Ameer had no reasonable ground of complaint; and I think I did what was quite right and reasonable towards him. Let us look, however, at the general result of this policy, which I have said was the policy of two Governments in India and at home during the time that I was Viceroy, and also in the time of Lord Mayo. There was no difference whatever in the policy of the two Governments. Both wanted to give reasonable assurances of protection to the Ameer, and both desired to keep on good terms with him. The result was fairly satisfactory. We wished that the Ameer should keep peace with his neighbours, and that he should follow our advice in his foreign affairs. He wanted to make an attack on Bokhara, but he abstained from doing so upon our advice. He next quarrelled with the Persians about Seistan; nevertheless, in consequence of our advice, he accepted our arbitration on that subject, and, as far as I know, he loyally kept his word. I advised him to give no assistance to the Turkomans; he acted upon my advice; and, moreover, at my request he tried to induce them to give up to the Russian Government some Russian subjects who had been captured and made slaves, in order to prevent a quarrel between Russia and the Turkomans, which might have brought the Russians to Merv. Then, as to his domestic affairs, I am not aware that the Ameer had any serious quarrel with me about them, with the exception, perhaps, of my advice to him about Yakooab Khan. He asked me, in 1874, to do what I could with the Persian Government to induce them to give a civil answer to his letter, announcing the nomination of Abdoolla Jan as his heir. That did not look like the act of a man who was hostile to the British Government and wished to quarrel with it. The most important thing he did just before I left India was to bring entirely within his control the country bordering on the Turkoman Frontier, not very far from the boundary which was laid down between England and Russia as that which was not to be transgressed. He communicated with us. We wrote home to the Government asking them to inform the Russian Government; and I believe the noble Earl on the cross benches (the Earl of Derby) communicated with Russia. All this shows that what was contemplated by the Governments of Mr. Gladstone and of the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Beaconsfield)—namely, to remain on good terms with the Ruler of Afghanistan and to keep him a reasonable and sensible being who should not quarrel with his neighbours—was maintained up to the time when I left India. I do not like to quote my own despatches; but the account I gave in them of the state of mind of the Ameer was very much like that which I have now given to your Lordships. I believe now—not on my own authority, but on that of everybody who knew anything about it—that the Ameer was then loyal, in the sense that he had not the slightest inclination to turn to Russia for support. On the other hand, he was a little “touchy” on certain things. On two occasions the Government of India wrote to the Secretary of State when I was Viceroy that if he would treat him with patience, and not press upon him certain things unnecessarily which were distasteful to him, there was no doubt that he would remain our good friend. We felt that he was an Asiatic, and must be treated with patience as such by his European neighbours.

I know the noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Salisbury) entertains a different opinion from that which I hold, in common with everyone with whom I have conversed who has filled a responsible position in India, upon the disposition of Shere Ali. The noble Marquess, of course, has a perfect right to his own opinion; but he ought not to cast a slur on a distinguished servant of the Government of India, which is entirely undeserved. In a despatch of October 4, 1877, the noble Marquess, referring to the state of mind of the Ameer, when I left India in 1876, said—

“This (the course of events) demonstrates but too plainly how erroneous was the opinion expressed so recently as the year 1876 by Sir Richard Pollock, the Commissioner of Peshawur, that ‘no unfavourable change had occurred in the disposition of the Ameer.’ Shere Ali’s confidential Envoy stated explicitly that his master had ‘now a deep-rooted mistrust of the good faith and sincerity of the British Government.’”—[Afghanistan, No. 1, p. 223.]

Sir Richard Pollock tells me that he was unable to correct this statement himself,

because he has very properly felt it to be his duty, in consequence of the confidential position he so recently occupied at Peshawur, to consider his lips sealed, and to take no part, directly or indirectly, in the discussions that have taken place about the Afghan War. My Lords, the opinion given by Sir Richard Pollock was quoted by the noble Marquess from the despatch of the Government of India of the 7th of June, 1875, and it was given, not in 1875, but in the beginning of 1874, and therefore before the incidents about Yakooob Khan and the despatch of a messenger to Wakhan had occurred. But, besides, your Lordships will see in a moment how unfair the statement of the noble Marquess is with respect to Sir Richard Pollock. It is perfectly true that Shere Ali’s Prime Minister said to Dr. Bellew in a private conversation on the 28th of January, 1877, which will be found at page 195 of the Afghanistan Papers, that but it appears from that conversation that the main reason for that mistrust was the endeavour to force British officers upon him. No doubt the Prime Minister alluded to other matters; but this was, all through the Conferences, the principal ground of his complaints. And, therefore—I am sure, perfectly unintentionally—the noble Marquess was in error in attributing a mistake to Sir Richard Pollock. I regret that the noble Marquess should have thrown any doubts upon Syud Noor Mahomed’s character by saying that his statements were obviously insincere. It is true that his history is like a chapter from the Arabian Nights. He travelled once with a string of horses from one end of India to the other, and eventually rose to be the trusted Minister of the Ameer, and served his master ably and loyally. A further statement was made by the Prime Minister, as will be seen by the Papers, when he was lying ill. Dr. Bellew went to see him, and the statement he then made was very pathetic. He said to the doctor—“This is a very serious business. It is the last time the Ameer will treat with the British Government. You must not impose upon us a burden which we cannot bear; and if you overload us the responsibility rests with you." The doctor asked him what burden he referred to, and he replied—"The residence of British officers on the Frontiers of Afghanistan." This, my Lords, is enough to show that the state of the Ameer's mind, as represented by his Prime Minister, arose mainly from the endeavour to force Resident British officers upon him, directed by the noble Marquess himself in 1876, contrary to the opinion of Sir Richard Pollock, and to that of every officer who had a knowledge of Afghanistan.

“the Ameer now has a deep-rooted mistrust of the good faith and sincerity of the British Government, and he has many reasons for this mistrust;”

I said that when I left India the Ameer was loyal to the British Government. Whether he was inclined to turn towards Russia, however, is the main point. After the negotiations of 1873, it was said by the noble Viscount (Viscount Cranbrook) that the Ameer at once turned to Russia. What proof is there for that statement? I was surprised to hear the opinion of our Native Agent at Cabul quoted in support of it, and at the manner in which the noble Viscount spoke of the reports of the Native Agent. The noble Viscount said it was easy to see that his reports were all rubbish. Our Native Agent was a Mohammedan gentleman of high character and standing, who did good service in the Mutiny, and received a handsome reward from Lord Lytton for his services at Cabul. Englishmen are not the only people who can do anything. Many Natives can and do render good service to the British Government. In October, 1876, our Native Agent went to Simla, and said that Shere Ali did not suspect us of conspiring with Russia to his prejudice; nor that the British coveted any portion of his territory: the Ameer was well aware, he said, that Russia, sooner or later, would attack Afghanistan. The Agents of Russia, he added, were regarded by the Ameer as a source of embarrassment. That statement was made at a formal interview; and in a private interview with Captain Grey he said—"That the Ameer was desirous of securing a pied à terre in British territory whither to send his family and property when he cleared for action with Russia." Is it possible, in the face of such testimony, to say that at that time he was unfriendly to England and friendly to Russia? The noble and learned Earl on the Woolsack—who, by the way, in commenting upon the letters of Shere Ali, although he is doubtless accustomed, as he said, to interpret English documents, strangely misinterpreted the ordinary terms of compliment employed in the East—after giving an account of the negotiations of 1873, turned round and asked whether any of your Lordships would have refused to grant what was then asked by Shere Ali and refused by me? I have again to come between one Member of the present Administration and another, and to say that in his remarks addressed to me the noble and learned Earl was, at the same time, condemning his own Government. I had the honour of serving as Viceroy for two years under the Administration of the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Beaconsfield). What happened in 1874? There was a debate in your Lordships' House in which the subject of the negotiations of 1873 was thoroughly discussed; and what was then the opinion of the present Government? The opinion of the Government, as expressed in that debate, was that it was quite impossible to give Shere Ali what he wanted—namely, an unconditional guarantee of protection. But is that all? I served as Viceroy for two years after that; and did I receive any instructions to give Shere Ali the unconditional guarantee he wanted? Not one single despatch; not one single expression; not one single hint to that effect. "Here," said the noble Viscount (Viscount Cranbrook) "is what ought to have been done—the guarantee ought to have been given;" and the noble Earl says that this was the thing that drove the Ameer into the arms of Russia. But look at the two despatches in which the noble Marquess opposite instructed me, in 1875, to obtain the admission of British Residents into Afghanistan. Is there a single word about giving any additional assurances to the Ameer? Not a word; no suggestion whatever was made that any greater assurances of support should be given to him than I had given in 1873. So much so, that I was obliged to remind the noble Marquess that if Shere Ali entertained the proposal he would be certain to ask for some return. Therefore, I say that the charges brought against me by noble Lords opposite are really charges against the Government of which they themselves are Members. There can, in fact, be no distinction drawn in this matter between the present and the late Government. I do not accuse the Government of doing anything wrong in the matter; for I do not believe any Government would do such a thing as to give Shere Ali an unconditional guarantee of protection—arms, ammunition, troops, whatever he liked—without asking for anything in return. This is what he asked; and this is what is now said by the noble and learned Earl on the Woolsack that I ought to have given him.

I have shown that during these eight years there had been no change of policy. The objects of the Governments in India and at home were the same; we all wanted the friendship of Afghanistan; our difference was as to the means of securing it. In 1875 I received a despatch from the noble Marquess, pointing out the desirability of our having a British Resident at Herat. I should have liked to have had on that Frontier a British officer. I was not against the measure. Do not suppose I had the least desire to oppose it; but I thought it well to consult the officers of the Government who knew most about the matter. I was on the point of proceeding to Delhi. When I arrived there I consulted the Lieutenant Governor of the Punjab, and all the most experienced officers of the Frontier. I also summoned two Native gentlemen of high character, who had been the Agents of the Government of India at Cabul, and who knew the Ameer well. One of them was the Nawab Gholam Hussein Khan. I did not hold a formal Conference; but I saw all these officers privately—one at a time—and asked them how that request would be likely to be entertained by Shere Ali, and what would be the best way of making it? They said that the admission of British Residents into Afghanistan was the one thing which the Ameer disliked more than another, and which was most likely to get us into trouble with him; and I made them write down their opinions, that I might send them home. After that I had all the Papers on the subject looked out and examined, to see if there was any information which would warrant us in assuming that Shere Ali would receive a British Agent at Herat. The noble Marquess was under that impression. He wrote to the Government of India that—

"The Ameer has more than once in former years expressed his readiness to permit the presence of an Agent at Herat, and it is therefore not possible that, if his intentions are still loyal, he will make any serious difficulty now."
—[Ibid. p. 129.]

I was under the impression myself that, at some time, he might have said something to that effect. We found that Lord Mayo, at Umballa, had distinctly told the Ameer that he would not be asked to receive British officers in Afghanistan; but we thought that he might have said something, in private conversations, to the effect that he might accept them elsewhere than at Cabul. We wrote this to the Secretary of State, adding that what might have passed then could not fairly be used in any negotiations with the Ameer. But since we examined into this matter in 1875, it has been set at rest by the evidence of Mr. Seton-Karr, who was Foreign Secretary to Lord Mayo at Umballa, and was, therefore, completely acquainted with all that took place. Mr. Seton-Karr came to me, of his own accord, the other day, and said—"I want to tell you that it is quite a mistake to suppose that anything of the kind was ever said by the Ameer." Not only is Mr. Seton-Karr's recollection clear on the point that Shere Ali never expressed his willingness to receive British officers in Afghanistan, but he gave an account of what occurred in a letter to Lord Lawrence, written on the 5th of April, 1869, immediately after the Conference at Umballa, which he has authorized me to use, and which contains the following passage:—

"He (Shere Ali) is told that we do not want British officers as Residents at Cabul or anywhere else, and he says they would do him harm in the eyes of his people."

Lord Mayo's official account of what took place has been strangely misinterpreted. It has even been said that the Mission of British officers to Afghanistan was a boon which he denied to Shere Ali. This, however, is an error, which is refuted by a private letter written on the 3rd of June, 1869, by Lord Mayo to the Duke of Argyll, in which Lord Mayo, summing up the Umballa Conference, wrote—

"The only pledges given were that we would not interfere in his affairs; that we would support his independence; that we would not force European officers as Residents upon him against his wish."

In June, 1875, the Government of India gave their opinion that it was not wise to force British Residents on the Ameer. We thought it might lead to trouble; and, as servants of the Government, we thought it our duty to point that out. There was no hurry about the matter; and having been told, by everyone whose opinion was of any value, that the course proposed was likely to alienate the Ameer, we stated our opinion to the Government; but the Government, notwithstanding the unanimous opinion of the Viceroy and his Council, replied that the course they had suggested must be followed. Again, the Government of India, in January, 1876, pointed out the evil effects which, in their opinion, would follow from carrying out the Instructions of the noble Marquess, in the hope that the matter might still be re-considered by Her Majesty's Government.

In February, 1876, however, Lord Lytton, before leaving England, received distinct and positive Instructions, both written and verbal, to insist that Shere Ali should receive British Residents in Afghanistan. My Lords, I do not wish to say a word against the proceedings of Lord Lytton; I know the difficulties and responsibilities of a Viceroy, and Lord Lytton seems to me to have carried out the Instructions which he received. The responsibility rests not upon him, but upon Her Majesty's Government. And here it is necessary to remember that there was no change of circumstances which made it necessary then to alter our relations with Afghanistan; for, as I have already shown to your Lordships, the Prime Minister declared, in May, 1876, in the House of Commons, that the relations between Great Britain and Russia had never been more satisfactory.

The first step that was taken in India was to request Shere Ali to receive Sir Lewis Pelly at Cabul. On his declining to do so he was warned in July, 1876, that if he persisted he would isolate himself from the alliance and support of the British Government. My Lords, I consider that that was the turning-point of the negotiations with the Ameer; and we know that three Members of the Viceroy's Council—Sir Henry Norman, Sir Arthur Hobhouse, and Sir William Muir—dissented from the course which was then followed. As some exception has been taken to their conduct in making their dissent known, I must explain to your Lordships that the Government of India is not a government by a Viceroy, but by a Viceroy in Council; that ordinary matters are determined by the majority; and it is only in regard to matters essentially concerning the interests of India that the Viceroy has the power by law to overrule the majority. By statutory rules, framed by the Viceroy in Council under the Government of India Act, Members of Council have a right to express their dissent from any act done by the Government of India. These three Members of Council expressed their dissent at the time. The Viceroy requested them to postpone the formal record of their dissent until a despatch was sent home reporting the proceedings; but, for some reason or other, no despatch was sent home for a great length of time—indeed, until May, 1877, when all three had left India. I do not blame Lord Lytton for detaining the despatch, for I do not know his reasons; and I must add that I do not think it was done for the purpose of preventing the dissents from being recorded: Lord Lytton is an exceedingly able writer, and need not be afraid of answering any objection that might be raised by Members of his Council. But whatever the reason may have been, it is totally contrary to the practice that the course of important affairs should not be frequently reported to the Home Government. As those Members of Council were debarred from the usual opportunity of recording their dissent from the course taken in July, 1876, I have no hesitation in expressing my opinion that when the despatch of the Government of India of the 10th of May, 1877, was made public, they were fully justified in also making public their dissent. If they had not done so, it must have been supposed that they were consenting parties to the policy described in the despatch as having been pursued by the Government of India when they were Members of that Government, and responsible for its action.

To return to the negotiations with Shere Ali. The next important step followed in October, 1876, when the Ameer was plainly told that if he did not receive British officers in his territories he would lose all the protection he had hitherto obtained from England.

At one time it was thought he would not give way; but "owing to helplessness" he said he must agree to the demands of the British Government. He said, in substance, let my Envoy meet Sir Lewis Pelly, explain my difficulties, and if, after this, the Viceroy will not give way I must.

My Lords, I should like to dwell somewhat upon the Conferences at Peshawur, but time forbids it. I have no fault to find with the manner in which Sir Lewis Pelly carried out the instructions which he had received; he certainly carried them out with great determination. He began by telling the Prime Minister that the Viceroy desired to remove some misapprehensions in the mind of the Ameer. The Prime Minister replied that the Ameer had none; and when he was told that these misapprehensions had arisen out of the Conference with Lord Mayo at Umballa, and the communications with Lord Northbrook in 1873, the Envoy said that the Ameer went away from Umballa perfectly satisfied, and that the communications with Lord Northbrook in 1873 were satisfactory also. What weighed most in the Ameer's mind, he said, was the policy of the present Viceroy, which was different from that of previous Viceroys, in forcing the Ameer to receive British officers as Residents in Afghanistan, contrary to the Treaty of 1857 with Dost Mahomed, and to all the "agreements," "writings," and "assurances" he had received from Lord Lawrence, Lord Mayo, and myself. The Conference concluded by Sir Lewis Pelly, at the Prime Minister's request, submitting his objections for the consideration of the Viceroy. Sir Lewis Pelly was then instructed to demand a distinct and prompt answer, whether or no the Ameer refused to receive British officers in any part of Afghanistan? On this point, however, no answer was ever given, in consequence of the death of the Prime Minister. It is a very extraordinary thing that no explanation has been given, why this demand was not pressed further; for it was clear that the object of the British Government was to have British Residents in Afghanistan, and there is reason to believe that, under great pressure, and under great apprehensions, the Ameer would have given way. Indeed, it appears, from the despatch of the Government of India of the 18th of May, 1877, that Lord Lytton knew that another Envoy was on his way from Cabul, who was reported to have "authority to accept eventually all the conditions of the British Government." Sir Lewis Pelly was nevertheless instructed, on the 30th of March, to close the Conference at once.

Something has been said of the conduct of the Ameer at that time as justifying the close of the negotiations. It seems that he had been raising the cry of "jehad," or of a religious war, and using hostile language towards the British Government. My Lords, I am not going to defend this suspicious Ameer, for I think he behaved very foolishly throughout these transactions. But it is only fair to look at the circumstances under which he was then placed. The occupation of Quetta occurred in October, 1876, just at the time when the Ameer was most frightened at the menacing language of the British Government. Preparations were made about the same time at Rawul Pindie to assemble a force; a bridge was thrown across the Indus; and I believe that arrangements were actually made to send a column up to the Kurram Valley, which is on the direct route to Cabul. Besides this, the Viceroy had recently seen the Maharajah of Cashmere, and encouraged him to advance against some territory on the north-east of Afghanistan, over which Shere Ali claimed sovereignty. Nothing is said about all this in the Papers laid before Parliament; but there is no doubt about the facts. They have been stated in Parliament without contradiction. The truth seems to me to be that the poor Ameer could not form any other conclusion than that the British Government were on the point of attacking him, and he turned to every side to see what defence he could make. He found, however, that the people around him did not wish to quarrel with the British Government; and we are told by the Government of India that the whole movement had "completely collapsed" before the close of the Peshawur Conference.

The Conference was closed in March, 1877. When the Viceroy closed the Conference he took away from the Ameer every assurance that he had received of protection and support from Lord Lawrence, Lord Mayo, and myself, either for himself or for his dynasty.

He withdrew our Native Agent from Cabul, and therefore deprived the Ameer of the means of communicating with the British Government; and perhaps the noble Marquess opposite will explain what door was then left open to the Ameer. Neither the noble Viscount (Viscount Cranbrook) nor the noble and learned Earl on the Woolsack have alluded to the real result of the Peshawur Conferences; and the noble Viscount described the position of affairs most inadequately in his despatch of the 28th of November, by saying that we had assumed towards the Ameer a position of "vigilant reserve." My Lords, these were the circumstances of the case. I think the course pursued was not wise. When the Government found that the Ameer was not willing to receive British Residents in Afghanistan, they need not have altogether broken off from him, or have led him to feel that he had nothing to expect from the British Government. If a different course had been taken, and time had been given him, his feelings were such that he would, I believe, in the end, have accepted their terms, however hard he might have thought them to be.

Then came a time of real difficulty, when it was necessary that closer relations should be maintained with Afghanistan. That necessity arose on account of the political condition of Europe, England and Russia having been gradually brought to the verge of war. It would then have been right to have strengthened our relations with the Ameer; but in what position had Her Majesty's Government then placed this country with reference to Afghanistan? By pushing forward demands which were not necessary, contrary to all Indian advice, when there existed no crisis whatever, they had so alienated the Ameer that it would have been almost humiliating then to have made any advances towards him. The Secretary of State (Viscount Cranbrook) used an expression in regard to the state of things in 1873 which is far more applicable to the policy of 1876—namely, that "it was too late." The policy of Her Majesty's Government made it "too late" to make a friend of the Ameer when it was really wanted. It may be said that I ought not to content myself with offering criticisms on the conduct of the Government, but should indicate what I think ought to have been done. I say that if the Ameer had not been frightened about the reception of British Residents in Afghanistan, the moment there was the probability of a war between Russia and England the Viceroy ought to have communicated with him, arranged for a meeting, and offered to enter into an agreement with him similar to that entered into with his father in 1857. I am satisfied that he would have readily accepted such an offer. The policy of the Government, however, prevented that being done; and this, I believe, was one of the main causes of the war.

Then came the last stage of these transactions. The Ameer was alienated from us; he had no hope of support from us; he had no Native Agent of ours at his Court. It was arranged at Simla, in 1873, that if he were asked to receive a Russian Mission he should at once consult the Government of India; but this was impossible, as our Native Agent had been withdrawn. The Ameer had been told that we did not care either about him or his dynasty. When, therefore, the Russian Mission was pressed upon him, as he could look for no protection from us, he had no alternative but to accept it, and it seems that he did so unwillingly. When this was first known, it appears to me that the Government of India rightly intimated to Her Majesty's Government, in their telegram of the 30th of July, that the matter was one which ought to be settled between the British and Russian Governments, and not between the British Government and Afghanistan. When England and Russia were on the verge of war, it is true that neither country could fairly be held to be bound by the arrangements of 1873 or 1875 in regard to Central Asia. But before the Russian Mission reached Cabul the Treaty of Berlin had been signed; and I agree with the noble Earl on the cross benches (the Earl of Derby), that the Government should have dealt with Russia and not with Afghanistan. I believe, moreover, that they might have come to a peaceful and satisfactory understanding with Russia, and have avoided the present war. Russia was asked, no doubt, to withdraw the Mission from Cabul; but I am surprised at the satisfaction expressed by the noble and learned Earl on the Woolsack at the answer received to that demand. In fact, having received no satisfactory answer from Russia, Her Majesty's Government went to war with Afghanistan. I will not dwell on the circumstances connected with the dispatch of Sir Neville Chamberlain's Mission, because from the beginning I can only regard it as a declaration of war.

My Lords, I have trespassed so long upon your indulgence that I shall say no more excepting that I believe this war was unnecessary, and that with the exercise of a little common prudence on the part of Her Majesty's Government it might have been avoided. No advantage, I am convinced, can result from it, either to England or to India; and, holding these views, I feel myself reluctantly obliged to vote for the Amendment proposed by my noble Friend behind me.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, at this hour of the evening I certainly shall not delay your Lordships long by following in detail the able but very minute speech of the noble Earl who has just sat down. But before I touch on one or two of the more important points raised in this debate, I must refer to some observations which he addressed to me in reference to Sir Richard Pollock. If the noble Earl misconstrued the meaning of that despatch I am sorry for it, for Sir Richard Pollock is a very distinguished officer; but, if anyone will read my despatch at a more reasonable hour of the day, I think he will say that the construction which the noble Earl has put upon it is entirely unwarranted, and that the proofs I sought for the assertions I made were derived from the general report of the facts addressed to me by Lord Lytton. The noble Marquess below the Gangway (the Marquess of Bath) has addressed some reproaches to me. He was in some difficulty naturally to find a reason for the vote he is about to give; and he gave as his reason that I had used some language last year which he was pleased to say was not accurate. My Lords, I prefer resignedly abandoning my character in the eyes of the noble Marquess to keeping your Lordships out of bed: therefore, I shall not go into the matter, which I dealt with sufficiently on a previous occasion. I will merely say that the Duke of Argyll asked me certain Questions, which I thought it proper and expedient should be answered. He asked me whether certain troops were assembled to force a Resident upon the Ameer; he spoke of a bridge of boats erected on the Indus to facilitate operations; he wished to know whether there was any departure from a policy which had been adopted by many Indian statesmen, and whether any attempt was being made to force on the Ameer a Resident at the Court of Cabul—"Resident at the Court of a Native Prince" being an expression whose significance is well understood in India. To that Question I gave a negative answer. He asked me for positive information. I told him I could not give positive information; and because, under these circumstances, noble Lords opposite appear to have misunderstood what I intended to say, the noble Marquess and others are pleased to accuse me of disingenuousness. I imagined everyone in this House knew there were many subjects on which the mouth of a Minister of the Crown is sealed, and they cannot always explain fully what their policy is. If I had explained fully what our policy then was I must have explained the reasons on which it was founded; I must have depicted the Ameer as he had been depicted to me—as a faithless, treacherous, intriguing man, whose loyalty we had vainly attempted to secure. The noble Marquess has forgotten that anything said here by a Minister of the Crown is said not merely to this House of Lords and the English people, but to the whole world—to the Czar of Russia, to the Shah of Persia, and to the Ameer of Afghanistan; and if you insist that no answer shall be given except such as contains a complete revelation of the policy of the Government, the only inference I draw is, that in the future no answer at all can be given to Questions of that kind. Now, my Lords, turning to the main matter we have in hand. I thought at one period of the debate that we were getting rid of the study of that interesting question how the Ameer came to be angry. Seeing that he has refused, when asked in perfectly friendly language, to receive a friendly Embassy, places a force outside his own territory, and drives back that Embassy by a threat of rifle shots, it does not, in these circumstances, seem to me to be a matter of much practical importance what the particular cause of the ill-temper or disloyalty was that induced this man to commit an act which was undoubtedly an act of war. If we are to investigate the question, let us compare for a moment the theories that are offered on the other side to account for the change of the Ameer's policy. The theory advanced the other evening was this—that the Ameer was imbued with great loyalty to the British Government, and firmly determined to resist Russia; that he had been deeply impressed by all the civil speeches which successive Viceroy had addressed to him; and that up to the date of the 8th of July, 1876, that feeling of loyalty was unbroken, and the determination in favour of England and against Russia was unchanged. Of a sudden a change came over the spirit of his dream; he altered his whole policy at once, and a Russian Envoy—as we read, for the first time—was received at Cabul. And what was the cause of this wonderful change? Why, that we had proposed to send him, at any time he pleased, and in any part of his dominions he chose to select, a friendly Ambassador. If our ally was really so constituted as that such a cause as that could produce a change in his deepest feelings of affection and long-tryed loyalty, I cannot think he could be an ally about whose temper we need trouble ourselves much. We have heard there is something peculiarly terrible and unknown in the idea of a Resident being sent to Afghanistan. But, my Lords, the State with which the Ameer is best acquainted is that of Persia, which adjoins his own territory, and he knows that Envoys are sent to Persia, and continue to reside there, and that no diminution is thereby occasioned to the Shah's independence or sovereignty. I believe that the idea that the Ameer has any real aversion to the location of Residents on his Frontier is an imaginary one. That he pretended to have it, I quite admit; but as the noble Duke (the Duke of Somerset) said the other evening, when you want to know why a man is angry, you had better ask himself; and the Ameer told us on two occasions what was the cause of his anger. One cause was the very impartial conduct of Sir John Lawrence when he was struggling for his life. Sir John Lawrence had a profound conviction that it was not the duty of the British Government to interfere with the claimants for the Afghan Throne; but he desired to obtain influence over the combatants for the Afghan Throne; and so, instead of leaving them alone according to each changing vicissitude of war, he recognized each candidate as he turned uppermost—always telling him, at the same time, that he had recognized the last who gained a victory, and that he would recognize the next with equal zeal. He went so far on one occasion, not being certain which was likely to be uppermost, as to send an Envoy armed with instructions to offer his facile congratulations to either. We have been told that the Ameer sees English books and newspapers—perhaps he is versed in English literature; if so, I can readily suppose that he must have looked upon Sir John Lawrence as an Oriental Vicar of Bray. What evidence is there as to what his feelings on that occasion were? Here is a record of what passed at the Conference at Umballa. His Excellency urged the Ameer to state the precise mode in which he could help him; but he replied in general terms;—but at last he broke out with great violence that the primary recognition of his rival had been the main cause of his estrangement. But then at the Conference of Umballa Lord Mayo was able to exercise an influence over him by his noble presence and genial mind. What was the next cause of his change of mind? I will accept no other testimony than that of the Ameer himself. If you look in this Blue Book at the speeches to which the noble Marquess has alluded, you will see that the circumstance upon which he dwelt more than any other was the interference of the Government of India between himself and his eldest son. That was the result of Lord Northbrook's intercession. That Lord Northbrook was perfectly justified in the course he took I do not dispute. It was perfectly impossible for any Indian Viceroy to stand by and see such gross cruelty and perfidy perpetrated without interfering. But you must remember that the great danger of the Ameer's race and of his own reign had been civil dissension, and that the one thing he had most to fear was that some member of his family should be set up by his people against him. He saw clearly the Power which loudly expressed its determination not to interfere in his civil affairs coming forward in a crisis of civil dissension to interfere against himself. It seems, therefore, on the Ameer's own showing, we may clearly conclude that what offended him on the part of the British Government was not the offer to send Sir Lewis Pelly at any place or at any time on a friendly Mission into Afghanistan—it was, in the first instance, the conduct observed to him when struggling for his Throne; and, in the second place, our apparent design to renew the civil war by encouraging his eldest son in rebellion against him. Therefore, what your Lordships have to decide is, whether we were justified in the course we took in calling upon the Ameer to allow British officers to be placed at Herat and Candahar? I was very much struck by the noble Earl (the Earl of Northbrook) reiterating again and again that there was no change of policy. If there was no change of policy, why propose to censure us? Of course, there was a change of policy. When we came into Office we found there was practically no information from Afghanistan. The noble Earl asked us to ascertain what was going on on the North-Western Frontier,—which ought to have been ascertained in Asia—and to interfere in Europe in matters which ought to have been settled on the spot. The Ameer had expressed his willingness to receive Residents at any place except Cabul. It is true that the noble Earl entirely denied that fact; but I can hardly take it that he looked at the evidence on which my statement is founded. The circumstance was stated by persons who were more likely than any others to have heard what was the fact. The noble Lord (Lord Lawrence), who spoke the other night, dismissed one of the Residents, Captain Grey, on the ground that he was “an interpreter.” But surely an interpreter who necessarily hears all that is said and translated is precisely the man who knows what is going on. Then there was the friend of the Ameer, Dr. Bellew, and Colonel Burne, the Private Secretary of Lord Mayo, and these men distinctly aver that the Ameer was ready to receive Residents on his Frontier. After that, what is the use of quoting a letter written by Mr. Seton-Karr on the subject? On such a point negative testimony is of no value. There can be no doubt, if evidence is worth anything, that the Ameer was ready at that time to allow Residents to come upon his Frontier. Now, it seems to me that much of the misunderstanding upon this point, and much of the difference of opinion, arise from the fact that the real danger and difficulties we have to encounter in Afghanistan have never been rightly appreciated by Lord Lawrence and Lord Northbrook. The noble Lords have spoken in this debate about military invasion, and they have shown the difficulties that would stand in its way. In what they say I entirely concur. I accept the language used by my noble Friend behind me some weeks back when he said that a military invasion of India was almost impracticable. But it is not so much a military invasion of India that we have to fear; it is a diplomatic invasion of Afghanistan that we have to fear. The noble Earl (Earl Grey) who opened the debate to-night was apparently willing that Afghanistan should become, if necessary, a happy Russian hunting-ground. He was perfectly willing that it should be entirely occupied by Russians, and he had no fear of any results which might follow. My Lords, we are not in secret executive Session—as the Senate of the United States would be in under similar circumstances—and I cannot enter fully and freely into the dangers which Russians established in Afghanistan, and with Afghanistan as their base, working in India as they worked in Bulgaria and in Bosnia, would bring about. In dealing with the Russian Government, you have undoubtedly to make considerable allowances. That Government is not organized as other Governments are. You constantly meet with this phenomenon—that what is done by the Generals or the Ambassadors at one place is not known to the Government at St. Petersburg or by the Generals or Ambassadors at other places. At the very time when General Kaufmann was negotiating with the Ameer, Prince Gortchakoff was denying that anything of the kind was going on. At the very time that the last Mission of which we complained was crossing the Oxus, M. de Giers was saying to Lord Augustus Loftus at St. Petersburg that no Mission was being sent. I know it is the fashion to attribute all these discrepancies simply to dishonesty. I say—and I do so with absolute sincerity—that I do not believe that this is the true explanation; and, if for no other reason—besides the regard I should naturally pay to the honourable character of those concerned—I should say that, if they were inclined to deceit, they would not venture on such clumsy deceit. The truth is that Russia—a vast Empire in which the whole of the cares of the State are thrown on the central Government—is administered practically at the will of one man alone, who, like other men, is subject to interruptions of health, to distractions of business, and who probably finds it difficult to struggle against the work which he has to do; so that that unity of policy which in other countries, where there is a Cabinet of Ministers who meet together and govern in unison, is easily attained, in Russia is difficult to arrive at. The Departments appear to act separately. The Foreign Office does not know what the War Department is doing, and one section of the Foreign Office is not always in communication with another section. I make these observations in order to clear myself from using any language which from all of us would be unfitting—and which would, perhaps, from me be particularly unfitting—in derogation of the sincerity of the Russian Government. But still you have the fact that, whether by orders or without orders, Russian Commanders and Diplomats go forth into any country which borders on any Russian territory and devote themselves to the task of organizing it in Russian interest; they command its armies, they erect its forts, they guide its diplomacy, they shape its councils; and this unauthorized diplomatic invasion is the danger that we had to fear in Afghanistan. Now, it was of no use talking about plunging the whole world in war, as Lord Lawrence said, to cure such an evil as that; it was no use sending home suggestions about remonstrances, as the Government of Lord Northbrook did. Remonstrances at St. Petersburg are of no avail to stop a danger such as that. The only thing would be to have British Agents on the spot to watch and counteract those influences. That was the only remedy that could be applied; and that was the reason why, immediately we saw the state of things which led to the gradual rapprochement of Russia and Afghanistan in consequence of the proceedings of 1873, we selected this particular measure of placing British Residents on the Frontier of Afghanistan, because they could have watched, reported, and counteracted the intrigues which really threatened our supremacy in that country. What was going on all this time? The neighbourhood of Russia—the moral as well as the physical neighbourhood—was increasing. The negotiations were getting more frequent and more warm. The subordinate tone of the Ameer was getting more subordinate; the tone of General Kaufmann was getting more patronizing and more imperious. And all this time we had only a glimmer of the events taking place. There was, as it were, a thick curtain stretched across the Frontiers of Afghanistan, behind which all these intrigues were going on. I have heard something of the Native Agent, and the noble Earl (the Earl of Northbrook) was very indignant because we expressed dissatisfaction at the intelligence furnished by the Native Agent. Why Major Cavagnari and Mr. Thornton, men of the highest experience, admit that the reports sent by the Native Agent were meagre and incomplete; and nothing was put into those reports that had not been previously seen by the Ameer. This was what happened in Cabul to the reports of the Agent we were exclusively trusting. The noble Earl perpetually reminds my noble Friend (Viscount Cranbrook) that he has been only a year in office, and seems to defend himself simply by appealing to the opinions which he himself expressed. He says we have adopted something which is disapproved by everybody who knows anything about India, and that it was strange presumption of us to go against it. Well, if that is the case, every measure to which he and his Government were opposed is approved by Lord Lytton and his Government—and one Government of India is generally as good as another; and I will not allow that the present Government is in any way inferior in experience or talent to that over which the noble Earl presided. Therefore, if the authority is good in the one case it is good in the other. I have shown you that in the evidence of Captain Grey and with respect to the Native Agent, the noble Earl has misunderstood the evidence of the Blue Book. I will only touch on two more points, as the hour is late. The noble Earl says we broke off negotiations suddenly, and left the Ameer no door by which to approach the British Government. The negotiations were broken off, not in anger, but through the death of the Envoy sent. Lord Lytton thought it a good occasion for putting an end to them, because he understood that the Ameer was negotiating with the Frontier Tribes to attack us at the very time negotiations were going on. Those negotiations, let it be borne in mind, were founded on large terms of support offered by us. Was it possible to go on making these offers to the man you knew was arming his subjects against you? But that the door was closed to him is absolutely incorrect. During the whole time, whatever means the Ameer had of communicating with the British Government he still retained to its full extent. It was still open to him to have sent an Envoy of his own. There was nothing to make it either humiliating or difficult for him to do so. Well, then I am told we ought to have gone to war with Russia. Why on earth ought we to have gone to war with Russia? The burden of Mr. Gladstone's speech at Greenwich was that we had not for this and for that gone to war with Russia. Why on earth should we go to war with Russia? Our complaint of the Ameer was that he had not received our Embassy. His excuse for not receiving our Embassy was, first, that the Russians would make it a ground for coming themselves; and, secondly, that Christians could not live safely at Cabul. The Mission of Russia tore into fragments both those excuses. It was obvious that he did not fear the Russians coming, and that Christians could live safely at Cabul. From that moment his excuses disappear. And now by his own showing, without any reason—out of pure hostility and disloyalty, because he was conspiring with others, because he did not wish light to be cast on his proceedings—he refused to receive our Envoy into his territory. It is natural for every man who has done mischief to object to light being thrown on what he has been doing. The excuses raised by the Ameer remind me of the conditions which spiritualist Professors lay down with regard to their claims—namely, that darkness is absolutely essential to the success of their operations. If I were speaking at an earlier period of the night I should have much liked to dissipate some more of the stranger misconceptions of the noble Earl. Now I will not detain your Lordships. I will merely urge your Lordships before you give your vote to consider the gravity of the vote you are about to give. You are endowed by Parliament with the power of refusing or giving Supplies. You have therefore, on this question at all events, the power of deciding whether a Ministry should stand or fall. A Ministry itself is a small thing—it matters little what men sit on this bench—but in this case we represent a cause, and we carry a standard. If this matter is taken out of our hands it must be placed in the hands of others, and you know what policy they will pursue. It must be placed in the hands of those who have found India a burden; of those who contemplate the superiority of America over this country with acquiescence and complacency; in the hands of those who even now advise us to take back our army and allow the Ameer to gain in diplomacy the victory which he has been unable to gain in arms; who would permit the Ameer again to draw down the deep veil that has hitherto concealed his proceedings, and prevented us from penetrating his designs—and who would allow him to pursue beyond the border his intrigues and disloyal designs.

VISCOUNT CARDWELL, who was very imperfectly heard, was understood to express his surprise that the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) should have contented himself with so slight a reference to the speech of his noble Friend behind him, the late Viceroy of India (the Earl of Northbrook), which had so entirely disposed of the whole history of the question at issue; and that he should have thought it worthy of him to pass by the speech of the noble Marquess behind him (the Marquess of Bath) without any attempt at an answer upon the merits. Late as the hour was, he should have thought that such a speech would have been considered to demand an answer—and could not be attempted to be got rid of merely by a sneer. As regarded the letter of the late Secretary of State (the Duke of Argyll), in which he so clearly negatived the assertion that the Ameer had expressed to Lord Mayo his readiness to receive British Residents in his cities, he presumed the noble Marquess could not have correctly heard it. He would, therefore, read it to him again, and commend it to his more careful consideration hereafter. The noble Marquess asked if there had been no change in the policy since the present Government came into Office, why had this Motion been made? The answer was a very simple one. The noble Marquess must have perceived, from the interest with which the House had followed every word that had fallen from his noble Friend the late Viceroy, as compared with the reception they had given to the reply, how complete the statement of his noble Friend had been. The policy, perhaps, had not been changed—for this Government, like all its Predecessors, professed to desire a strong and a friendly Afghanistan, but the mode of carrying the policy into effect had been entirely changed. Every preceding Viceroy, and every experienced Indian officer, had avoided the demand for British Residents in the territory of the Ameer as being the red rag to the bull; but the present Administration had made it the sine quâ non, and had brought about the present war. At that late hour, he would not weaken by repeating the speech of his noble Friend; who had stated with clearness and force the policy which, as Viceroy, he had carried into effect with skill and power. The speech of the noble Marquess was no answer to the statement of his noble Friend; and he was quite satisfied to leave the matter as he had stated it for the judgment of the House.

THE EARL OF BEACONSFIELD: My Lords, the hour is late, but I hope your Lordships will think me justified in detaining you for a few moments. My noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack sketched to us, as it were in allegory, a picture that may give to your Lordships an idea of that North-Western boundary that has been the subject of discussion these two nights. My Lords, I think it is advisable that at this moment some general conception of this scheme should be again put before you. I would picture it, not in allegory, but such as it really exists. That boundary, that North-Western boundary of our Indian Empire, is a branch of a chain of mountains the highest in the world — higher even than the Andes — yet no portion of this Frontier is in possession of the inhabitants of the Indian Empire or the Indian Government, and through its Passes invading armies may make their raids, or wild and turbulent tribes ravage the fertile plains which are entrusted to your Government in that part of the world. Well, then, my Lords, I ventured to say that the inconvenience of such a boundary—the injury which frequently follows such a boundary—were felt by the Government of India, and had been more than once the subject of their consideration. The noble Viscount who moves this Amendment (Viscount Halifax) expressed upon that subject some incredulity with respect to my observations. He told us that he had much acquaintance with the Governors of India, and that he could not recall any Viceroy who had experienced a feeling or conviction of that kind. Well, now, my Lords, let us look for a moment to the facts of the case. We have been in possession of this boundary for, I believe, 28 years. During that period we have been obliged to fit out 19 considerable expeditions to control its inhabitants, have undertaken between 50 and 60 guerilla enterprises, and have employed upon these expeditions between 50,000 and 60,000 of Her Majesty's troops. All I can say is, that if none of the Viceroys of India who are the acquaintances of the noble Lord have felt the inconvenience, or if they have been insensible to the injury of such a boundary, they were not fit to be Viceroys. But I cannot believe that that is the case. My information would lead me to a very different result. The Government of India is not merely the business of Viceroys, but of statesmen—of sometimes eminent statesmen—and sometimes military leaders of world-wide renown. And it was the information which I derived from one of the most eminent individuals of that character and class that authorized me to make that observation which I made. That eminent personage was for a considerable time a Member of the Indian Administration. He was not prejudiced in favour of the views adopted by Her Majesty's Government. For a considerable period, notwithstanding his sense of the inconvenience and the injury of this boundary, he was one of those who opposed any change, because he believed it was better to incur that inconvenience and injury than to embark on the difficult and responsible office of making a fresh boundary and disturbing arrangements in which political considerations were involved. Remembering the possibility of some Power equal to our own attacking us in that part of the world, but remembering also that some 10 years ago that Power was 2,000 miles distant from our boundaries, a man might consistently uphold the arrangement that then existed, and might, by force of circumstances and the lapse of time, be now a sincere supporter of the policy which Her Majesty's Government now recommends. That, for instance, is the case of Lord Napier of Magdala. It was only recently—on the 8th of November—that I received a telegram from him in which he says—"A careful study of our Frontier convinces me that a rectification of our Frontier is necessary." Those are the words of one of great experience and of consummate ability and judgment, who for a long time was opposed to that which he now finds is absolutely necessary. He does not shrink from the use of the word "rectification," although definitions of that word have been given by many noble Lords opposite which are not to be found in any dictionary. The noble Earl who resumed the debate to-night (Earl Grey) spoke of "rectification" of the Frontier as though it were another phrase for spoliation and annexation. ["Hear!"] I expected those cheers, and wished to receive them. Another noble Earl who spoke in the debate yesterday (the Earl of Carnarvon)—I wrote down his words, because, unfortunately, on a previous occasion he seemed to accuse me of misquoting him—said, "I hate the word 'rectification.' It seems to me to savour of the worst traditions of the French Empire—a word to conceal wrong and robbery." A noble Marquess (the Marquess of Ripon), who recently addressed us, described it as a dark word, and he seemed to tremble as he uttered it. For my own part, I cannot agree in any of these definitions. "Rectification" of Frontier, is a correct diplomatic term which is accepted by the highest authorities and which has a precise and a definite meaning. The "rectification" of Frontiers, instead of being a word of the French Empire, has been long adopted, and your Lordships will be surprised to find that the peace of the world very much depends upon Treaties for the rectification of Frontiers. If all the Treaties for the rectification of Frontiers were destroyed as instruments of the terrible kind described by noble Lords opposite and by the noble Earl on the cross Benches (the Earl of Carnarvon), the peace of the world would be endangered, and might be destroyed. Well, my Lords, after that observation the other night, I took a note of some Treaties for the rectification of Frontiers, and I took them on conditions which I am sure your Lordships will all agree are fair. First of all, they are modern—I would not produce old instances. Secondly, they are not only modern Treaties, but Treaties none of which were entered into or negotiated after a war. Therefore, they are not the consequences of force or fraud. Now, I find that from 1856 to 1868—quite in our own time—there were five Treaties between France and Spain for the rectification of Frontiers; and I have no hesitation myself in saying that if those Treaties had not taken place, there would have been war between France and Spain, and that the existence of those Treaties prevented war. Between France and Switzerland there was a Treaty for the rectification of Frontiers in December, 1862—a Treaty of some celebrity—one which was certainly not a dark instrument. It was a Treaty which certainly has contributed to the maintenance of peace. There is a Treaty between Great Britain and France for the rectification of Frontiers—your Lordships may be surprised to find a Treaty for the rectification of Frontiers between an island and a continent; but it had reference to their possessions in the East Indies. That is a modern Treaty. There is a Treaty for the rectification of Frontiers between Italy and Switzerland, and one between Portugal and the Transvaal. The Transvaal is a place of which I believe the noble Earl on the cross Benches has some knowledge. To make it complete, there is a Treaty for the rectification of Frontiers between Great Britain and an Oriental Kingdom—like Afghanistan—the Kingdom of Siam. Now, I believe the number of those Treaties I have mentioned—some dozen—might be doubled or even trebled if it were necessary.

The Earl of Beaconsfield

EARL GREY: Did these Treaties involve any of the States parties to them in a diminution of territory?

THE EARL OF BEACONSFIELD: The observation of the noble Earl deserves remark. A rectification of Frontiers does not necessarily involve a diminution of territory. Many such Treaties are carried out by means of equivalents. I make no application of those Treaties to the case of Afghanistan. I have not touched upon that point yet. The noble Earl is impetuous. It has been said that I stated on a recent occasion the object of the war to be a rectification of Frontier—the substitution of a scientific for a hap-hazard Frontier. Now, in the first place, I never said that was the object of the war. I treated it as a possible consequence of the war, which is a very different thing. Our first application to the Ameer was, in fact, virtually founded upon the principle of rectifying our Frontier without any disturbance of territory whatever. What was our difficulty with regard to Afghanistan? We could gain no information as to what was going on beyond the mountain range—which was, in fact, rather a prison than a Frontier—or what might be preparing in the numerous valleys of Afghanistan. What we wanted, therefore, was eyes to see and ears to hear; and we should have attained our object had the Ameer made to us those concessions which are commonly granted by all civilized States, and which even some Oriental States do not deny us—namely, to have a Minister at his capital—a demand which we did not press—and men like our Consuls General at some of his chief towns. With that we should have been satisfied. It would virtually have been a rectification of our Frontier; because we should have got rid of those obstacles that rendered it utterly impossible for us to conduct public affairs with any knowledge of the circumstances with which we had to deal as regarded Afghanistan. Therefore, the noble Earl is precipitate in concluding that because I am in favour of a rectification of Frontier, and wished to see a scientific instead of an hap-hazard one, that necessarily any change would occur. I only wish to observe that abstractedly there is no absolute necessity for change, because you may rectify a Frontier. And you may rectify it in different ways—by equivalents and so forth. But, my Lords, my observations on that subject in another place were made rather with reference in my mind to certain wild ideas that were then prevalent, to the effect that it was the intention of the Government to invade and conquer Afghanistan and annex it to our Empire. I explained that that was not our object, and that a scientific rectification of our Frontier would effect for us all the results we desired. And, my Lords, what is a scientific Frontier compared with a haphazard one? Why, it is, as a military authority has said, this—a scientific Frontier may be defended with a garrison of 5,000 men; while, with a haphazard one, you may require for its defence an army of 100,000 men, and even then not be safe from sudden attack. It is not for us now to consider what arrangements may be made with this object further than to say that Her Majesty's Ministers, after all that has occurred, will feel it their duty to take care of the security of our Indian Empire. My Lords, whatever may be the objections to the present North-Western Frontier of our Indian Empire, I have little doubt things would have gone on much in the same way—Members of the Indian Administration would have been equally conscious of the deficiencies of that Frontier—and yet so difficult is the task of amending a Frontier, and so great are the obstacles which certainly present themselves, things would have gone on, I dare say, as they had gone on for 28 years, had it not been for the sudden appearance of Russia in the immediate vicinity of Afghanistan. I would, my Lords, speak on that subject with frankness. It is, no doubt, much easier to speak of it now than it would have been a year ago, or eight months ago. Eight months ago war was more than probable between this country and Russia; and an imprudent word might have precipitated that war. At present we know, from the language of the gracious Speech from the Throne, that Her Majesty's relations with all Powers are friendly, and they are not less friendly with Russia than with any other Power. I will say of the expedition which Russia was preparing in Central Asia at the time when she believed that war was inevitable between our country and herself—I will say at once that I hold that all those preparations on the part of Russia were justifiable; and if war had occurred, of course they would have contributed to bring about the ultimate result, whatever that might have been. Had we been in the position of Russia, I doubt not we might have undertaken some enterprize of a similar kind. No doubt there were a great many wild expressions uttered by persons of some authority. No doubt there have been dreams indulged in by individuals which were never realized. I dare say there are Russian officers who would not have disliked to have cooled the hoofs of their chargers in the waters of the Indus; on the other hand, I dare say there were some English soldiers who would have liked to have caught a glance of the Caspian, and to have exclaimed θαλαττα, like the soldiers of Xenophon. We may dismiss from our considerations all these dreams and wild expressions, and admit that if war had occurred between the two countries, all the preparations in Central Asia against Great Britain and India were justifiable; but when it was found that war was not to be made, Her Majesty's Government made becomingly courteous representations to St. Petersburg, and it was impossible that anything could be more frank and satisfactory than the manner in which they were met. The Emperor of Russia said—"It is very true we did intend to injure you as much as we could on your Indian border; but war has not occurred—war, I trust, will not occur between Russia and England. We have already given orders for our troops to retire to their old stations beyond the Oxus; our Ambassador shall be merely considered as a provisional Ambassador on a Mission of courtesy, and as soon as possible he shall disappear." I think that was sufficient and satisfactory conduct on the part of Russia in regard to this matter. But, my Lords, it was totally impossible for us, after all that has occurred, to leave things as they were. After we had found the Russian armies almost in sight of Afghanistan, and their Embassy within the walls of Cabul, we could not go on with the old system and indulge in the fancy that our Frontier was a becoming and secure Frontier in the circumstances. It was, therefore, absolutely necessary to consider what course we should take. My noble Friend who spoke last night from the cross Benches (the Earl of Derby) made a most ingenious speech, marked by all his characteristics. I never was more pleased. I listened for a long time to what seemed a complete vindication of the Government; and remembering it came from an old comrade in arms with whom I had worked for a quarter of a century, who had ever possessed my entire confidence, but who had left me, unfortunately, from circumstances over which, I assume, he had no control, I thought he was making the amends by taking an early opportunity of vindicating the policy of the Government. But before he sat down, all that romantic flutter of the heart which I had experienced entirely ceased when I found that, notwithstanding his approbation of the Government policy, he was going to vote for the Amendment. What surprised me more than anything else was the reason he gave for it—that was, because we did not go to war with Russia. My noble Friend said—"If you acted logically and properly you ought to have gone to war with Russia, and therefore I must vote for the Amendment. You ought not only to have gone to war with Russia, but in regard to Afghanistan you ought to have treated the Ameer with more courtesy and kindness. You ought to have made appeals to him, and taken every step which might gain his confidence and guide his policy." My Lords, that is the very course which we have pursued. Really, the Ameer of Afghanistan has been treated like a spoiled child. He has had messages sent to him; he has had messengers offered to him—he has sent messengers to us, who have been courteously received. We have written him letters, some of which he has not answered, and others he has answered with unkindness. What more could we have done? Yet my noble Friend is going to vote against the Government, because—with, we think, an imperfect conception of our conduct—he says we have behaved harshly to the Ameer, and not taken the proper course of behaving hostilely to Russia. But Russia has taken every step to make honourable amends to England, and her conduct presents the most striking contrast to that furnished by the Ameer. Then there was another point, which at this late hour of the night I cannot dwell upon, but which I will notice, because it has been treated with great misconception. It refers to the financial part of the question—to the expenses. My noble Friend on the cross Benches (the Earl of Derby) has no confidence in our finance. He recalls the instance of the Abyssinian War, and he says that there was an estimate of £3,000,000, and it turned out to be £9,000,000. My noble Friend ought to be well informed on that subject, because it was at his instance and by his advice that we decided upon that war. I believe better advice was never given; a more necessary war was never undertaken. But when that war took place it unfortunately occurred very late in the season, and the Cabinet were of opinion, and were informed by those who were competent to advise them in such matters, that the affair could not be finished in one campaign. But information subsequently reached the Government which convinced them that by great exertions and expense it might be concluded in one campaign, and we did not hesitate to incur that expense, which amounted to a very large sum, and which was chiefly spent in obtaining means of transport. But it was through that expenditure that Lord Napier, in addition to his great qualities and skill, was enabled to conclude the Abyssinian War in one campaign. If you had had two campaigns you would have spent not only £9,000,000, but more. In the second campaign you might have had a very bad season, instead of the very fine season that we had; and you might, instead of savages, have found European officers who would have assisted them in resisting their enemy. But instead of that, Lord Napier conducted the one campaign to a successful issue without, I believe, the loss of a single life. Well, my Lords, the question is—What is the course we ought to take at the present moment? I was in hopes, after the debate the other night, in which no one interfered with those Members of your Lordships' House whose conduct was implicated in the various Blue Books on the Table, that we might have discussed the political character of the question much more fully than we have done, and that we should not be again lost in a series of what I must call wrangles about the conduct of Ministers who are in office and those who are out. If the noble Viscount who has just sat down (Viscount Cardwell) is satisfied with the triumphant speech of the late Viceroy of India, as he describes it, I can only say that it is not a speech which will give to the people of England that knowledge which is desirable, and which they wish to have of the great question at issue. If I am to sum up the three nights' debate which we virtually have had upon this matter, I should say it might be summed up in a sentence, so far as the discussions have gone—we have done something which in theory you approve, and which, if England had acted in time, you would have done yourselves. In a despatch of the noble Earl (the Earl of Northbrook), who addressed us at such length this evening, your Lordships will find this statement—His Government is alarmed by an account that the Russians are going to occupy Merv, and what he proposes is this: He proposes that we should make—I do not know that it was not to be an offensive and defensive alliance—but certainly a defensive alliance, with Afghanistan, and that English officers should be immediately admitted to Herat. What is the difference—

THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK: I never made any such proposal.

THE EARL OF BEACONSFIELD: I am sorry that the noble Earl has the habit of contradicting without appealing to documents. I can give the date to the noble Earl. He will find it in June, 1875. His despatch says—

“Much discussion has recently taken place as to the effect that would be produced by a Russian advance to Merv. We have before stated to Her Majesty's Government our apprehension that the assumption by Russia of authority over the whole Turkoman country would create alarm in Afghanistan, and we think it desirable to express our opinion of the course which should be adopted if it should take place.”

Here it is—

“It would then become necessary to give additional and more specific assurances to the Ruler of Afghanistan that we are prepared to assist him to defend Afghanistan against attack from without. It would probably be desirable to enter into a Treaty engagement with him,” (not merely an assurance but) “a Treaty engagement with him; and the establishment of a British Resident at Herat would be the natural consequence of such an engagement and of the nearer approach of the Russian Frontier.”—[Afghanistan, No. 1, pp. 134-5.]

I appeal to your Lordships whether this quotation does not entirely substantiate my statement as to the policy of the noble Earl, and whether my summary between the policy of the late Viceroy and our own is not correct and complete? I have no objection at any time to be interrupted, and the only reason why I regret it now is that it will add to the few moments during which I shall have to trouble you. I received yesterday a communication from Lord Napier of Magdala, who expresses his regret that he cannot arrive in time to take part in this debate. He says—

“Afghanistan, if in the hands of a hostile Power, may at any time deal a fatal blow to our Empire. We cannot remain on the defensive without a ruinous drain on our resources. Our Frontier is weak; an advanced position is necessary for our safety.

When I am told that no military authority justifies the policy of Her Majesty's Government, I can appeal with confidence to one who, I believe, must rank among the highest military authorities. I will not detain your Lordships, because it is impossible in your exhausted state, having met at an extraordinarily early hour to-day, to enter into any great discussion. What I want to impress on your Lordships before you divide—which you will do in a few minutes—is that you should not misapprehend the issue on which you have to decide. It is a very grave one. It is not a mere question of the Khyber Pass, or of some small cantonment at Dakka or at Jellalabad. It is a question which concerns the character and the influence of England in Europe—and your conduct to-day will animate this country and encourage Europe if it be such as I would fain believe you are determined to adopt. My Lords, I object entirely to this Amendment of the noble Lord. It is an absurd position almost in which to put the House of Lords to come down and appeal to them to stop the Supplies to Her Majesty. If the Amendment is substituted for our original Motion, that would be the inevitable result. I cannot believe that many noble Lords opposite, when they accurately comprehend the issue which is before them, can sanction such a course. They can scarcely have been conscious of the dangerous precipice to which the noble Viscount the Mover of the Amendment is leading them. We have seen in this debate an indignant spirit hostile to these tactics evinced by some of the most eminent members of the Party opposite. The speech of the noble Duke (the Duke of Somerset), which was hailed from both sides of the House, was one which expressed the sentiments which I am sure the great majority must feel. My Lords, what I see in the Amendment is not an assertion of those great Whig principles, which no man respects more than myself. What is at the bottom of it is rather that principle of peace-at-any-price, which a certain party in this country upholds. It is that dangerous dogma which I believe animates the ranks before me at this moment, although many of them may be unconscious of it. That deleterious doctrine haunts and harasses the people of this country in every form. Sometimes it is a committee; sometimes it is a letter; sometimes it is an Amendment to the Address; sometimes it is a proposition to stop the Supplies. My Lords, that doctrine has done more mischief than any I can well recall that have been afloat in this century. It has occasioned more wars than the most ruthless conquerors. It has disturbed, and nearly destroyed, that political equilibrium so necessary to the liberties of nations and the welfare of the world. It has dimmed occasionally even the majesty of England. And, my Lords, to-night you have an opportunity which I trust you will not lose, to brand these opinions—these deleterious dogmas—with the reprobation of the Peers of England.

On Question, That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Motion? their Lordships divided:—Contents 201; Not-Contents 65: Majority 136.

QUESTIONS.

BORNEO—THE BRITISH BORNEO COMPANY.—QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, with reference to the Statements made on behalf of Government on the 8th of April and 20th of June last, that all action in the matter of a cession of territory in Northern Borneo to a British Trading Company had been suspended till the arrival in this country of the promoters of the Company, Whether he is now in a position to supply any further information on the subject; and, whether Her Majesty's Government have now decided whether the proceedings of the Company and the British Representative in Northern Borneo are such as can properly be sanctioned?

MR. BOURKE, in reply, said, that within the last few days a statement of the views of the Company had been submitted to the Foreign Office; but sufficient time had not elapsed to allow Her Majesty's Government to come to a decision on the subject.

TURKEY—PROPOSED GUARANTEED LOAN.—QUESTION.

MR. W. CARTWRIGHT asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether Her Majesty's Government has cognizance of any project involving a loan to Turkey under British guarantee; and, whether he can give any assurance that there is no intention on the part of Her Majesty's Government to entertain a proposal involving such guarantee by this Country to a Turkish loan?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Her Majesty's Government have had their attention repeatedly called to the financial difficulties in which the Porte is placed, and many suggestions have been made to them as to the assistance which England might render. But these suggestions have, for the most part, been of a wholly impracticable character, and the Government have nothing at present before them in a tangible shape. They have deputed a gentleman well versed in accounts to make inquiries into the real condition of the Turkish finances. Every facility has been promised him for making these inquiries, and the Porte has placed him on the Financial Commission which is now charged with the revision of the whole financial system. It is obvious that financial considerations must enter largely into the reforms which Her Majesty's Government are urging upon the Porte, and it is, therefore, essential that they should be well informed. It must not be forgotten that Her Majesty's Government are already guarantors of a portion of the Turkish Debt; but no financial engagements will be entered into without the previous consent of Parliament.

TREATY OF BERLIN—SPEECH OF THE PRIME MINISTER AT GUILDHALL.

QUESTION.

MR. ANDERSON asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, on the 9th November, when the Prime Minister spoke at the Guildhall, the Government had received information of the Czar's assurance of his wish to give all due respect to the stipulations of the Treaty of Berlin, as communicated to the British Embassy by the Russian Minister on the 9th November, but published by Her Majesty's Government here only on the 13th?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I have made inquiries as to the exact time of the receipt of the communication to which the hon. Member's Question refers, and I find that the communication was telegraphed from St. Petersburg by Her Majesty's Ambassador on the 9th of November at half-past 6 in the afternoon, was delivered at the Foreign Office a few minutes before 10 on that evening, and afterwards had to be deciphered—because it came in cypher—at the Office.

Therefore, the Prime Minister was not informed of it when he spoke at Guildhall.

AFGHANISTAN—NEGOTIATIONS WITH THE AMEER.—QUESTION.

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY asked the Under Secretary of State for India, with reference to the Statement made on the 20th April 1877 by the then Under Secretary of State for India, in reply to the hon. Member for the Elgin Burghs, who asked, "Have the negotiations with the Ameer entirely ceased," namely—

"I believe that the Ameer has expressed a wish to carry on negotiations, and the matter is under the consideration of the Government of India."

Whether any such expression of a wish to carry on negotiation was received from the Ameer; and, if so, why no record of it appears in the Papers now laid before Parliament?

MR. E. STANHOPE: I can give the hon. and learned Member no information beyond what is contained in the Papers already laid before Parliament. My noble Friend's answer was given before the despatch from the Government of India was received, and when no official report of it had yet reached us, and it expressed only his own belief in the matter.

AFGHANISTAN—THE AFGHAN CORRESPONDENCE.—QUESTION.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether any Correspondence relating to the affairs of Afghanistan passed between the Secretary of State for India and the Indian Government between February 28th 1876 and May 10th 1877; and, if such Correspondence did pass, whether he is prepared to lay the same upon the Table?

MR. E. STANHOPE: No official Correspondence passed between these dates, except the Reports of the Government of India already published and a few other unimportant Cabul diaries.

TURKEY — REFORMS — THE ANGLO-TURKISH CONVENTION.—QUESTION.

MR. E. JENKINS asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any arrangements have been come to with the Ottoman Porte under the Anglo-Turkish Convention; and, if so, whether he can state the nature of such arrangements; and, when Papers on the subject will be laid upon the Table?

MR. BOURKE: Negotiations are going on with the Ottoman Government with regard to the reforms to be carried out under the Anglo-Turkish Convention; but the state they have reached is not such as to permit of their being published.

AFGHANISTAN AND CENTRAL ASIA—UNDERSTANDING WITH RUSSIA.

QUESTION.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether "the information" which Lord Lytton

"placed before the Indian Council after personal conference, not only with Her Majesty's Government, but also with the Russian Ambassador in England,"

was in writing, or was given only verbally and from memory to the Council in India; in what way it "influenced the consideration," by the Indian Council, of Lord Salisbury's published instructions of 26th February 1876; and, the date of the last understanding between the Russian and English Governments with reference to Afghanistan or Central Asia generally?

MR. E. STANHOPE: The noble Lord can hardly, I think, really expect that I can give him any answer to his first two Questions. We have no information on the subject; and I am quite unable to say in what way the Indian Council were influenced by Lord Lytton's statements, beyond what they themselves explain in their despatch. In answer to the last Question of the noble Lord, I suppose that the last understanding to which he refers is the one of May 11, 1875; but the noble Lord is aware that there has been a great deal of subsequent correspondence on the subject.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU: I asked is that the last?

MR. E. STANHOPE: So far as I know, I believe it is the last understanding.

INDIA—AUGMENTATION OF THE MILITARY FORCES.—QUESTION.

MR. FAWCETT asked the Under Secretary of State for India, If he will inform the House what is the addition to the strength of the Native Army in India which was agreed to by the Secretary of State in Council on Tuesday last; what is the estimated annual cost of such increase; and, whether it is proposed to make any proportionate increase in the strength of the European Army in India?

MR. E. STANHOPE: The addition to the strength of the Native Army in India sanctioned on Tuesday last was about 15,000 men. The rough estimate of the monthly cost is from £22,000 to £23,000. No proposal has come from India for a proportionate increase in the strength of the European Army; but two battalions of Infantry which would have come home in ordinary course have been detained in India, and three garrison batteries have been temporarily added to the Indian establishment.

AFGHANISTAN—THE COUNCIL OF INDIA.—QUESTIONS.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT asked the Under Secretary of State for India, If he could state the day on which Lord Salisbury's Despatch of the 28th February 1876 was laid before the Viceroy's Council; the dates at which Sir H. Norman, Sir W. Muir, and Sir A. Hobhouse respectively ceased to be Members of the Viceroy's Council; and, the date of the withdrawal of the native agent from Cabul after the Peshawur Conference? Also, whether the letters of the Nawab Gholam Hussein Khan of September, 1878, have been sent home; and, if not, whether there is any reason why letters now nearly three months old should not be sent home?

MR. E. STANHOPE: As to the first Question of the hon. and learned Member, I can only say that we have no official information beyond that contained in the 21st paragraph of the despatch of May 10, 1877. Sir William Muir ceased to be a Member of the Viceroy's Council on or about November 6, 1876; Sir Henry Norman on March 18, 1877; and Sir Arthur Hobhouse on the 10th of April, 1877. After the Conferences at Peshawur Atta Ma-homed went to Simla and remained there; but the Agency was not abolished until November 10, 1877. Her Majesty's Government have only in this country telegraphic reports of the letters of the Nawab; but it does not appear likely that there is anything important in the letters beyond what is contained in the telegraphic despatches.

THE RHODOPE COMMISSION. QUESTION.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether Her Majesty's Government place reliance upon the Report of Mr. Consul General Fawcett, their own Commissioner in the Rhodope Inquiry, which is identical with the Reports of the Commissioners of France, Austria, and Italy, to their respective Governments; and, if so, whether they intend to take any and what measures in consequence?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, Her Majesty's Government do place reliance on the Report of Mr. Consul General Fawcett, and in consequence they are considering proposals for the relief of the sufferers; and if they make these proposals to Parliament they will, of course, state the grounds on which they make them: but what I have already stated is this—that the absence of such agreement as would have been shown by a joint Report renders the question of political action one requiring great consideration. I never intended to say, in answer to a Question yesterday—as has been thought by some hon. Gentlemen—that we did not place reliance upon the Report of Mr. Fawcett.

BOARD OF WORKS (IRELAND.)

QUESTION.

MAJOR NOLAN asked the Secretary to the Treasury, If the Government intend to take steps to re-organise the Irish Board of Works, and if the Government purpose to make an announcement on this subject before the Christmas Recess?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON: Sir, the Treasury have not yet decided as to what steps are to be taken, because they are considering the information from the Committee which inquired into the Board of Works in Ireland. The Report deals with a great variety of subjects, and some of the changes which it proposes would require legislation. The subject is under the consideration of the Council, and the House will perceive it will necessarily occupy a certain amount of time; but I hope that when the House meets again I shall be in a position to announce the course the Government intends to take with regard to it.

AFGHANISTAN—THE WAR—NEWS-PAPER CORRESPONDENTS.

QUESTION.

MAJOR NOLAN asked the Under Secretary of State for India, If newspaper correspondents with the Army in Afghanistan are allowed to proceed to the front, and to send letters and telegrams home without restriction; and, if not, what rules have been framed to govern their correspondence?

MR. E. STANHOPE: We have no information whatever on the subject beyond what is contained in the newspapers.

MAJOR NOLAN: I beg to give Notice that on Monday I shall again ask the Under Secretary of State for India a Question with respect to the war correspondents.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE CAPE COLONIES—TELEGRAPHIC COMMUNICATION.

QUESTION.

COLONEL MURE asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether he can give the House any information as to the prospect of telegraphic communication between this Country and the Cape of Good Hope?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: Last Session, in reply to a Question from the hon. and gallant Member, I informed the House that in view of the great necessity of establishing telegraphic communication between this country and South Africa, and the improbability that it would be established by private enterprise within any reasonable time, Her Majesty's Government would be prepared to co-operate with the several Colonies interested in carrying it into effect, and that I had been authorized to inform the Colonial Governments of that decision, and obtain their views. This was accordingly done; and from replies since received, I understand that the Cape Parliament and the Councils of Natal and Mauritius are prepared to guarantee annual subsidies, on certain conditions, for this purpose. These replies are now being carefully considered; but I fear I cannot yet state that it has been found possible to base any definite arrangements upon them. The undertaking is a great and costly one, and some time may yet elapse before all financial and other details can be settled; but I can assure the House that we are fully sensible of the desirability of the early completion of a work which recent circumstances have shown to be so much required.

AFGHANISTAN—THE MISSION TO CABUL—MR. MARSHALL'S DESPATCH.

QUESTION.

MR. GLADSTONE asked Her Majesty's Government, with reference to the Despatch of Mr. Marshall, No. 164, dated 13th September, and received by post on the 18th September, Whether they were in possession of the substance of that Despatch with respect to the Mission to Cabul on any earlier day; and, if so, what day?

MR. BOURKE: Sir, we received a telegraphic despatch from Mr. Plunkett on the 13th of September stating that he had received the Ameer's Note, and he was sending it home, and giving a brief statement with regard to its purport; but that was, of course, superseded by the full despatch.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

THE ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.

ADJOURNED DEBATE. [SECOND NIGHT.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [9th December], "That the said Address be now read a second time."

And which Amendment was,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words

[Second Night.]

"this House disapproves the conduct of Her Majesty's Government which has resulted in the War with Afghanistan,"—(Mr. Whitbread,)—instead thereof.

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

LORD JOHN MANNERS observed, that the hon. Gentleman who introduced the Amendment on this subject wished them to confine themselves to the past, and told them he would refer neither to the present, nor to the future. But the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. E. Foster), who concluded the debate last night, took a somewhat different line. He explained to the House the alternative policy of which, if there were a change of Administration, his Friends would seriously recommend the adoption. The right hon. Gentleman fairly faced a difficulty which the hon. Gentleman who introduced the Amendment shrank from. That policy would be the old, exploded, barren, and useless policy of "masterly inactivity." He (Lord John Manners), proposed to make a few observations, first, with reference to the criticisms which had been made on the policy of the Government; and, secondly, on the alternative policy of "masterly inactivity." He gathered from the observations of the noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition on the first night of the Session, that there was no material difference of opinion between the two sides of the House as to what ought now to be done. The noble Lord told the House that he was prepared to vote all the Supplies which were necessary to bring the existing war to a satisfactory and honourable conclusion. Before he proceeded to make his observations, he would reply to two questions with which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford concluded his observations. The right hon. Gentleman, fixing upon an isolated paragraph in the record of a conversation between Lord Lytton and his own confidential Agent, asked with great triumph: "Are we upon the eve of a second secret Treaty with Russia?" He did not know whether the right hon. Gentleman expected a solemn and serious answer to that question; but if he did, he might rest assured that there had been no secret Agreement or Treaty between this country and Russia on the subject of Afghanistan, and as long as the present Government remained in power he ventured to say there would be none. Should, however, the Amendment before the House be carried, and should right hon. Gentlemen opposite, as a consequence, return to power, what the result would be he did not claim to decide. From their past conduct and language it might not be uncharitable to suppose that overtures of that kind from Russia might receive a somewhat more favourable hearing than they were likely to do so long as the present Government remained in office. The right hon. Gentleman asked another question, also on the subject of Russia. He asked, if we were content with the answers received from the Russian Government as to the Russian Mission to Cabul; and, if so, why did we make the reception of that Mission one of the principal causes of the war? The answer to that question was, that as soon as the Government heard of the reception of a Russian Agent at Cabul, they lost no time in making proper remonstrances on the subject at St. Petersburg; that those remonstrances had been successful; and that the Envoy had been withdrawn. That being so, did the right hon. Gentleman mean to say that we should pick a quarrel with Russia? But, then it was asked why, if Her Majesty's Government and the Indian Government were satisfied with the withdrawal of the Russian Envoy, they had made the reception of that Mission one of the principal causes of their quarrel with the unfortunate Ameer? Now, if the right hon. Gentleman who put that question would read the Proclamation of War he would find that no less than seven causes of war were carefully enumerated, and that the reception of the Russian Mission came sixth in order, and merely led up to the seventh, which was, no doubt, the principal motive which caused the war which was now unhappily being waged. We had not quarrelled with the Ameer because he had received the Russian Mission, but because, having received it with great pomp and unwonted solemnity, when the Indian Government asked him to receive a peaceful English Mission, he not only refused to do so, but refused with insult and violence. He now came to the main charge which was brought against the Government with respect to their past policy, and he really trembled when he thought of the number of quotations which had been made on the previous evening from the Yellow Book. [Ironical cheers.] There were various modes of trembling. He had brought down to the House a number of extracts from it also; but for the sake of hon. Members he hoped he should be able to continue his observations without untying the elastic that was round the volume. Well, the whole of the great charge brought against the Government and which had been supported by such voluminous quotations, was that they had changed what was called the traditional policy of this country with regard to Afghanistan. Now, to that statement he demurred. He contended that, in the true sense of the word, the policy of the Government had not been changed at all. What, he would ask, had been the policy of Lord Lawrence and Lord Mayo and Lord Northbrook? It had been to establish, if possible, on our North-Western Frontier in India, a State which should be strong, friendly, tolerably well-governed, and, in a certain sense, independent. That policy we endeavoured to carry out during many years by the method of what was known as "masterly inactivity." He was not about to say that 10 or 20 years ago that might not have been a very proper method to pursue. All he was contending for was that the change of circumstances, the immense advances which had been made by Russia, and the feeling which from year to year more and more animated the Ameer himself, all necessitated a change in the method of establishing a policy in which statesmen generally concurred. So long as Lord Mayo lived, his personal ascendancy over the Ameer enabled that method to be successfully maintained; but no one could study the records before the House without seeing that after Lord Mayo's death the Ameer began to feel year after year more discontented with his position, seeing the pressure of the Russian advance towards his dominions, more discontented with the position which he occupied with regard to the Indian Government, and more and more pressing for a change of relations between him and that Government. It was true that up to the very last Lord Northbrook was not prepared to admit that the time had come for a change; but he contemplated that at some period the necessity of a change for the purpose of securing an independent ally in the Ameer might arise, his contention being that up to the moment of his departure from India that time had not arrived. Lord Northbrook went further, it having been his opinion that it would not arrive until Russia was in occupation of Merv. Now, that was a position which it was, of course, perfectly competent for any hon. Gentleman in that House to maintain; but it was not the opinion of Her Majesty's Government. They felt that they could not view with indifference the advance of Russia to Merv or to the neighbourhood of the northern boundary of Afghanistan. Their views in that respect were, he might add, shared by the Ameer. Year after year he had been impressing on the Indian Government the necessity of taking more vigorous steps to secure his dominions against the onward pressure of Russia. Time after time, however, those representations had been disregarded by Lord Northbrook and his Government; and at last the Ameer, as it seemed to him, in despair, recognizing the fact that the Indian Government did not share in his apprehensions, and were preaching their unlimited belief in Russian goodwill, apparently prepared to throw himself into the arms of Russia. That being the state of the case, when Lord Salisbury came into office the feelings of the Ameer had been still further injured by Lord Northbrook's interference on behalf of his son, Yakoob Khan. Lord Salisbury accordingly instructed Lord Northbrook to attempt, by a more vigorous policy, to recover the lost confidence of the Ameer, and to improve the relations which existed between the two Governments. Now, all through the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford it had been assumed that Lord Salisbury's instructions and those given to Lord Lytton were hostile to the Ameer. He would, however, venture to say that that was a complete misapprehension and mis-statement of the facts of the case. It was to cement and strengthen the relations between England and Afghanistan that Lord Salisbury desired. The Ameer had for years been pressing a particular point on the attention of the Indian Government, and Lord Salisbury's instructions were that those points on which the Ameer had laid so much stress should be conceded with the natural and proper condition that the Indian Government should have the power of verifying the real facts of the case. Lord Northbrook was, therefore, instructed to make the proposal to the Ameer, that if he would consent to the establishment of a British Agent at Herat, the objects which he had at heart should be substantially complied with. Lord Northbrook gave the reasons why, in his opinion and that of his advisers, that course should not be taken, and it was not carried out during the remainder of his Vice-royalty. Then Lord Lytton went out with full and complete instructions and information on the subject; and what, he would ask, could have been more friendly than Lord Lytton's mode of acting upon those instructions? Lord Lytton, in the first instance, proposed that the Ameer should receive an Agent at Cabul to discuss the matters to which he had referred. On the Ameer's declining that proposal, Lord Lytton was not betrayed into any act of animosity, but accepted the counter-proposal of the Ameer, which was that his own confidential Prime Minister should go to Peshawur and there discuss and consider the important subjects of deliberation. Surely that argued no animosity on the part of Lord Lytton to the Ameer. The Prime Minister was in the confidence of the Ameer, and nothing could have been more considerate than the arrangement made. What had happened? Lord Lytton had made it perfectly and distinctly understood by the Ameer that unless the primary condition of his acceptance at Herat of an English Agent was conceded, it would be impossible that the large boons he requested should be granted. That was the basis of the negotiations. Three weeks were consumed by the Prime Minister of the Ameer in a very long statement of his master's wishes; but not a single step was gained towards the primary condition on which the whole Conference was based. At the end of that period the Prime Minister died, and Lord Lytton naturally thought it best to close the Conference. Enough had passed to show that there was no sincere intention on the part of the Ameer to come to any conclusion whatever, seeing that three weeks had elapsed and the preliminary condition had not even been assented to; so that the Indian Government could not but fall back on the status quo and terminate the Conference. Upon that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford had seemed to think that the Ameer had some considerable grounds for his discontent, and had been deprived, by the action of the Home Government, of certain securities for which he thought he had a right to look. He could not quite understand how the right hon. Gentleman established that proposition. He had read a paragraph in a very remarkable way, so as to omit the statement and to quote the consequence. He was able to supplement the omission, and to give the extract as it really occurred. It was in a despatch of Lord Salisbury's, summing up the whole subject; but the following preceded and governed the passage quoted by the right hon. Gentleman:—

“His Highness has now been informed in unmistakable language that under the terms of the Treaty of 1855—which alone of the two Treaties contracted between the British and Afghan Governments has a character of perpetuity—the British Government has incurred no liabilities whatever on his behalf; and it has been distinctly intimated to him that neither by Lord Mayo in 1869 nor by Lord Northbrook in 1873 was any assurance given of unconditional protection, nor any obligation contracted towards him which was not dependent on his future conduct towards the British Government and his own subjects.”—[Afghanistan, No. 1, pp. 223-4.]

That showed that what Lord Salisbury had said was that the Ameer had then learnt distinctly what was in the minds of Lord Mayo and Lord Northbrook; and that throughout the whole of the Correspondence the Ameer had previously had an impression of obligations on the part of the British Government much larger than they were willing to admit. So, instead of the Conference at Peshawur being unfavourable to Shere Ali in its results, it was genuine kindness to him to show him the true facts of the case and his real position. And apart from that, anyone would fancy, from the speeches that had been made, that Lord Lytton was hostile to the Ameer, while, in fact, from the moment the Conference was terminated, no part of his conduct was so in the least degree, either in word or deed. The Ameer was left perfectly free to conduct the affairs of his territory in any way he chose, and neither by Lord Lytton nor by any one else was the slightest pressure put upon him.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR: Will you tell us when Quetta was taken and occupied? ["Order!"]

LORD JOHN MANNERS: But what had that to do with the question? Did the hon. and gallant Gentleman not know that in occupying Quetta we were acting under our Treaty rights and wanted no permission? He had really been surprised at such a suggestion from so learned an Indian pundit as the hon. and gallant Gentleman. He contended that for 14 months the Ameer suffered no pressure either from Lord Lytton or the Government, and he might have gone on in the ordinary way for a considerable period, had not a Russian Mission made its appearance at Cabul, and had not he, for reasons of his own, accorded to it an ostentatious welcome, and received it with unwonted solemnity. What was the Indian Government to do? He now came to the alternative policy, which, he supposed, hon. Gentlemen who had supported the Motion would be prepared to undertake. But what was the Indian Government to do when the Mission had been received in the manner he had described? Were they to do nothing? He heard no response from the front Opposition benches to that question. A sudden silence seemed to pervade those benches. Or were they to rest content and wait? Was the policy of "masterly inactivity" to be followed on such an occasion? If the Indian Government were not justified in waiting, and if some action was required on their part, what action, he asked, was it right to take? He ventured to argue that the course adopted with the sanction of the Home Government was a friendly and not a hostile course. A distinguished soldier, who was well known to and highly appreciated by Shere Ali, was selected as the head of the Mission, and no effort was spared to give the Mission an amicable character. The escort, moreover, was cut down to the very lowest point compatible with the dignity of the Envoy and the safety of the Mission itself; and letters were written to the different officials on the road in order to avoid even the possibility of a collision. That being the character and purpose of the Mission, how was it received? As all know, with violence and insult. He asked, again, what would the critics of the Indian Government and the censors of the Government at home have done had they been in the same position? The Mission, he repeated, was rightly sent; and though it came with a friendly object, its rejection was accompanied with insult and violence. Was the Envoy of Her Majesty the Queen of England and Empress of India, and the Representative of the Viceroy, to wait outside the gates of Ali Musjid until it pleased the Ruler of Afghanistan to admit him to his gracious presence? Was he to be, like Charles XII. at Bender—

"Condemned, a needy suppliant, to wait
While ladies interpose, and slaves debate?"

Was that the answer the Opposition were prepared to give? Well, after this insult and violence had been perpetrated, was the next manifestation on the part of the Indian Government one of hostility? He might answer, quite the reverse; for a considerable period was given to the Ameer to reflect upon his conduct and upon the impropriety of the steps he had taken. Did Gentlemen opposite condemn that; and were they going to pass a Vote of Censure on the Government because they afforded the Ameer time to reply to the remonstrance against his insulting conduct? To resume; the time of grace having expired, the Government felt that the necessary consequence was an expedition to enforce submission to their modest and reasonable demands. Was the Government going to be condemned for having, after so much pains and forbearance, vindicated by the only legitimate means left to them the honour and dignity of the Crown of England? That being so with respect to the past, he felt confident that the House would reject the Vote of Censure moved by the hon. Member for Bedford; but he appealed to the House with ten times more confidence when that Vote of Censure was coupled with the future policy of those who would succeed to power. What was it the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford told the House? He did not know whether the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington) gave the right hon. Gentleman authority to speak in his name, or if it was a voluntary effort on his own part; but one who filled so important a position in the councils of Gentlemen opposite must be taken to speak on behalf of the whole of the Opposition. The right hon. Gentleman told them that after all these steps had been taken—after the war had progressed and been brought to a satisfactory and glorious issue—he was prepared to recommend that the Indian Government should fall back into the old beaten groove of “masterly inactivity,” and trust to the chapter of accidents to recover or not recover our influence at Cabul.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I am sorry to interrupt the noble Lord, but he has not given a fair account of what I said. It was this:—That I thought, speaking for myself, the Government ought to return to the old policy, and I defined that as, first, to try to convince the Ameer that it was neither our interest nor our wish to take from him his territory or deprive him of his independence; and, secondly, to convince him that it was our interest and intention to guard him against any unprovoked aggression of Russia or any other Power. I said that that was my definition of the old policy; and that what I considered the new policy brought in by the present Government was that they assured the Ameer of protection against Russia solely upon conditions, which he considered—and considered rightly—would destroy his independence.

LORD JOHN MANNERS replied that this was precisely what he meant to summarize under the title of “masterly inactivity.” He wanted the House to understand this clearly, and also that when he spoke of the old method as being exploded, he did so on the authority of men of great weight. In the course of that debate the opinion of Sir Henry Norman, of Sir William Muir, and of Sir Arthur Hobhouse and others had been quoted against this view. But every person of authority on these matters did not agree with them. The old policy had been condemned not only by the facts of the case, but also by men of high authority. In Lord Lytton's despatch of May 10, 1877, occurred these words—

“Whilst still alive to the difficulties and risks inseparable from any attempt to enter into closer and more responsible intercourse with a barbarous neighbour so suspicious, discontented, and untrustworthy as Shere Ali, we certainly could not regard with unconcern the increasing inconvenience, and possible peril, of the extremely ambiguous and uncertain character of our existing relations with him. It was impossible to deny that the practical results of the Afghan policy, patiently pursued by us for several years, were far from satisfactory.”—[Ibid. p. 165.]

This despatch was signed by Sir E. C. Bayley, Sir A. J. Arbuthnot, and Sir A. Clarke, who had in the previous year signed the Minute approving Lord Northbrook's despatch. He remembered that the hon. Gentleman the Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett), in the course of a speech some time ago, had made a point of the opinion of Lord Napier of Magdala, as being unfavourable to the policy of the present Government. Well, on page 226 of the Blue Book he held in his hand, Lord Napier of Magdala's opinion was given in these words—

“Our policy of masterly inactivity, or rather of receding from every difficulty until what were matters easy of suppression have grown into serious dangers, has continued too long, and if it is maintained will lead us to disaster.”

He thought that on such authorities as these he was justified in saying of the policy to which the right hon. Gentleman would have the country return, that it was a policy condemned both by the facts of the case and also by the authority of some of the greatest living statesmen and Generals of India.

MR. FAWCETT rose to disclaim having misquoted the words of Lord Napier of Magdala.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he did not accuse the hon. Member of misquoting Lord Napier's words, for the Book containing them had not at that time been published. Many years ago the policy of masterly inactivity might have been good and proper; but wise men did not adhere in a bigoted manner to opinions formed in one condition of things when the circumstances had altogether changed. What did the right hon. Gentleman do? He asked the House not only to censure the past policy of the Government, but to place on record their approbation of a recurrence to this condemned policy, and that at a moment when the lives of our gallant British, Irish, and Native Indian soldiers were being risked, when feats of the greatest heroism and endurance were being performed. At such a moment the right hon. Gentleman said to them and the world at large—"Never mind what sacrifices are made, what victories gained, they shall all end in nothing; we will turn back to the old exploded views of 30 years ago; and we will in that manner humbly hope that the Ameer will at some time or other—we can't presume to indicate when—think better of his conduct and graciously permit us to look upon Afghanistan as a real protection in future to the advances of Russia." Surely neither the House nor this country would never sanction such a policy. If they were asked what end the Government placed before them, they would reply—"We must prosecute this war until the Ruler of Afghanistan makes due submission; and then we shall be prepared to grant terms as moderate and as generous as would be consistent with the inviolability, the security, and the peace of our Indian Frontier."

MR. GLADSTONE: I wish to advert for a moment to the closing sentence of the speech of the noble Lord. He says he will prosecute the war until the Ruler of Afghanistan makes due submission. He has bound himself by that pledge in the face of the country. But suppose, Sir, the Ruler of Afghanistan does not make due submission? The Rulers of Afghanistan do not always make due submission. They have a habit of disappearing. Suppose Shere Ali, without making due submission, disappears from the scene of your military operations: what is the noble Lord to do then? He is, I presume, to keep an army of occupation in Afghanistan. How long is he to keep that army there? Quarrels with Afghanistan are not apt to reach a very speedy conclusion; and I think that if the noble Lord saw fit thus liberally and generously to give us his future intentions, he ought to have contemplated an alternative which is perfectly possible, and which, if we are to judge from the case of Dost Mahomed, might even be more probable than the due submission he contemplates with so much complacency. Now, Sir, the noble Lord assumes to himself two privileges, which undoubtedly very greatly facilitate his task. In the first place, he thinks himself entitled to ask of hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House not only in what respect they differ from and condemn the general features of the policy of the Government, but when the Government have entangled themselves by their own errors and misdeeds—in consequence of which we have had to travel over the ground of a multitude of embarrassing situations at every stage, produced by those errors—he thinks it fair to turn upon hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House and say—"What would you have done then?" No doubt the ingenuity of the noble Lord suggested to him that he should fall back upon that. But the noble Lord puts forward another claim, the justice of which I must contest. He claims not to be compelled to refer to the Papers laid upon the Table of the House. ["No!"] I beg pardon—what the noble Lord said was that he would not remove the india-rubber band with which those papers were bound; and he delivered to us a lengthened narrative of the proceedings of the Government, which was not supported, as it should have been, from point to point, by proofs drawn from these Papers. That, therefore, is a claim which I cannot assent to. No doubt it suited the purposes of the noble Lord that he should make that claim, and insist upon it; and that upon only one or two occasions should he furnish us with even so much as a thread of proof of any assertion he made. Our course is a very difficult one. The noble Lord taunts us with going back—that is, with going back to the evidence. It is true that we do not put forward unsupported assertions but with as much care and caution as our unfavourable circumstances and conditions will admit. ["Hear, hear!"] Yes; I thank the hon. Member for that cheer. I thank him for admitting that we do occupy an unfavourable position, when five days before a debate of this character commences, when five days before the speech from the Throne, we are saluted with 500 closely-printed pages of documents and are invited to pass judgment upon them. But, short as the time has been for mastering the Papers, I shall not follow the easy mode of dealing with them of the noble Lord the Postmaster General. In fact, I cannot follow his example and allow the Papers to remain tied up in their tape. On the contrary,

[Second Night.]

Sir, I shall have to refer to these documents; and, more than that, I shall have with great reluctance, but with great deliberation, to impeach those documents. I shall have to point to them as containing the most gross mis-statements of fact—I will not say such as raise the suspicion of wilful untruth, because it is far from my mind to impute that to anyone—but mis-statements of fact involving a reckless negligence, of which, so far as I know, there has been no example in connection with a subject of Imperial policy ever before in my experience presented to Parliament. That is a startling assertion, and I am not going to ask you to accept it until proved. I will, in the first place, refer briefly to the observations of my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain). My hon. Friend said that he could not have voted for any Motion which would have confined the debate to the merits of the war and which would not have included the manner in which Her Majesty's Government had acted on this occasion with reference to the privileges and the rights of Parliament. I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. I certainly could not have voted for any Motion as one adequate to the occasion which did not leave it open to us to comment upon the conduct of Her Majesty's Government in denying to Parliament its proper position. As far as I know, the concealment practised by Her Majesty's Government upon this occasion is alike without precedent and without excuse. For two years and a-half a policy has been deliberately carried on by Her Majesty's Government, and the nature of that policy has been kept back with the utmost care from the knowledge of Parliament. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer says—and I really was surprised to hear him say it—that he apologized for the late appearance of these Papers, on the ground that there was such a number of them, and that it was very difficult to prepare and arrange them. The right hon. Gentleman speaks of them as though they had resulted from the transactions of the last few weeks; whereas, in fact, they are the result of transactions which have been spread over a series of years, and the major portion of them have been in the possession of Her Majesty's Government for a long period. I ask, is it right that Parliament should have been kept in the dark so long on this subject? Is there any reason why these Papers should not have been laid before us long ago? I can understand that there are many occasions, when diplomatic or executive steps are being taken, when it is fitting that Papers of this character should be kept back; but there are many stages in the course of such negotiations when a fresh start is made, and when all reason for keeping back such Papers ceases to exist. I take it that such an opportunity for producing these Papers occurred at the time of the total change of the Government policy which followed upon the solemn Conference at Peshawur between Sir Lewis Pelly and the Prime Minister of the Ameer. I ask whether, when Her Majesty's Government resolved upon that total change of policy, they should not have communicated that fact to Parliament? All that Her Majesty's Government did at that time, however, was to say that there was no change in their policy. How happened it, I ask, that Parliament being prorogued on the 16th of August last, the Mission to Afghanistan was despatched on the 19th? That was the crown and consummation of that policy of concealment from Parliament which has marked the conduct of the present Government; and which in the case of the Anglo-Turkish Convention did so much to endanger the continuance of the Treaty-making power of the Crown and to jeopardize the Prerogative of the Crown to make peace and war. I will not enter into that point, however, upon the present occasion. My belief is, that they have broken the Statute; and, at the proper time, I shall be prepared to give my reasons for that belief. I am now going to call the attention of the House to what I believe to be a very grave matter, and that is the total untrustworthiness of the allegations of fact contained in the most important documents in the Book which has been presented to the House. I do not refer now to the famous paragraph 9 in Lord Cranbrook's despatch, in which the art of saying one thing and of suggesting another has been carried to such a pitch of perfection that I doubt whether the future, with all its development, will ever be able to improve it. I hope that the noble Lord will begin to remove his elastic band now. In order that there may be no mistake, I say that I impeach the trustworthiness of the allegations of fact contained in the despatch from the Government of India, dated the 10th of May, 1877, and in that equally important Paper read by Sir Lewis Pelly to the Envoy of the Ameer at Peshawur in November, 1877. I take first the despatch of the Government of India. Of course, it is an essential part of the case of Her Majesty's Government that the Ameer had a great and growing stock of grievances against the Government of India at the time of the departure of Lord Northbrook; and in this despatch, which will be found at page 167 of the Papers, it is stated that the Indian Government had discovered that the Ameer had four special classes of grievances. First of all there was the grievance relating to Yakoob Khan; the second was that which related to the Seistan boundary; the third was with reference to the Chief of Wakhan; and the fourth was that which was involved in our refusing to conclude a defensive alliance with him. Let us turn to the source of the account of the grievances of the Ameer. Now that we have got the Papers we know what were the materials upon which they founded that statement. They had before them two accounts of the grievances of the Ameer, and the account that they have given does not correspond with the other. Those two accounts are very different in authority and value. One of them was a report by our Native Agent. It purported to be a statement of the Ameer. He did not say that he knew the grievances of the Ameer. It was only upon being hard pressed by the Viceroy or by the Agents of the Viceroy—I do not recollect which—that he would consent to give an account of what he thought were the grievances of the Ameer, so that in truth the opinion he gave was only his own opinion of the grievances of the Ameer. Perhaps this may be doubted, and I would therefore read from the Book the authentic record—

“Being pressed to explain more in detail the views or wishes which the Ameer expressed at his interview, the Agent repeated that the Ameer had no further wishes than those already on record, and deemed that a renewal of the request for their fulfilment would lead to no solid result, as nothing had come of his previous efforts. The Agent was then requested to state in particular his own estimate of the feelings and causes which had estranged the Ameer from the British Government, and had induced His Highness to object to the reception of a complimentary Mission. The Agent replied that he could not pretend to be acquainted with all that passed in the mind of the Ameer on the above subjects; but as far as he could ascertain them the grievances were as follows.”—[Afghanistan, No. 1, p. 180.]

Then he goes on to repeat, not four special causes of grievance, according to the doctrine of the despatch of the English Government, but eight causes of grievance, with no speciality at all marked out among the eight, and to say that these eight were among the causes of complaint which the Ameer may have resting upon his mind. That was the inferior source of information to which the Government resorted, and even that they could not state with decent accuracy, for they mis-stated the number of the grievances and they mis-stated the specialities. The truth is—and I challenge contradiction—that they set forth four grievances when there were eight, and they stated that there were four special grievances, while the Agent stated that there was no speciality whatsoever. The Government had before them at this time another statement of the Ameer's grievance, which was of a very different character—a statement made by the Prime Minister of the Ameer himself in writing directly and authoritatively from the Ameer when he met Sir Lewis Pelly at Peshawur. And what was the case then? He gives them only four grievances—only the list does not include that which the Indian Government hoped as the special and great grievance—namely, the refusal of an offensive and defensive alliance. They resort to an inferior authority, because that inferior authority does give them, among the grievances, that one specially marked. They pass by without any note the authentic statement of the Ameer's grievances. [An hon. MEMBER: Give the page.] Page 206. Why do they resort to the inferior authority and pass by the superior? Listen to the list of grievances made by the inferior authority. He had received no reply to a Paper about some Kalut Chiefs; then the affair of Yakoob Khan, and the arbitration of Seistan. So that, according to the statement of the Ameer's Minister, this great and special grievance of the refusal of the defensive and offensive alliance does not appear in the list at all. According to the intention of the British Government, resorting to inferior authority they obtain that which they wish to bring out. ["Oh, oh!"] What I say is this—I do not suppose that these gentlemen were conscious of what they were about, but that is the observation—that they did give the statement of an inferior authority inaccurately, and pass by the statement of the superior authority; and the statement of the superior authority does not contain that one point that it is material for Her Majesty's Government to make—namely, that the Ameer has a grievance, that being, the refusal of former Viceroys to grant him an offensive and defensive alliance. Well, that is the case. I will mention another point, which is certainly a small one, but goes to prove the reckless carelessness with which the Papers were compiled. On page 170 you will find that owing to the Envoy's increasing ill-health several weeks were occupied in the delivery of his long statement. What a statement, that it occupied several weeks in the delivery! The fact is the statement was begun on the 8th of February, and was closed on the 12th of February, and the official statement says it occupied several weeks. I will pass from this point of minor importance to one which I regard as by no means possessing that character. In that famed despatch of the 10th May, 1877, paragraph 32, there is a long series of charges brought forward against the conduct of the Ameer. You will find in paragraph 33 that Sir Lewis Pelly

"Demanded from the Envoy an explanation of the reported hostility of the Ameer's language and conduct, at a time when the representative of His Highness was still engaged in friendly and pacific negotiation with the British Government."—[Ibid. p. 170.]

You would suppose from that Sir Lewis Pelly had demanded an explanation of the charges which had been laid before the Viceroy, but which we now know were not in the statement of the Ameer at all, and he never had had an opportunity of being heard upon them as they stand in that despatch. Sir Lewis Pelly made a quite different appeal to the Prime Minister of the Ameer and, in fact, only touched upon one of the eight raised in the preceding paragraph of the despatch. Is it tolerable, I ask, that these gross inaccuracies upon vital parts of the proceedings are to be made the basis of the official case which we are called upon to criticize and answer? That may be the view of the noble Lord; but it is not the view of those who think a judgment in a case of this kind ought to be based upon evidence. In the beginning of paragraph 34 the Envoy replied that—

"The reports which had reached us of the Ameer's utterances and proceedings were, he trusted, much exaggerated; he feared, nevertheless, that since his own absence from the Cabul Durbar His Highness had fallen under mischievous influences which he himself deplored and condemned; he would lose no time in addressing to the Ameer strong remonstrances on the subject."—[Ibid.]

I ask Her Majesty's Government to refer me to an authority for one word of that statement. Where is it? "There is great silence on the opposite Benches," to use a phrase of the noble Lord; but as the noble Lord has doubtless studied these Papers, perhaps he or any other Member of the Government will give me a single passage in support of the statement. Some new Papers were produced yesterday, and in these new Papers there is an appeal made by Sir Lewis Pelly, which does not in the slightest degree correspond with the description of the misconduct alleged by the Viceroy, and there is also the answer of the Ameer's Envoy to the appeal. The Envoy's answer is on pages 12 and 13 of these Papers. I ask you to give me one word out of that answer which supports a single assertion of the Viceroy as to the answer given.

MR. E. STANHOPE: I distinctly challenge the statement of the right hon. Gentleman, and state that in the letter will be found distinct authority for that statement.

MR. GLADSTONE: Read it. ["Order!"]

MR. E. STANHOPE: I will not read it.

MR. GLADSTONE: You will not read it! Oh, yes; but I have seen you ready enough to read—"Order, order!" Well, I am desirous to know, and hoped references would have been given me to a portion of that letter. Will anyone give me those references? [An hon. MEMBER: No.] No; no one will do that. I have, as the House knows, read to you frankly the statement of the Viceroy which I challenge; and I ask that it may be proved or withdrawn—as, if it can be proved, it establishes a great portion of his case against the Ameer. You produce what you call your authority; and, so far as our best energies go to read and study, there is not one word to support the statement of the Viceroy, and you are not able to refer us to one passage that supports it. The substance of that Paper is that evil rumours are in circulation; that news letters are not to be believed; that he knows nothing of any of those statements; and it is a general protest to the effect that to entertain such statements upon such slight and worthless evidence is contrary to the friendship between States. There is a great regard for Order, and no one will read anything in my speech; but I hope the Gentleman who next rises to speak on behalf of the Government will read again that most important passage from the despatch of the Government of India which I have read, and those most important assertions which it contains, and will show us how those assertions are supported from any Papers now on the Table. I think I have laid something before the House with regard to the reckless negligence with which this Paper has been compiled. I am now going to refer to another Paper, in which the proceedings are in no degree less extraordinary, and that is a very important one, which is attributed to Sir Lewis Pelly, but which appears to be the production of the Indian Government. It is the answer to the statement of the Ameer. I must use the name of Sir Lewis Pelly; but I wish to add I have not a word to say against the accuracy of Sir Lewis Pelly. This was a Paper supplied to him, so far as I can see; and I place no mark of carelessness or of inaccuracy against him. It appears to me this is a genuine production of the Government of India, and it bears the same character of reckless assertion which I have already proved upon the despatch of the 10th of May; and here I may say that if I have not dwelt upon other cases it is not that there are none to dwell upon, but I think I have quoted enough to the House. Now, in this Paper of Sir Lewis Pelly there is a sort of indictment brought against the unfortunate Minister of the Ameer; and I must say, that while the language of Sir Lewis

Pelly appears to be usually courteous and kindly, the language of this indictment of which he was the vehicle and the mouthpiece does not deserve such a description. On the contrary, it is discourteous almost to the point of vulgarity. But I will deal with two of the assertions. Two things are said—

“The British Government has never desired or attempted to re-open the question of appointing a British officer to reside at Cabul.”—[Ibid. p. 215.]

And yet, though they never attempted to re-open that question, they complain that the Envoy talked about that and nothing else. With regard to the desire not to re-open the question, that is not a very accurate statement. Sir Lewis Pelly's instructions are full of injunctions to re-open the question. It was proposed to bind the Ameer by Treaty to receive an Envoy at Cabul as often as an Envoy was required; but the statement that the Envoy had incessantly discussed this question—which is made a ground of complaint against him—is totally without foundation. The Envoy never discussed it at all. I have read through these long statements with all the care I can; but again I ask Her Majesty's Government to point me to any one sentence of the statement of the Envoy in which he discusses the proposition that a Resident should be sent to remain permanently at Cabul. I believe there is no such passage from beginning to end. But what am I to say of the second accusation made against him? It is this—that while he discussed the question not before him, he carefully and studiously avoided discussing the question that was before him—namely, receiving British officers on the Frontier. I must here quote Sir Lewis Pelly's words—

“You have carefully avoided all reference to the reception of British officers in other parts of Afghanistan.”—[Ibid.]

And again—

“You have left altogether unnoticed the proposals which are the only ones your Excellency is authorized to discuss.”

That is a very remarkable allegation—that the Envoy had entirely declined to discuss the proposal of the Viceroy, which was that British officers should be placed on the Afghan Frontier. It is totally untrue. [A laugh.] The gallant Admiral (Admiral Edmonstone)

laughs. He frequently does laugh. He is an experienced Member of this House, and he is one who opens his mouth oftenest. But perhaps the gallant Admiral has not read these Papers. Perhaps not; but I will give him information which, with his intelligence, he will value. While Sir Lewis Pelly is instructed to say that the Envoy nowhere touched the subject of placing British officers on the Frontier of Afghanistan, there are 11 passages in which he distinctly and expressly discusses this matter. If you are disposed to question my statement—and I think you should question it—I will give you all the passages. You will find them at pages 200, 202, 207, 208—four times over—211, 212, 213—twice over—making 11 in all. Really this is a most extraordinary method of the transaction of public business. The Envoy of the Ameer is arraigned for a kind of insolence—and he is arraigned with something approaching it—in discussing that which he never discussed at all, and in avoiding the discussion of a matter which he frequently discussed. After saying that, I ask the House whether I am justified in challenging the trustworthiness of these official Papers? That despatch of the 10th of May, from which I have quoted such gross mis-statements, is the very despatch which receives from Lord Salisbury the cordial approval of Her Majesty's Government, and especially for the "patience and discrimination" with which it handled the subjects to which it referred. I do not know what to suppose about the Members of the Government. I ought to suppose that they have studied this Conference at Peshawur fully. If so, have they discovered these things? If they have not discovered them, why not? And why is Parliament, which has nothing to go upon but this information, produced after two years and a-half, entertained with documents that are absolutely contradicted in most material points by others to which references are made and on which they profess to be founded? So much for the question of the untrustworthiness of the two Papers to which I have referred. It is an extremely irksome and painful process to track all these gross and unpardonable errors. As a rule, we receive with absolute confidence all the statements of fact contained in official Papers laid on the Table of this House. We have had these Papers ten days in our hands, and the labour, therefore, of reading them is great; but it is increased fourfold when we have to watch them at every turn, and track the extraordinary deviations from fact in the statements they contain, and in which I am afraid they too much abound. There has been a great deal said—and no doubt there remains still a great deal to be said—ranging over the whole of these transactions; but I shall not attempt to go over the entire history of the case. It appears to me the case is brought to a head in one portion of it, on which the Government, not unnaturally, perhaps, have hardly touched at all. The Under Secretary of State touched with a very light hand indeed on the Conferences at Peshawur. They are not the most agreeable reading, and they are voluminous and very closely printed; but here we have the whole case brought into a focus. We can there see what is the course of action that has placed us in our present position. It is the abandonment of the old policy and it is the adoption of the new; and the first price we have to pay for this new policy is a war that has now begun. It is a war attended with this remarkable feature—that, as the Duke of Wellington said, a victory was the most woeful thing next to a defeat; so in this war military success will be the most painful and embarrassing next to military disasters, which might shake the whole fabric of the Indian Empire. Now, I want to know by the light—the ample and redundant light—which these Conferences afford, what was the situation of things when Lord Northbrook quitted India? There had been no change in the Indian policy between the accession of the present Government and the departure of Lord Northbrook from India. That was not owing to the present Government. Lord Salisbury, at the earliest period, began to feel the pulse of Lord Northbrook on the subject of a change. The reception of the first overture was not favourable. He devised a more formidable attack. He instructed the Government of India to alter its policy. The Government of India, in the first place, ascertained that some short time would be given; and, having ascertained that, they wrote a despatch, manful and dutiful, but, I think, in bold resistance to the injunctions of the Secretary of State. The Secretary of State returned to the charge, and repeated his injunctions. The Indian Government and Lord Northbrook returned to the charge, and repeated their objections, and what I do not mean to call refused in any unbecoming or improper sense, but returned an answer declining, and giving reasons against the injunctions of Lord Salisbury. That is the great epoch. Lord Northbrook then quitted India, a new Viceroy was sent out with new views and new ideas, and what we want is to make an effective comparison of the old and the new. Well, we have the best opportunity of doing that in the Conferences at Peshawur, because the persons are each of them potential, fully authorised and instructed; and because the Papers which were exchanged, and the records which were drawn, give us a most copious account of all that had taken place, but, at the same time, enabling a judgment to be formed. The noble Lord opposite described this old policy with the following epithets. He calls it old. I should have thought that might have been an epithet of praise from the noble Lord. He calls it battered. He calls it beaten. He calls it exploded. He calls it barren, and he calls it useless. Those are the epithets which he applies to the policy of Lord Canning, of Lord Lawrence, of Lord Mayo, of Lord Northbrook, of the other Viceroys of India since the time of the first Afghan War, and of every Government, including his own Government, that have held office in England during these 25 years. That is the description he gives of this policy, I cannot for a moment think of checking the luxuriant imagination of the noble Lord in his choice of epithets; but when the noble Lord, leaving the ground of imagination, passes from adjectives to substantives, and when he deals with matter of fact, I beg leave to contest outright his fundamental propositions, although I fully admit that I have no means of confuting them, except by reference to the Papers which have been produced. The noble Lord says that the Ameer from year to year became more and more anxious for a change in his relations with the British Government, That is the statement of the noble Lord. It is on the ground of a statement like that that he absolves himself from reference to the Book. "He became more and more anxious for a change in his relations with the British Government, and he desired that more vigorous steps should be taken, and that desire he expressed time after time." A change in his relations with the British Government is the cardinal phrase of the statement of the noble Lord. What I say is this—that the change in policy was that undoubtedly the present Government renewed the promise of protection which had been given by Lord Northbrook in a manner substantially the same, but somewhat less cautiously worded. Lord Northbrook, in the words which my hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for India said he did not understand, described the kind of assistance that he was disposed to give. I have such an opinion of the intellect of my hon. Friend opposite that I know not how to comprehend his words, and I do not understand his not understanding. There never was a plainer passage than that in which Lord Northbrook conveyed his assurance of support to the Ameer.

MR. E. STANHOPE explained that what he said he could not understand was the telegram of the right hon. Gentleman's Government.

MR. GLADSTONE: I am sorry if I misunderstood my hon. Friend; but I thought I heard him say the explanation was obscure. As to whether he understands the telegram which was not sent to him, it is a matter of very little consequence, because Lord Northbrook understood that telegram. As the Ameer knew nothing about the telegram, but only knew what Lord Northbrook said to him, I do not think we need trouble ourselves with that matter; but I beg pardon of my hon. Friend if I misconstrued him. The difference between the assurance given by Lord Northbrook and the assurance given by Lord Salisbury, as I understand it, is this. Lord Northbrook said—"I affix two conditions. One is that you must not bring the war upon yourself by your aggressive policy; and the other is you must be guided by us in the questions of policy that arise with regard to that war." These were the two conditions he laid down. Lord Salisbury, I think, cut off—certainly did not repeat explicitly—the second condition. I cannot say that was an improvement. It might be that the Ameer might be engaged in a war not brought on by his own aggression, and yet he might have brought it on by such folly and mismanagement that it would be very hard that we should be liable to assist him in it; and, therefore, I cannot say that I think that was an improvement on Lord Northbrook's definition of the conditions. They are the only two he affixed, and they appear to me to have been perfectly just and wise. But, at any rate, in the main I take it the same or nearly the same assurance of protection was given as Lord Salisbury contemplated in the despatch in which he first instructed Lord Lytton. Lord Lytton undoubtedly, and the Government of India, went beyond what Lord Northbrook had promised, and I should have said seemingly beyond what Lord Salisbury had enjoined, but I do not dwell upon that. They promised the Ameer apparently a total identification with his foreign policy. That was not what the Ameer wanted at all. He did not want them to be identified with his foreign policy; and it is quite evident that the reason why he took alarm was that he was afraid of interference with his foreign policy, and through his foreign policy of interference with his independence. But the present Government of India, while granting to the Ameer more than Lord Northbrook had been disposed to grant, annexed to it conditions which were absolutely intolerable, and which, in the view of the Ameer and of his people, in their ultimate operations were fatal to the independence of his country. Why, I will not quote the 11 passages to which I have referred; but I will read a few words from one of them. The Ameer says—

"In the first place, the people of Afghanistan have a dread of this proposal, and it is firmly fixed in their minds, and deeply rooted in their hearts, that, if Englishmen or other Europeans once set foot in their country, it will sooner or later pass out of their hands. In no way can they be re-assured on this point, and it is impossible to remove these opinions from their minds, for they adduce many proofs in support of them, the mention of which now would greatly prolong this discussion."—[Afghanistan, No. 1, p. 208.]

He speaks of it there with regard to the reception of these officers generally; in almost all the 11 passages he refers especially, and in terms, to their residence upon the Frontier, and urges against them, in a great variety of forms of expression, the very same objection that I have read. Well, now, the case of Her Majesty's Government is this—that the old policy was worn out; that it was necessary to have a new one; that the results were unsatisfactory to both parties—unsatisfactory to the Indian Government, and unsatisfactory to the Ameer; and, as I have quoted from the noble Lord, the Ameer from time to time, and from year to year, more and more pressed for a change in the policy of Her Majesty's Government. I have promised to confine myself to the Conferences at Peshawur in a great degree, and consequently I will not quote the declaration of Sir Richard Pollock, which referred to a date early in 1874, and which was founded upon information confidentially obtained about the sentiments of the Ameer. It will be remembered that the effect of that declaration was, that there was no unfavourable change whatever in the sentiments of the Ameer. But I will take the evidence which I suppose is the strongest in the case. It is said that the Indian Government of that day on the one side, and the Ameer and his Government on the other side, were fundamentally dissatisfied with the relations which subsisted, and that, consequently, there arose the necessity for a change. I will contradict that statement by the most distinct evidence that can be conceived on the part of the Government of that day, and likewise on the part of the Ameer. I will take first the Indian Government of that day. In January, 1875, these are the words of Lord Northbrook—

"This being so, and if we have formed a correct judgment of the sentiments of the Ameer towards the British Government, the main objects of the policy which was advocated by Lord Canning in the time of Dost Mahomed—which was renewed by Lord Lawrence on the first favourable opportunity that occurred after the death of Dost Mahomed—which was ratified by Lord Mayo at the Umballa Conference—and which we have since steadily pursued—are secured. We have established friendly relations with Afghanistan: that country is stronger than it has ever been since the days of Dost Mahomed, and our influence is sufficient to prevent the Ameer from aggression upon his neighbours. It is to be regretted that old animosities and other causes have hitherto prevented the establishment of true intercourse between European British subjects and Afghanistan, and the location of British Agents in that country. But we believe that these things will naturally follow in course of time when our motives are better understood."—[Ibid. p. 134.]

There is the difference clearly brought to issue. The Government assert that the object of our policy had not been attained; but the Government of India of that day, who were the paramount authority at the time, give it as their opinion that it had been obtained—at least in substance. And the Paper from which I have quoted was signed by Lord Napier of Magdala, in whose case the charge relied upon by hon. Gentlemen opposite has reference not, I apprehend, to the question of policy generally, but to the occupation of Quetta. The two Governments are, in fact, directly at issue with one another. The present Government, on the 10th of May, 1877, say—

“It is impossible to deny that the practical result of the Afghan policy, patiently pursued by us for several years, were far from satisfactory.”—[Ibid. 165.]

Now, that is a statement which is perfectly at variance with the passage which I have just quoted from the despatch of the Indian Government of Lord Northbrook. I have shown that the two Governments were entirely at issue; while Lord Northbrook, at least, completely contradicts the view of the noble Lord opposite with respect to the temper of the Ameer. And what was the temper of the Ameer? I will state it in the shortest possible form, in order to save the time of the House. It is a matter so important, however, as it comes out of the Conferences at Peshawur—since it entirely destroys the case of the Government with regard to his discontent and dissatisfaction—that I must trouble the House for a few moments with the evidence. The Cabul Envoy, in his interview with Dr. Bellew, says—

“The Ameer and his people thoroughly appreciated the friendship of the British Government.”—[Ibid. p. 202.]

On the 10th February the Envoy says to Sir Lewis Pelly—

“That very arrangement and agreement at Umballa is sufficient, so long as from the side of Her Most Gracious Majesty, the great Queen of England, the foundation of friendship shall remain intact and stable.”—[Ibid. p. 205.]

How does he go on? You will find him saying at page 206—

“Therefore, till the time of the departure of Lord Northbrook, the previous course continued to be observed.”

Again—

“Lord Northbrook left the friendship without change, in conformity with the conduct of his predecessors, and in conformity with the preceding usage.”—[Ibid. p. 208.]

What does the noble Lord now think about his representation of the Ameer being from year to year in a state of greater excitement, becoming more and more dissatisfied with his relations with the British Government, and demanding a change? What says the noble Lord to this? The declaration of the noble Lord is, that it was the desire of the Ameer that a great change should take place in his relations with the British Government. The exact reverse was the case. His wish was—“That the usual friendship should remain firm upon the former footing.” Then, says the noble Lord, the Ameer was in a state of great alarm about Russia. No such thing. For the Envoy, speaking of Russia, declares, after referring to the communications made to him in consequence of the understanding between the late Government and Russia, that Lord Northbrook had thoroughly reassured him. Well, how did the Envoy sum up all this; because recollect that these alleged disturbances in the Ameer's mind are the only foundation for that change of policy of which we have heard so much. The Envoy says—

“Therefore the authorities of the Government of Afghanistan have the most perfect confidence that there can be no deviation from the tenor of these writings”—the writings he had received from Lord Canning, Sir John Lawrence, Lord Mayo, and Lord Northbrook—“which have been briefly mentioned, in respect to the peace and tranquillity and lasting friendship of the States, in accordance with the reply of His Highness the Ameer to the letter of Lord Northbrook of the 6th September 1873. If there should be a want of confidence in the substance of these successive writings approved by Governments, or the probability of a causeless want of confidence in them becoming a reason for displeasure to the Governments, what propriety is there in this?”—[Ibid. p. 202.]

Then, further on in the same page the Ameer says—

“The Ameer is, with sincerity of purpose, in accord with his Excellency the Viceroy, in accordance with those communications and the former course. And, as to according his Excellency the Viceroy a ‘means,’ I beg to say that no better means exist than those of the past, which formerly, in the time of perplexity, and subsequently up to the present time, have produced sincerity and good deeds from time to time.”

[Second Night.]

Here we have a flat contradiction of the description which has been given us by the noble Lord. The Envoy winds up with a final appeal to the Viceroy and the Government of India, and with the expression of an earnest hope for the welfare of the two Governments, and

“That his Excellency, through your good offices, will, with great frankness and sincerity of purpose, act in conformity with the course of past Viceroys, and that by means of his own good acts the relations of friendship and unity may be increased.”—[Ibid. p. 213.]

Note the words—“By his acting in conformity with the course of past Viceroys.” What, then, becomes of the main allegation of the noble Lord? We have two parties in relation to one another—the Government of India and the Ameer’s Government. The present Government of India say, in substance, that they felt that their relations with Afghanistan had become unsatisfactory. The past Government of India declare that to them those relations did not appear unsatisfactory; and, on the other side, the Government of the Ameer, on whose supposed dissatisfaction Her Majesty’s Ministers build their case, in every one of these citations which I have made simply appeals to Lord Lytton to let them alone and to act upon the relations which already existed, merely improving them; but, whatever was done, not to insist, above all, in making that most perilous and fatal proposition for the admission of British Residents into their country. That evidence as to the state of the case up to 1876 is complete. It does not leave a gap, a rift of any kind, for the suggestion of a defect. I know there were certain subjects of dissatisfaction in the Ameer’s mind; but the Envoy is careful to make it understood that, whatever be these subjects of dissatisfaction, they are collateral to the main issue, and you have heard his own word in which he again and again beseeches and entreats the Representatives of the Government to let present relations subsist. The Prime Minister of the Ameer within four days of death said he wished to put a meeting off, and it was said it was evident he was trying to gain time. The poor man was trying to gain time. Death had laid his hands upon him in four days after that kind suggestion was made. The Ameer wished to send another Envoy. The former Envoy had found that you were immovable and inflexible. You knew that you had superior power. You knew that you were secure from the scrutiny and criticism of Parliament. You knew that no criticism could be directed against you; and I do not hesitate to say that if these Papers as to the Conference at Peshawur had been laid on the Table within a short time of that Conference you would have had no Afghan War. The iron hand of necessity was on the Ameer; and after all he had said about the prospect of danger to his country and its independence, still he knew that he could lean only on England, and he clung to that hope with a kind of desperate fidelity and tenacity. He was prepared to send a new Envoy, and, when driven to the last extremity, to concede all you demanded and to run the risks and danger of internal disturbances, which he had described to you in such just and pathetic and such moving terms. But he was not permitted to send a new Envoy to a new Conference. The Viceroy believed that concessions would be made; but he would not allow them to be made, because the Ameer was not eager enough to make them. A strong Power—the strongest in the world—dealing with almost the weakest in the world, forced that weak Power to concessions, which it shows in 11 pleas for another Conference meant its future ruin; and when they express their readiness to make those concessions you refuse them the opportunity, because they have not shown eagerness enough to give in to those terms which they believe in the long run would ultimately destroy their country. These things are hardly credible, and if they had not been known they could not have been believed. You find the Ameer satisfied in the main, though dissatisfied on minor points with his relations with you, and he begs you for God’s sake not to disturb and tamper him. How did you leave him? Did you leave him as you had found him? No; you entered upon a discussion of Treaties with him. I have sometimes heard the “faith of Treaties” and the “sacredness of national engagements” talked about from the Bench opposite. But what was the mode of action that was adopted? We had certain engagements with the Ameer, and we proposed to give him our opinions about those engagements. What was the first communication made to him by Sir Lewis Pelly? He actually went to the length of using these words—

"The only obligations ever contracted between the British Government and the Barakzai Rulers of Afghanistan are embodied in two Treaties, of which the first was signed in 1855 and the second in 1857. The second of these two Treaties was contracted for a special and limited purpose, and with exclusive reference to an occasion which has long since passed away. This second Treaty, therefore, belongs to the class of Treaties known as transitory Treaties; and on both sides the obligations contracted by it have lapsed, as a matter of course, with the lapse of time."—[Ibid. p. 216.]

In the first place, I conceive that that statement is an untrue statement. The Article in question—the second Treaty—has not lapsed, for there is no time fixed at which the obligation under that Article is to lapse. But that is not the point to which I wish to call the attention of the House. It is this—The declaration of Sir Lewis Pelly on the part of the Government as it affects the only two Treaties ever contracted by the British Government and the Rulers of Afghanistan. Lord Mayo had said that he would view with the utmost displeasure the acts of those who might try to disturb Afghanistan. Lord Northbrook had embodied his declaration in writing, and sent it to the Ameer, to the effect that he would assist the Ameer against unjust aggression. The present Government of India, representing the gentlemen who are eloquent on the subject of the faith of Treaties, informed the Envoy of the Ameer that the engagements of 1855 and 1857 constituted the only obligations of the British Government towards him, and that the promises of Lord Mayo and Lord Northbrook were cast away to the winds. I think that the minds of the Gentlemen opposite, if I may say so without offence, ought to be sensitive on that subject—a little more sensitive than they are. Those obligations of Lord Mayo and Lord Northbrook were extinguished by implication, and I am now showing that they are expressly extinguished by the declaration of Sir Lewis Pelly. He referred to the writing on which he depended, and to which he said nothing beyond could with advantage be added. There is a statement that protection would be given to the Ameer if his inclinations were in accordance with those of the

"But His Highness has evinced no such desire; and it is absurd to assume that, because the British Government would have viewed with severe displeasure in 1869 any attempt to disturb the throne of a loyal and trusted ally, it is, therefore, bound in 1877 to protect, from dangers incurred regardless of its advice, the damaged power of a mistrustful and estranged neighbour."

The declaration of Lord Mayo is, therefore, distinctly annihilated. He then proceeds lower down the page to deal with Lord Northbrook's promise as he has already dealt with Lord Mayo's promise.

"Lord Northbrook declined to give the Ameer the Treaty which His Highness asked for. And therefore, as in the previous case at Umballa in 1869, it is clear that any subsequent verbal assurances given by Lord Northbrook to the Envoy were not intended to commit, and could not possibly commit, the British Government to any of those liabilities which it would have contracted on behalf of the Ameer had the Viceroy felt able to comply with the request of His Highness by signing with him a Treaty of Alliance."

What is the meaning of that sentence? It is this—"Beware of certain obligations contracted towards you by Lord Northbrook as there have been by Lord Mayo in 1869. You have declined to go into a Treaty of Alliance which the Viceroy has offered to you; and as you have declined to go into it, it is absurd to suppose that the British Government now stands by any promise which it then made." That annihilated the protection which the British Government had held out over the Ameer, and leaves him entirely exposed to every blast of adversity. That is the condition of the Ameer at the close of this Conference, but that was not all. You closed the Conference; you shut the door in his face; you stripped him of the protection which had formerly been granted to him; you denied that the promise of Lords Mayo and Northbrook remained in force. But that was not all—you adopted other measures of hostility towards him—you occupied Quetta. The answer of the noble Lord to that is, that you occupied it in accordance with Treaty right. True; but suppose France occupied Belgium in conformity with Treaty rights, how would that satisfy us? In former days the great confidence of the Afghans always lay in the fact that the great Power lay outside the Khyber and the Bolan Passes. Was it nothing, then, to occupy Quetta, and was it not likely to prove a grievance with the Ameer? At page 242 of the Afghan Papers there is a reference which uses these words:—"He reiterated his Quetta grievances," showing that they had been a usual subject of discussion. But it was not Quetta alone. You had built a bridge across the Indus and amassed your troops in a way that must have conveyed to the mind of the Ameer very great alarm. Whether the object of that military occupation was to attack Afghanistan or somebody else beyond it is not necessary for me to inquire. It was not very pleasant for the Roumanians when the Emperor of Russia had to attack Turkey on the other side of their territory; and the Ameer must have viewed with dread your military preparations on the Indus. You had encouraged the Maharajah of Cashmere to move troops towards his Frontier, and were, by a variety of measures, doing everything in your power to increase his sense of destitution and weakness. When you had reduced him to that feeling, in what condition did he stand? Was he still to maintain the same attitude towards Russia as he was glad to do when he had your promises of support? And now occurred the great offence of the Ameer. He received a Mission from Russia; but he did so only when you had annihilated your promises of support; when you had withdrawn from him your Native Agents, and left him without the slightest token of amity remaining; and now, last of all, and, perhaps, least credible of all, you have treated this reception of the Russian Mission as an offence, and have visited it with the penalty of war. For if this Proclamation is intelligible at all, it has this meaning—that at a time when you have accepted the pretexts of the Russian Government, you have made war upon the Ameer for accepting the Russian Mission. They are thin, transparent allegations. Well, Sir, there may be those whose knowledge is wider than mine; but I will say this—that the Ameer did not voluntarily accept this Russian Mission. It was an unwilling reception on his part. You turn round upon him now and say he accepted it with much pomp and display. But I have not been able to find this in the Papers. That is one of the conveniences of not referring to the Papers. The Central Asia Papers last presented to us show this—that the Russians forced their Mission upon the Ameer; but the Russians knew how to go about it, and, in consequence of this, although they sent an urgent and imperative demand, they sent that demand beforehand. We also sent an urgent and imperative demand; but then, instead of waiting to let the Ameer have time to settle that matter with his own subordinate agents, we sent an Envoy on the heels of our demand, and, in consequence, he was met by the subordinate agents saying to him—"We have had no instructions, and have, therefore, no authority to let you pass." And that you call an insult. It is no insult; it is merely a consequence of the grossest blundering. What does the Ameer say? Major Cavagnari says, on the 16th of June, 1878—

"The Ameer desires that Afghanistan may remain independent, and that there should be no Envoys of a different religion to Mahomedanism in his kingdom."—[Central Asia (No. 1), p. 139.]

We are supplied with a document of the 5th of June, 1878, that tells us the Ameer's first impulse was to send a Mission to Tashkend to deprecate the Russian Mission; but before he did this, we are told,

"A letter was received by him from Kauffman, corroborating the Agent's statement, and adding that the Envoy must be received by the Ameer at Cabul, as he had been sent by the express commands of the Emperor."—[Ibid. 140.]

Now, Sir, the Russians sent an absolute command to the Ameer; but, being men of business, they sent that command to him without sending the Mission on its heels, and thus they enabled the Ameer to take his decision without shaming himself in the face of his own servants. But you send your demand with your Mission close behind it, before he has time for consideration; and the consequence is it is stopped, not by the act of the Ameer, as you most unjustly accuse him, but by the act of his subordinates, who could not let it pass without authority. Such are the circumstances in which the Ameer received the Russian Mission. But what have been our transactions in Russia? The India Office appears to avow a good deal more courage than the Foreign Office. It suggests, on the 8th of August,

Mr. Gladstone

"The adoption of such language at St. Petersburg as may be best calculated to bring about a result such as the engagements of Russia entitle us to expect."—[Ibid. 143.]

So Lord Salisbury writes to Mr. Plunkett—

"Should it prove that there is any truth in the statement that a Russian Mission has proceeded to Cabul, you will express the hope of Her Majesty's Government that it may be at once withdrawn, as being inconsistent with the assurances so frequently received from his Highness."—[Ibid. 150.]

And then M. de Giers writes to Mr. Plunkett that the Mission is

"of a provisional nature, and one of simple courtesy; it cannot, therefore, interfere in any way with the pacific assurances which you mention."—[Ibid. 164.]

But Lord Salisbury did not ask whether it was a Mission of a merely courteous and provisional character; he asked whether there was a Mission at all, and, if there was, he asked that it might be withdrawn. And the answer is—"We have got a Mission, but we think fit to call it a Mission of courtesy and of a provisional character." But I should like to know who is to draw the distinction? If there was such a distinction at all, it should have been embodied in Lord Salisbury's letter, and directions should have been given to ascertain of what character it really was. The Russians refuse to withdraw the Mission, and say it is within the understanding with our Government. Her Majesty's Government have committed themselves to that. But I venture to say that it is not within the understanding, and I think I have some right to speak upon this matter. The understanding was, that Russia should exercise no influence in Afghanistan, and the sending of a Russian Mission to Cabul was an exercise of Russian influence. Russia justified her military measures by the disturbed state of relations with her which you had created. Why did not she justify on the same ground her Mission to Cabul? Why, if she had done so, the Mission to Cabul must have passed away at once, and it could never have been renewed. But she put it upon a new ground, as to which she may have obtained information beforehand, that you were prepared to admit it. And, therefore, Russia has got now, by the allowance of the Government opposite, and for the first time and in complete derogation of the communications with Lord Clarendon and Lord Granville, a title to send what she may think fit to call a Mission of courtesy and of a provisional character to Cabul as often as she pleases. That is the humiliation to which you have subjected yourselves by first making a demand and then tamely submitting to the rejection of it. And, now, how are the facts? Has the Mission come back? It is of no avail whether the Envoy has come back. You have established and allowed a title which may be renewed at the pleasure of the Russian Government. But we do not even know that the Mission has come back. It may be there at this moment, while you are making war against the Ameer. I do not like to appeal to national pride; but I think it requires a very small share of national pride to feel sentiments of very strong aversion to a tame submissal to Russia, while at the same time you are making glorification of marching your legions to Cabul. My hon. Friend the Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread) referred last night to vicarious punishment, and he did so with considerable justice. You have a ground of complaint against Russia, and you make war on the Ameer; and, having made war on the Ameer, you are going to exact compensation from the Border Tribes. The policy of Her Majesty's Government has been to make war upon the innocent for the faults of the guilty. First, the Ameer must be punished for the offence of Russia, and then the Frontier tribes must suffer for the vicarious faults of the Ameer. I do not know whether the House is aware of it, but I have here a curious document. It is a Treaty with the King and the Chiefs of Old Calabar and Duke Town, made by the Representative of Her Majesty, Mr. David Hopkin. The names of the Chiefs I need not attempt to read. The substance of the Treaty is this—"That the undersigned King and Chiefs of Duke Town, Old Calabar, undertake to forbid the old practice of inflicting punishment upon the innocent in room of the guilty in the whole regions of Old Calabar." The Government will not object to this reference. The noble Lord has declared, in language which must recommend itself to all the Liberals in the House, that we should always be ready to change our ideas and our measures, and to receive instruction from all sources. Do not let Her Majesty's Government, then, be ashamed to take a lesson from Old Calabar. Let them put an end to this system of making the innocent suffer for the guilty. If the Ameer has offended you—justly offended you—do not visit his sins upon the Frontier tribes; and if Russia has broken her engagements with you, do not visit the punishment of the breach of engagement upon the Ameer. I have now touched upon nearly all the points to which I need refer. The House has done me great kindness in listening to me for so long; but this question has an enormous range, and it requires time to deal with it. You have proceeded, as I have already stated, to make the reception by the Ameer of the Russian Mission a cardinal ground of offence and of aggression upon him at a time when you left him no other option whatever, and at a time when he was ready to endanger his own independence as a Sovereign for the sake of pleasing you. When you sent your Mission you received Reports from your own Vakeel on the 17th and 18th of September which should have led you to pause before you pressed its reception upon the Ameer. The Vakeel was a man you trusted; you had no other Agent; there was no other person to whom you could refer; and your own Agent, as reported by Sir Neville Chamberlain, advises you to postpone the project. He says the Mission should be held in abeyance, otherwise some harm will ensue. On the 18th you sent that to which no Member or Representative of Her Majesty's Government, so far at least as I know, has supplied the slightest answer. On the 18th September Sir Neville Chamberlain telegraphs another message—

“Another letter received from Nawab Ghulam Hasan Khan after an interview with Wazir Shah Muhammad, who assured Nawab, on his oath, that the Ameer intimated that he would send for the Mission in order to clear up mutual misunderstandings, provided there was no attempt to force this Mission upon him without his consent being first granted according to usual custom; otherwise he would resist it, as coming in such a manner would be a slight to him.”—[Afghanistan, No. 1, p. 242.]

What had the poor man done? He had lost the advantage of all your promises, and he had seen your hostile preparations at Quetta and elsewhere, and he had even been ready to endanger the internal tranquillity of his country for the sake of meeting your views, and was now ready to receive your Mission, if you would only send it in such a way as to preserve his honour, his self-respect, and his dignity in the face of his Asiatic subjects. But then we are to be told that this poor quarrel did not turn upon the rights or wrongs of the Ameer, but upon the supposed necessity for the creation of a scientific Frontier. Before Lord Mayor's Day the whole world was filled with idle rumours and with newspaper tales; but on that day, when Ministers were to unbosom themselves, all these foul vapours were to be dispersed by the rising sun. But what the rising sun did was to show us the necessity there was for our having a scientific Frontier in India. I am really loath to dwell upon the historical aspect of these extraordinary transactions. We are now at war; our gallant Forces are engaged in mortal strife. You have made this war in concealment from Parliament; in reversal of the policy of every Indian and Home Government that has existed for the last 25 years; in contempt of the supplication of the Ameer, through his Minister, that you would let things alone; in determined refusal to hear a new Commissioner, when the Commissioner he sent to Peshawur was dead; in opposition to the views of your own Vakeel at the moment when he told you that the Ameer, if his sense of honour and self-respect were spared, and the men were withdrawn, would grant you a Mission; at the time when you had accepted the Russian Treaty; at this time you declared that you wanted a scientific Frontier. Such are the extraordinary circumstances in which you are placed. And it is impossible to refrain from the recollection that an Afghan War is no new war. We made war in error upon Afghanistan in 1838. To err is human and pardonable. But we have erred a second time on the same ground, and with no better justification. That may also be human; and if, as such, it be pardonable, it is certainly, to say the least, lamentable, and repeated error is a grief. This error has been repeated in the face of every warning conceivable and imaginable, and in the face of an unequalled mass of authorities, and in the face of your own Agent on the spot. It is proverbially said that history repeats itself; and certainly the repetition is in some cases singular and touching. There has rarely been an occasion in which there has been a nearer approach to identity than in the case of the present and the former wars. We have plunged into war upon the same ground, to act against the same people, and to fight against the son of the same man whom we previously fought against. There is still many a living being in Afghanistan whose memory bleeds at the recollection of the horrors we carried into their country and which we ourselves endured not yet 40 years ago, and yet all this is to be done over again. May Heaven avert the omen which may next suggest itself! May Heaven avert that catastrophe which befel our Army in 1841, and that sanguinary massacre which followed upon that catastrophe! But Her Majesty's Government must surely feel that the terrible calamities of those four years could not pass away without leaving upon the minds of the people of Afghanistan most painful traces. How is it possible they could look with favour, except as the result of the long-continuance of kindly relations, upon the people who had invaded them without cause, and had suffered and made them suffer so profoundly as the consequence of that invasion? However, it so happened that after 1842, and after the successful march of Pollock and the operations of Nott, 25 years of wise and cautious and far-seeing government prevailed, both in England and in India, and every effort was made to efface these painful memories, and to lay the foundation of a lasting concord. I remember a beautiful description of one of our modern Poets of a great battle-field during the Punic Wars, in which he observed—

“Wherefore a moment Nature was laid waste, and nothing but the tokens of carnage were left upon the ground; but day by day and hour by hour she, returning to her kindly task, removed one by one, and put out of sight these hideous tokens, and restored the scene to order, beauty, and peace.”

It was a crisis like this that the Viceroy of this country were running through, and the Governments of this country, irrespective of Party, supported these Viceroys. I now ask, is all this to be undone? The sword is drawn; the bloody hand is to be manifested again, and is already manifested, in that unhappy country. The struggle may, perhaps, be short. God grant that it may be short! God grant that it may not be sharp! But you, having once entered upon it, cannot tell whether it will be short or long. You cannot tell what will be its limits. You have again brought in devastation and again created a necessity which, I hope, will be met by other men, with other minds, in happier days; that other Viceroys and other Governments, but other Viceroys especially—such men as Canning, Lawrence, Mayo, and Northbrook—will undo this evil work in which you are now engaged. It cannot be undone in a moment, although the torch of a madman may burn down an edifice which it has taken the genius, the skill, the labour, and the lavish prodigality of ages to erect. As I have said, it cannot be undone in a moment. The best way we can act is to look for the re-instatement of that pacifying and mitigating process which will ultimately, though remotely, result in success. In the meantime, I should have some hope of this Division, if I really believed that many hon. Members of this House had made themselves individually masters of the case which is disclosed in the deep recesses of those two volumes of Parliamentary Papers. They have not done and cannot do this, and, therefore, this vote will go as other votes have gone. You will obtain the warrant of Parliament and the triumph of military success for the moment. That military success has not been quite so unchecked up to the present; but it has in substance corresponded to that which led us on in 1838, and blinded us to the perilous nature of the step which we were taking. Be that as it may, however, you will probably obtain sanction and the warrant which you seek. The responsibility which is now yours alone will be shared with you by the majority of this House. Many will decline to share it. Many will hope in the ultimate disapproval and reversal of your course by the nation; but even if the nation should refuse, and should indeed bow in submission to the tribunal of ultimate appeal, they will still feel they have discharged their duty in this critical moment—a duty absolutely incumbent on them, as they believe, if they are right in thinking that truth and justice are the only sure foundation of international relations, and that there is no possession either for peoples or for men so precious as a just and honourable name.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: I feel, Sir, that I rise at an immense disadvantage in following the right hon. Gentleman; and I must, therefore, ask the indulgence of the House while I refer to some subjects which he has mentioned, and some, perhaps, to which he has not alluded. I cannot but give my admiration and entire concurrence to the concluding sentences of his speech; for I should be one of the last men in this House who would wish to see this country engaged in an unjust and unnecessary war. But while I admire that passage in the speech of my right hon. Friend, I cannot help saying that I thought the first part of his speech was marked by a very narrow and bitter spirit. I fail to see why a man of his eminence should have thought it necessary to enter into a close and narrow verbal criticism which, surely, does not constitute the point at issue. I was also surprised to hear the right hon. Gentleman object to the observation of the noble Lord who commenced the debate this evening, that "we shall continue our hostility until we have received the due submission of our enemy." The views of the noble Lord are those of a majority of this House, and are shared, I believe, by a very large section of the public, both at home and in India; and I cannot, therefore, understand anyone, in face of the fact of such a policy being approved, expressing a hope that our Forces should turn back until the object with which they were put into the field had been attained. Again, the right hon. Gentleman was rather hard upon the noble Lord when he charged him with having made statements that could not be verified by the Books and which had no shred of truth. [Mr. GLADSTONE: Proof.] Well, proof. Then, again, he charged the Government with having saluted the country with 500 pages of information, and then asked the House, at a short notice, to give an opinion upon that information so afforded. But the right hon. Gentleman has spoken often enough on this subject in the country, and has, in language sufficiently strong to satisfy anybody, attacked the policy and the conduct of the Government without having in his possession a single one of those 500 pages.

We know perfectly well that he has been making his case without sufficient facts to support his statements and arguments; and it is, therefore, rather hard for the right hon. Gentleman to come down here now to charge the Government with reckless negligence and gross mis-statements in the course of these Papers.

MR. GLADSTONE: I do not wish to be misunderstood. I have only made the charges this evening against two documents.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: It is quite true that the charges have this evening only been made against two documents; but in the country he has charged the whole Government with reckless and gross misconduct and mis-management. [Mr. GLADSTONE: No.] But I say yes; and I intend to prove it. The right hon. Gentleman says there has been a broken statute; but he defers his proof of his statement to another day. I, however, do not propose to let that statement alone. I am going to call attention, not only to what the right hon. Gentleman has said in this House, but to speeches which he has made beyond its walls—speeches which ought, in my opinion, to be brought to the bar of public opinion by means of the debates which proceed in this House. Before proceeding with this branch of my subject, let me say, in reference to the speech of the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread), who raised this debate, that I never heard a mass of Parliamentary Papers handled with more precision and accuracy by a Member occupying a seat on a back Bench than was shown by the hon. Gentleman. He based upon his quotations and references some rather sweeping charges against the Government; and the House will agree with me that there never was a time when more sweeping invective was applied to an Executive Government than has been used within the last three months. As I have said, the hon. Member for Bedford used some rather strong expressions; but they were the very milk of human kindness compared with what we have been lately accustomed to; it is like sucking painted lollypops, after the expressions we have so recently heard out-of-doors—expressions the consideration of which ought not to be postponed, but at once proceeded with. Once so brought forward, it is easy to show the country how little foundation there is for the charges, except in the fever by which they were engendered. On another point, also, I must give credit to the hon. Member for Bedford for the way he advocated the case of Lord Lawrence. He has tried to make out as good a case, perhaps, as could be made out for the blundering and impotent policy of Lord Lawrence. ["Oh!"] That it was blundering and impotent I can prove from documents laid on the Table of the House. Lord Lawrence has taken a very active part in this matter; therefore, I am desirous to refer to him for a few minutes. He is an ex-Viceroy of India, and the confidence and the favours of the Sovereign have been heaped upon him. He is at this moment the head of the Ameer's Afghan Committee in London. It is the same Lord Lawrence whose epistolary indiscretions have astonished the town; and it is he to whom, not through any Party feeling, the public opinion of the country, through the papers and correspondents, points as one of the principal authors of the mischief and troubles in which we are now placed. ["Oh!"] That may be contested; but I shall prove it. I take the opinion of one of the best of the men who have written on this subject—Sir Henry Rawlinson. I look upon Sir Henry Rawlinson as a most impartial witness. [A laugh.] The noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington) laughs at that; but no one can doubt that Sir Henry Rawlinson, from his long experience in matters affecting Eastern interests, is fully capable of giving an opinion on such a question. Well, he says our troubles commenced with the hesitation of Lord Lawrence in recognizing the Ameer Shere Ali as the rightful Ruler of Cabul after the death of Dost Mahomed; and if the noble Marquess questions the accuracy of Sir Henry Rawlinson, I must refer him to the Duke of Argyll, who, in a letter published in the newspapers, also admits the troubles with Afghanistan have been owing to the period while he was in the Gladstone Administration. After finding that repeated over and over again in the papers, I was surprised to hear the hon. Member make this audacious statement. The hon. Member said—"The front of the offence was Lord Salisbury's letters in 1875, and to him must be attributed the cause of the present war."

I have been in Parliament a good many years, and heard a great many statements and hostile remarks against the policy of Members of different Governments; but I do not think that I ever heard a more unfair or ungenerous statement in attacking a Government than to assert publicly that the cause of this war is due to Lord Salisbury. I was anxious to bring the point before the House, in order to show that the Papers cannot sustain that view of the hon. Member for Bedford. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich says he has listened to everything in the course of this debate, and has read all the Papers. I have also listened to the debate, and have read the Papers with as much ability as I can bring to bear upon them; but I must say that after all the explanations and declamations against the Government, I fail to recognize or to accept the full weight and burden of the indictment which has been so freely levelled not only against the Executive of this country, but against Parliament itself which has supported the Executive; and, indeed, one of the accusations of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich is that Parliament having supported the Government, that Parliament ought to be got rid of. I am anxious, however, to express my feeling—which, I believe, is shared by a great many hon. Gentlemen in this House as well as in the country—and that is a feeling of anxiety and concern as regards these affairs that are going on in the North-Western Frontier of India. It is an anxiety which arises, not from any mistrust as to the result of the military operations in the difficult Passes and mountain fastnesses which separate Afghanistan from our Indian Empire. I hope—and I am sure I am expressing sentiments which everyone will share—that the arms of England, under God's Providence, will be completely successful in the work in which they are engaged. We trust that the gallant little army—not "our legions;" the right hon. Gentleman says we are pouring our legions into Afghanistan; there is an army of 30,000, not one-half of them within the Ameer's territory at present—will rival and emulate the heroic valour and discipline of the British arms, which have on every field shone conspicuous. Even at this moment we have proof of that in the successful strategic achievement of General Roberts and his comrades. No one can doubt or mistrust the success of this expedition; but I share the opinion expressed to-night by the right hon. Gentleman. I see dangers that may arise from the very success and the victories which we may achieve. I think nothing has been more truly said than that our difficulties will arise with the anxieties and troubles of the diplomatic negotiations which must ensue not only in dealing with the Ameer of Afghanistan, but probably, and most certainly, with an enemy concealed behind the Ameer's back, who has had, no doubt, a great hand in these troubles. It is because I share the anxieties of both sides of the House in this respect that I am glad the suggestion of the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington), on the first night of the Session, did not find acceptance. I am glad that the Motion of the hon. Member for Bedford has given this House an opportunity of stating its opinion frankly and fully before Christmas. We shall now know fully the views entertained upon this most serious and grave question. No doubt the object, in a Party sense, is to pass a Vote of Censure upon the Cabinet; and if the hon. Member succeeded there would, probably, not only be a change of Government, but, what is far worse, a change of policy also. The right hon. Gentleman has said a good deal to-night, in answer to the noble Lord (Lord John Manners), about the old way and the new way, and I think he has put a very unfair construction on the object which the noble Lord had in view when he made that remark; but certainly I should be very much surprised if, after the vehemence of the right hon. Gentleman, the suggestion of the noble Marquess had been allowed, that we should say nothing. It is important to bear in mind the sudden change of front made by the Opposition. Let us recollect the first night of the Session. Earl Granville said—"Order!"—perhaps you will repudiate it—"No!"—Lord Granville said—

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

SIR ROBERT PEEL: It was observed by Lord Granville the other night—"Order!"—I think, Sir, I am in Order in referring to this? Well, Lord Granville was understood to say that it was almost impossible to move any Amendment expressing any definite opinion upon the action of the Ministers. In this House, the same night, the noble Marquess went a great deal further. He was most emphatic. On the first night he said—"The Papers are so voluminous, and the matter is so new and requires such careful consideration, that no hon. Member would be justified in calling attention to this grave question and pronouncing a final opinion on the conduct pursued by Her Majesty's Government." A great change, then, has come over hon. Members. I have referred to strong language. The hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) used some strong language. He was very angry with the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington) for making the suggestions he submitted on the first night of the Session, when so many hon. Members were ready to rush into the fray. The right hon. Member for the City of London (Mr. Goschen) made use of an expression also bearing upon the policy of the Government, and said that the Government had intentionally kept back the Papers. I must say that, in my opinion, if ever there was a Government which has been lavish not only in the information it gave, but in the anxiety and desire it has shown to communicate it, it is the present Government. Why, the House has had a Book of 500 pages got ready for its use in the course of a few days. Then there is the junior Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain), who is not satisfied with the statements of anyone. The hon. Gentleman will excuse me for saying so; but he has not had much experience in this House, and he is always ready to bring forward his patent medicines for remedies. "Chamberlain's plans" are so constantly brought forward in the Midland Counties that I am quite sick of them. Then there is the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett), who, of course, cannot sit still, though I must say that the hon. Member's knowledge of Indian affairs always commands the respect of the House, and although many hon. Members do not share his opinions they are sure to catch the attention of the House. This change of front on the part of the Opposition is very curious. Here we have seven or eight malcontents—what a hideous chorus of malcontents from every Liberal point of the political compass—all finding fault with the noble Marquess for what he has done, with the policy and wishes of Lord Granville expressed in "another place," and with the policy of the Government. From whence comes this change of front? It is quite clear that the fever heat, the virulent spirit, and the active mind of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, is the cause of it. The Motion of the hon. Member for Bedford is a Vote of Censure and Want of Confidence. That is the broad issue; but the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich calls it a "narrow issue." There must be a difference even in the mind of the right hon. Gentleman between broad and narrow. It is quite clear from what we have heard to-night that if he did not want to turn out the Government, he wanted a change of policy in the affairs of India, and to bring back those who in his Administration had been the cause of the war. I think that the difficulties which have arisen have been occasioned by the policy of the Gladstone Administration; and that the stain to which the right hon. Gentleman eloquently alluded in his concluding remarks, notwithstanding all the apologies for ex-Cabinet Ministers, all the profuse recriminations and epistolary correspondence of ex-Viceroy of India, must be on the Members who acted in that Administration. The right hon. Gentleman said he should like to see those who had broken the statutes brought to the bar of public opinion. The right hon. Gentleman is one of those who has for a very long time, from very incomplete information, been indulging in severe charges against the Government; and he and Lord Lawrence are, perhaps, the two men who have most embarrassed the Government. Lord Lawrence has published a correspondence of 17 columns of The Times. I do not know whether hon. Members have read it, but I have, and I must say it was most weary, weary reading. Lord Lawrence is a man of very great authority; but, under the circumstances, I should pay very little respect to his opinion on this subject. Lord Lawrence has made many statements in the country as to the Ameer and to the Committee in London, and he is one of those who have given the most information to our enemies. Lord Lawrence, however, when invited to attend a public meeting at Bradford to discuss the war, and the causes which brought it about, wrote to the Committee declining to attend—the Papers having then been presented—and said—"I am so busy with the Papers on the Afghan affair that time alone would not permit me to be present at your demonstration." Now, we must recollect that for weeks before Lord Lawrence was so thoroughly well-informed on the case, in his own opinion, that he had been attacking the policy of the Executive, and making accusations in the newspapers, which everyone thought were wholly uncalled for. Well, then, there is a Member (Mr. Childers) whom I see the solitary occupant of the front Opposition Bench. I hope he may have a vested right in that Bench. I do not wish to disturb him from it; and I think he is most likely to have a vested interest in that Bench, if the Members of the Opposition to which he belongs continue to be so profuse in their differences of opinion. I was shocked at the remarks which he made the other day at Pontefract on the conduct of the Government; for it would be wiser for a man who has been a Cabinet Minister to abstain from criticism until he is able to inform himself of the facts of the case. But what we most complain of on both sides of the House is the vulgarity with which Lord Salisbury has been treated, and the bad taste that has been displayed with reference to Sir Bartle Frere. I must say I believe Sir Bartle Frere is one of the most distinguished servants of the Crown. He has administered a Colony, and is serving his country in very difficult circumstances. An immense responsibility has been cast upon him; and I do think it was a bold thing, not to use a stronger term, for the right hon. Gentleman to have made use of the sort of expression which he did with regard to Sir Bartle Frere.

MR. CHILDERS: The right hon. Baronet will forgive me for interposing. The expression I made use of, to which I presume he alludes, did not in any way refer to Sir Bartle Frere. It was altered in a newspaper in such a way as to make it refer to Sir Bartle Frere. The moment I read that misconstruction of what I said I wrote to the newspaper in question, stating that the expression was not rendered as I had rendered it; that I, being one of Sir Bartle Frere's oldest friends, and valuing most highly his public services, could not by any possibility have used such an expression about him. That letter has been printed; but I presume the right hon. Baronet cannot have read it.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: I am extremely sorry if I have misrepresented the right hon. Gentleman. But the right hon. Gentleman will, no doubt, feel indebted to me for having given him an opportunity of making the remarks he has just made. I now come to the opinions expressed not only here, but elsewhere, by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich. He is one of those who indulge in violent invective, and the violence of his invective against the present Government almost exceeds the bounds of probability. His speech at North Wales and his speech at Greenwich contain language that is almost surprising. The contents of his speech at Greenwich, I am sorry to say, I have at my fingers' end. He spoke two hours by Greenwich time. The right hon. Gentleman began his indictment against the Government in this way. He said—"During the last three months we hoped we might have a period of repose." Now, nobody can for a moment suppose that the right hon. Gentleman stands in need of any repose. All I can say is, that during that period he found himself at leisure to interfere in a great many things, and, amongst others, in election matters in the borough which I have the honour to represent (Tamworth), although I am not at all afraid that his interference will produce the effect which he may have anticipated from his kind good office. But the right hon. Gentleman, on the occasion to which I am referring, went on to say—

"We cherished a hope that by refraining from criticism—a hope even against reasonable expectation—the aim of the Government might at length be directed towards appeasing the prolonged troubles and perils which they had so considerable a share in creating. How were we rewarded? By the disclosure of a new danger, a new peril, in the controversy which has been opened with the Ruler of Afghanistan."

Now, let me observe, in passing, that this question, instead of being only now opened by the Ameer of Afghanistan, is a question which, I think, ever since the time of Lord Dalhousie, has been constantly under the notice of the Government of this country. One of the last acts of Lord Dalhousie's official life was to invite the attention of the Government of the day to the necessity of having—what the right hon. Gentleman was pleased to sneer at to-night, though I was glad to observe his sneer fell flat on the House—a scientific Frontier on the north-western portion of our Indian Empire. The right hon. Gentleman also complained of the Government having studiously withheld information from the country and Parliament in regard to their dealings with Afghanistan; but the charge, like many others, met with little encouragement. Well, the speech of the right hon. Gentleman from which I was quoting runs on very much in the same groove. He seems to be of opinion that the occupation of Quetta, which was not in the territories of the Ameer, was a great cause of complaint and a just offence to that Ruler. [General Sir GEORGE BALFOUR: Hear, hear!] The hon. and learned Pundit, I am not surprised to find, concurs in that opinion. But the right hon. Gentleman further pointed out that if any offence had been given it had been given by Russia. "Russia," he said, "solemnly undertook to abstain from all interference in Afghanistan. The agreement was made with us." Well, no doubt an agreement was made in 1869 that Russia should not interfere in the affairs of Afghanistan or have a Mission there; but I was sorry to find the right hon. Gentleman follow up his statement by the question—"Why do you fight with Afghanistan? why do you not go to war with Russia? Why attack the poor Ameer, a poor weak savage; why not fight Russia?" The right hon. Gentleman knows perfectly well that that is not the real way to look at this question. You may, by means of your rhetoric, put it with some apparent force in that light; but, in my humble judgment, that is not the way in which it ought to be regarded. A great insult has been offered to this country by the Ameer of Afghanistan, and for that insult he ought, in my opinion, to be made directly responsible. But the right hon. Gentleman goes on to say—"I hope the people of England will make some comparison between the England of 1873 and the England of 1878." Well, I think they have already made such a comparison, and that public opinion has in the clearest manner run entirely counter to the policy of the right hon. Gentleman's Administration in 1873. More than that, we now occupy a position in the eyes of the world which we could not then command. I have taken pains to find out not the opinion of the people of England, because that we know, but that of foreign nations; and there are few things to my mind more remarkable than the way in which the Government of 1873 is spoken of by eminent foreign statesmen in Germany, France, and elsewhere. How, for instance, does Prince Bismarck speak of the Gladstone Administration in the Memoirs which have been recently published? He treats it with contempt. We are told that when Prince Bismarck read Lord Granville's despatch about Russia and the Black Sea, he smiled and said—

"They speak of future complications. Future, indeed! that is not the way in which resolute people speak. They are Parliamentary talkers, and dare not do anything. No; nothing is to be feared from them, just as nothing was to be hoped for from them four months ago."

I will now give the House the opinion of M. Gambetta, who is decidedly the first man in France, and who will occupy a great space in the future history of that country, if he will only keep himself from fighting duels at less than 35 paces. In a remarkable article in The République Française he expresses his astonishment that the revelations made by Lord Cranbrook, saddling the Gladstone Administration with the responsibility of having alienated the Ameer, should not have silenced the Liberals. The République Française says—

"This does not prevent the Afghan Committee, which has the support of Mr. Gladstone, from pursuing its task of harassing the Government, even at this critical hour. Lord Lawrence is no more deterred now by the reflection of the ill he can do to his country than was Mr. Gladstone during the crisis in Eastern Europe."

That is a very remarkable statement to appear in such a journal. But to return to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. He goes on to say—

"It is the duty of the people of England to think of the condition in which we are as citizens and politicians. Government by reserve, government by mystery, government by breach of law, government by bringing the Crown out of the position in which the Constitution has placed it to expose the Sovereign to personal responsibility! It is idle to tell you that the attempts of the present Government have been to magnify the Sovereign. Make her Empress, forsooth! Yes, ladies and gentlemen ("I should think the ladies must have been pleased at the compliments to their Sovereign") the Liberal Party will be the special champion, at the next election, of the ancient Monarchy against those who, that they may cover it with flattery and adulation, are adopting measures but too likely to sap its foundations."

Now, it appears to me that for an ex-Prime Minister to allude to his Queen and Sovereign in that way is open to the gravest objection, and I should have thought that he would have abstained from that sort of language. The right hon. Gentleman comes next to the despatch of Lord Cranbrook. We have heard a great deal about the famous paragraph 9, and I have listened to the right hon. Gentleman when, almost in solitary grandeur, he said seven times over that it was not only with the 9th clause he found fault, but that there were many other counts of indictment against the Government which he intended to bring under the notice of the House. How does the right hon. Gentleman talk of Lord Cranbrook? He says—"I will endeavour to avoid severe epithets," and then he goes on to characterize this able despatch and says—"The entire effect of paragraph 9 produces an impression absolutely false." He says—"The despatch asserts what is totally untrue." "It is also untrue," he adds, "that the Viceroy was instructed to postpone the subject," which subject, however, according to the Papers, he did postpone. Then he goes on to say—"This paragraph conveys a totally wrong impression, as if it had been expressed in the severest language of calumny." But these, of course, are not severe epithets! Then, again, "these Papers are garbled." What can go further than this? And the right hon. Gentleman is not using severe epithets when no language can be made more severe. I am really ashamed to trespass on the time of the House with these extravagancies of language of the right hon. Gentleman, and I will not now go through these Papers. I do not even wish to give an outline of that despatch of Lord Cranbrook; but I should like to warn the House that they must not believe a great deal they hear about the responsibility resting on Lord Salisbury. This question of the Ameer was always to the front since the time of Lord Dalhousie, who, with the approval of Lord Aberdeen, made the Treaty to which reference has been made. Then came the transfer of the Government of India, and then the internal troubles of Afghanistan. Lord Lawrence was in India in 1869, and pursued that policy of masterly inactivity, which, to my mind, was the most blundering short-sightedness any Viceroy could employ. The way in which he regarded the various claimants to the Throne of Afghanistan is instructive. Within a few months we find him recognizing three sons of Dost Mahomed as each comes up. No doubt it is a want of decision in his character that led to the difficulties in which we are placed, and where a man like Lord Mayo would certainly have created a very favourable impression on Shere Ali. Matters went on, as we have heard, till this Mission, which the right hon. Gentleman has described in strong terms. May I state the conclusions to which I think we must arrive and pray the attention of the House for a short time longer? We must recollect that affairs in Central Asia in 1878 are not as they were in 1876, and why? Surely owing to Russia. Now, the question is—and it is brought home to the country—can Afghanistan be safely surrendered to Russia? Does the altered position of Russia in Central Asia entail a corresponding change of policy on our part? The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) endeavoured to show that we had left the old path; but new events obliged us to leave it. The Duke of Argyll himself said that we ought not to allow Afghanistan to become in any degree subservient to Russia; and yet look at the position of Merv and Herat, and see how Russia is gradually drawing its meshes round Afghanistan. You cannot deny it. The Duke of Argyll, however, qualified his remark by saying that “the ordinary consideration of an enlightened policy are enough to guide us.” That is a beautiful and philosophical expression; so philosophical, in fact, that the Ameer did not understand it. Hence Russia is pressing on every side but the North-West Frontier of our Indian Empire on the territory of Afghanistan. And, lastly, one point that has not been referred to in the debate rises in my mind; you may blame the conduct either of this Government or of the last; but the real fact of the case is that there is a fundamental difference between the policy of the two. I will tell you in what it consists. It is a difference in the manner of regarding Russia. The former Administration made common cause with Russia; the present Government is not blind or indifferent to the interests of this country. Over and over again I have heard the right hon. Gentleman use the expression—“Let us imitate the good deeds of Russia.” That was the policy of the late Government, and they were sent about their business. This present Government adopts the wiser policy of Lord Palmerston, which was expressed in these words, and which said of the Cabinet of St. Petersburg—

“When there is moderation at St. Petersburg you may be quite sure it will be followed by duplicity of action.”

Take the advice of Palmerston—the most truly British statesman that ever ruled the country; recollect how all through his life he foresaw our difficulties and always set his face against this Power. Over and over again have I expressed my dissatisfaction with the action of Russia; and I am a disciple of Palmerston, and advocate facing the intrigues with which Russia works her way. When I condemn the action of Russia I condemn it as a most hideous despotism, which accepts no law but the will of an Autocrat, and recognizes no liberty but its own licence. For these reasons I differ from the right hon. Gentleman opposite, and concur in the policy of the present Government. During these troubles in India many people have expressed an opinion that the burden of Government is too great for this country. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich concluded his remarks to-night with a most eloquent peroration about the services of Lord Canning, Lord Mayo, and many others, in which he told us how their great object was to sow peace and prosperity on the borders of our Empire. And this is very true. But we must recollect that the right hon. Gentleman is one of those who think that our Indian Empire is too much for us to bear, and that, therefore, we might part with it. [“No!”] The hon. Gentleman says “No;” but there is a periodical called The Nineteenth Century, in which the right hon. Gentleman had an article on the duties of England, in which he says, with regard to our Possessions in India—

“Here is a tutelage unexampled in history, one-sixth of the human race. The truth is, we are met on every side with proofs that the cares and calls of the British Empire are already beyond the strength of those who govern and have governed it.”

What does that mean? Does that quotation not bear out my statement with regard to the right hon. Gentleman? Perhaps, under another Government than the present we might possibly find its cares and calls too much for those who attempt to govern it. I have to thank the House for the kindness with which it has listened to my remarks; and, in conclusion, I will venture to supplement them with only another sentence. I recollect on the first night of the present Session an hon. Member said—“After all, Afghanistan is but a buffer, as it were, between England and Russia.” I, in common with many others, repudiate altogether such a sentence as that. England requires no buffer between herself and any other Power. She meets her Allies with frankness, and her enemies face to face. We require no buffer in our dealings with any other Power. It is, therefore, with feelings of confidence that the Government will follow a wise policy in these matters, difficult though they may be, that I am prepared, on this grave occasion for the country and the House of Commons, to support the Government as against the Vote of Censure that has been proposed. And, in spite of all the bickerings of Party malice, in spite of the grave indiscretions of those who ought to have known better, and—I say it with feelings of shame and sorrow—in spite of the attempts that have been too often made of late to run down our country to the profit of our enemies, I believe from my heart that the Executive in these grave and serious circumstances have followed the straight and honest path of duty, of honour, and of national self-respect, without which qualities the character and the influence of the proudest nation in the world—like Carthage of old and Rome in her decline—must soon wither and decay.

MR. LEATHAM: Mr. Speaker, the right hon. Baronet who has just sat down (Sir Robert Peel) has made, as he always does, an amusing and energetic speech; but I do not think that he has given us very much to reply to. He has taunted us with making a change of front. There has been no change of front. The noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington), on the first night of the Session, distinctly referred to the Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread); and if he stated that he would not pronounce an opinion until he had read the Blue Books carefully, his hesitation was probably due to the fact that he did not possess the remarkable memory of the right hon. Baronet. I will not follow the right hon. Baronet in his attack upon the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, for he is here to defend himself, and is quite able to do so; but I think the right hon. Baronet might have spared him the comparison with a pettifogging attorney, which was rather a strong expression to fall from so great a purist as the right hon. Baronet. The right hon. Baronet has found fault with the right hon. Gentleman for the terms in which he has referred to Russia, which he said were unbecoming in an ex-Minister; but before he sat down he himself spoke of Russia as “a hateful and insidious Power.” In attacking Lord Lawrence, who is not here to defend himself, the right hon. Baronet attacked his own Friends, who were in Office at the time and fully approved of the policy of Lord Lawrence. In his despatch of 26th December, 1867, the right hon. Gentleman the present Chancellor of the Exchequer writes to the Indian Government, that there was nothing in the Treaty of 1855 requiring Great Britain to support the pretensions of Shere Ali Khan, or of any other Chief, unless his policy appeared likely to promote the internal tranquillity and independence of Afghanistan. With regard to the progress of Russia in Central Asia, Her Majesty's Government “see no reason for any uneasiness, or for any jealousy.” The conquests which Russia has made, and, apparently, is still making, in that region are, in their opinion, the natural result of the position in which Russia was placed; and the whole of the present difficulties to the policy of the late Government. I regret very much that the Government had not the benefit of the right hon. Baronet's counsel. It might have saved them from the "stains" of which he spoke. But I do not attach much importance to the controversy—as to whether or not the late Government can be made to appear, remotely, indirectly, and wholly unintentionally on their part, responsible for the present war. I cannot help thinking that the plea which we so constantly hear, whenever the acts of the present Government are impugned, that the late Government said something, or did something, which countenanced or caused what the present Government are doing now, is a little unworthy of Her Majesty's Ministers. Surely, it is neither very dignified, nor very courageous, the moment your policy is assailed, to seek to throw the blame upon an Administration which ceased to exist nearly five years ago; but I have observed that this is the course which is almost invariably resorted to by the apologists of the Government, whenever they find themselves in an awkward corner. For example, if we call public attention to what we regard as the extravagance of the Government, we are told that the vast expenditure of the country is not due to extravagance, but to measures which were passed by the late Government eight or ten years ago. Now, no doubt measures were passed which gave an opening for expenditure; but the opening has been most diligently improved. Again, I remember that when the Government found itself in what I must call its first scrape—with reference to the Slave Circular—the Diplomatic Correspondence of the last 50 years was ransacked in order to find something which Lord Palmerston or Lord Clarendon had written, which was supposed to justify the course then being pursued by the Government, but which they afterwards happily abandoned. And now, when we complain of this Afghan War as unnecessary and unjust, we are triumphantly told that but for something which Lord Northbrook said to the Ameer five years ago it would never have occurred. Surely, Sir, we have had a great deal too much of this "Please, Sir, it wasn't me" line of defence; a great deal too much for the credit of a Government which ought to have a policy of its own, and one which is susceptible of defence on its own merits. Every one admits that it would have been preposterous if the late Government had done what the Ameer demanded, and engaged to defend him, through thick and thin, against all comers, without taking adequate guarantees that their support should not be abused. How were they to know what whim might enter his head with regard to his own succession? Were they to make themselves parties to all the intrigues of an Oriental harem? and as regards his foreign relations, how was it possible that they should guarantee him against the consequences of acts over which they could exercise no control? The late Government was not quite so ready with its guarantees and protectorates; it was not quite so eager to back everybody's bill, and to mortgage the resources of the country. But I will engage to say that even the present Government, lavish though it has been beyond all precedent with the national guarantees, and prodigal beyond all example of the national future, would have paused before they committed themselves to that kind of guarantee, the denial of which is now assigned as the reason for the estrangement of the Ameer. Indeed, we have the despatch before us which contains the instructions of the Government to the new Viceroy upon this very point; and if we take into consideration the new condition as to Residents in the Afghan cities, the assurances to be given to the Ameer were certainly not more liberal than those which Lord Northbrook gave him. Well, then, if placed in the same circumstances you would have acted in everything which is essential in the same way, is it generous, is it quite manly, to seek to lay this disaster—for disaster it is—at their door? I must confess, Sir, that if I had not formed an opinion already as to the justice of this war, I should conceive the gravest prejudice against it merely from the line of defence which has been adopted by Her Majesty's Ministers. First we have this attempt to shuffle off the responsibility on to other shoulders. Then we have the secret despatch, prepared with a strict regard to publicity. Or is it because the Government wholly despair of keeping anything whatever secret that they send a document, which is not intended to see the light, to the Press before the ink is dry? Why is there this extraordinary discrepancy among the authorities as to the object of the war? Why have we so much circumlocution at the India Office, and so much candour at the Mansion House? Why is it that we hear nothing about a scientific Frontier at the India Office, and nothing about anything else at the Guildhall? To read the despatch one would suppose that we were driven into war by the intolerable insults of the Ameer. To listen to the Prime Minister one would suppose that we were making war with the most brutal indifference to right and wrong. Whom are we to believe—the Secretary for India, writing secrets for everybody to read, or the Prime Minister proclaiming before Gog and Magog reasons which everybody would desire to keep secret? The Prime Minister's reasons I must decline to discuss. It is enough that there is no living casuist, except perhaps The Times, who would dare to defend them on moral grounds. This is a Christian country; and if the Premier wishes to know what is to be said against his reasons, we must leave him alone with the Archbishops. Well, Sir, if that be so, an observation which is attributed to one of the greatest of our living poets exactly describes the situation. He said—

“afford no ground whatever for representations indicative of suspicion or alarm on the part of this country.”

“Now that the robbery had commenced, he hoped it would be conducted with as little murder as possible.”

But are the reasons of the Indian Secretary much better? If we refer to the Ultimatum, we find the casus belli described in effect as follows—namely, the reception of a Russian Envoy

“at a time when a war was believed to be imminent, in which England and Russia would have been arrayed on opposite sides,” and the repulse of the English Mission. The Secretary of State says—

“Such Missions are customary between friendly neighbouring States, and are never refused except when hostility is intended.”—[Afghanistan, No. 1, p. 254.]

Now, surely, there is an exquisite naïveté in these words. Just as though the controversy as to whether such Missions should be received at all—or any Missions—or whether any Englishman, official or non-official, should be admitted to the territory of the Ameer had not been going on all through this voluminous Correspondence. It is simply absurd to treat the Ameer as though he were an European Power, who understood, and had made himself a party to, all the courtesies and requirements of European international life. The Ameer stands altogether outside such requirements. If he did not, all your diplomatic representations would have been unnecessary, and your Mission would have gone to Cabul as a matter of course. But he stands so far outside them that he will not permit even your traders to penetrate into his territory. It is laughable, after indulging in negotiations extending over many years with the view of bringing about a state of things which may approximate in some degree to that which exists as a matter of course among European nations, to turn round upon this half-savage Prince and to apply the rules of Europe. In Europe you receive Embassies, as a matter of course, from every nation with which you are not in a state of war. Why? And this leads me to the kernel of the whole matter. It is because in Europe Embassies are not sent with a view of dictating your foreign policy and crippling your independence. But will the hon. Gentleman who represents the India Office in this House (Mr. E. Stanhope) deny that those were the objects of the Mission which we proposed to send to Afghanistan? Who ever heard of an European Mission 1,000 strong, and armed to the teeth? But if such a Mission presented itself at any European Court, where is the Court so craven as to receive it? And let the House bear in mind that we had received no encouragement to send this Mission. No attempt had been made to ascertain whether it would be distasteful to the Ameer. Everything which had occurred would lead to the inference that it would be distasteful in the extreme. You had no right to expect that your Mission would be received in a friendly manner; yet, because it was not received in a friendly manner you pronounce the act to be one of “enmity and indignity against the Empress of India,” and the right hon. Baronet talks about the “direct insult” which the country has sustained. But the Ameer, basing his notions upon the state of things which you had not only permitted, but sanctioned—the practical isolation of Afghanistan—and upon the understanding which you had with him, and with Dost Mahomed before him—that these Missions should not be sent without his permission—could not fail to regard the approach of an armed and uninvited British Mission as an act of enmity and indignity done to himself, and an insult which he could not put up with, if he were to retain the respect of his subjects. As it seems to me, no pains were spared to insure the failure of this Mission. Not only did you demand its admission in a peremptory tone—not only did you back it up by the assembling of a great armed force, but you proclaimed throughout all India what you were about to do; and you went the length of summoning neighbouring Native Princes to witness the success of your exploit. Your exploit did not succeed; and I must say that I respect the Ameer for the line which he took. It was not a prudent line; perhaps many persons will consider it almost a foolhardy line; but the act was the act of a man who did not lose his self-respect in the presence of great dangers, and who resolved to fall an independent Prince rather than to live on in shameful vassalage. But no doubt I shall be told that the Ameer had departed from his position of isolation by admitting the Mission from Russia, and that he did so at a time when his marked preference for Russia was very galling to this country. I admit it; and if the war with Russia had taken place, you would probably have been justified in regarding him as the ally of Russia, and in making war upon him. But the war with Russia did not take place; and this episode in your quarrel with Russia ought to have gone the way of the quarrel itself. There have been diplomatic representations with regard to the Russian Embassy; and we are told that they have been successful. But the point to which I wish to draw the attention of the House, after the remarks of the right hon. Baronet, is this—that the offence for which you are chastising the Ameer was not the offence of one man. There were two parties to it. There was the man who received the Embassy, and the man who sent it. Who is the greater offender—the petty Prince who yields his trembling friendship, or the great Emperor who demands and extorts it? His designs, at all events, were distinctly hostile. His Mission was intended at the moment as a deliberate menace. If there is anything about the Mission which constitutes a casus belli, you are fighting the wrong man. Nothing appears to be too bad for the weak one; the strong one you leave altogether alone. Is it because you very much prefer punishing the weak one? If so, I commend your prudence; but I have no words of commendation for your magnanimity. And what a moment you have chosen for this war? Granting, for the sake of argument, almost everything which you ask; granting that you had a right to make this war; where was the supreme necessity of making it at a time when every enterprize in the country absolutely demands repose? Right hon. Gentlemen seem to live in a paradise of their own, and in utter ignorance of what is passing around them. The oldest Member of this House cannot recall the time when all the great interests of the country have suffered as they are suffering now. There have been periods of depression in trade, periods of depression in manufacture, and periods of depression in agriculture; but when have all three been smitten by the same simultaneous overthrow? Do right hon. Gentlemen reflect that if the cloud which is hanging over the country be not speedily removed, we shall have to face times of the most frightful penury—if not of the most dangerous discontent? Is this a time to go about brandishing your sword in everybody's face? You have reduced the industry of the country almost to despair already by your incessant menaces and your perpetual appeals to arms. Hardly have we escaped one danger before we find ourselves in the presence of another. But, whether escaped or not, they are all equally costly. Did anyone ever hear of such preparations as those for this Afghan Expedition? I hear that we have purchased 60,000 camels—that is, a chain of camels tied head to tail and extending for 120 miles! The first camel would be marching into the market place at Bristol when the last camel was still stalking through the streets of London. It is monstrous that such expenses should be thrown upon the half-bankrupt Treasury of India. It is almost equally monstrous that they should be thrown upon us, with our declining resources, saddled, as we are, with another war, and thrown upon us, too, for the maintenance of a policy which we have never sanctioned? What is that policy? Is it the policy of the Mansion House? That is a policy from which the conscience of the country openly revolts. Is it the policy of the India Office? Are we making war because the Ameer will not receive our Residents into his cities? That is the concession which only the other day Lord Mayo pledged the good faith of the country should never be asked of him. Some persons say that we have gone to war because the Government have roused a war spirit in the country which they cannot control, and which they are anxious to gratify at the least risk. That reminds me of the story of the learned attorney, who was being run away with in his carriage, and cried out to his coachman—"John, can you stop the horses?" "No, sir," said John. "Then drive into something cheap." But whatever may be the object of the Government in making war, there is an uncomfortable suspicion abroad that the quarrel has not been forced upon us, but that we have picked it. How otherwise can we explain the breaking down of the Conference at Peshawur? No one can read this Correspondence without arriving at the conclusion that the Government resolved to force our Residents upon the Ameer by fair means or foul. To crown all, comes the declaration at the Mansion House. I must confess, Sir, that I find it quite impossible to reconcile all this with a policy of prudence and justice; and therefore that I am unable to sustain the Government by any vote of mine in a course which, I am convinced, all honourable men, when they cease to be blinded by Party and prejudice, must eventually condemn.

MR. FORSYTH said, it was highly improbable the Government would, in the present state of trade and commerce of the country, drive the country into war if it could be avoided. He did not think the people of England would take much interest in recriminations in Parliament. What they were concerned about was the question—Was the war a just and necessary war? If it were proved to be just, they would approve of it; if not, they would condemn it, and the Government who were responsible for it. He believed the war was just; and an attentive perusal of the Papers had convinced him that the man who was to blame was the Ameer himself. It was his perversity, obstinacy, and folly that brought the calamity on his country. Those who blamed Lord Salisbury for a change of policy should bear in mind that the policy of a country changed with circumstances. To show how capricious and untrustworthy this Ameer was he would like the House to see what appeared in page 126 of the Papers on this subject. They would there find the following telegram from the Viceroy to the Deputy Commissioner at Peshawur:—

"The Viceroy has been informed that Sirdar Mahomed Yakooob Khan came to Cabul under a safe conduct from the Ameer, and that notwithstanding the safe conduct he has been placed in custody by His Highness. The Viceroy, as a friend and well-wisher to the Ameer, hopes this report is untrue, and desires strongly to urge His Highness to observe the conditions under which the Sirdar has come to Cabul. By so doing the Ameer will maintain his good name and the friendship of the British Government."

From first to last the Ameer had insisted upon an offensive and defensive alliance with England—first, to guarantee him against civil war, to uphold him on the Throne against all rivals, and to guarantee to him the nomination of his son as heir apparent; and next, to guarantee him against external aggression, and hold him harmless against all foreign foes. Our policy had been not to entangle ourselves with intestine quarrels with Afghanistan, irrespective of the good conduct and rule of the Ameer. At a time when Europe was in a most critical state, when Russia was on the confines of Turkey, and a war was about to begin, the issue of which no man could foresee, and in which we might ourselves very possibly be engaged, we made a request of the Ameer that an Envoy should be sent from Simla to Cabul to discuss with the Ameer the relations between the two countries. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich said that the Government took the statement of that Envoy, and treated his representations as containing a true account of the grievances of the Ameer, when we should have relied entirely on what was said by the Cabul Envoy who came subsequently to Simla. That contention on the part of the right hon. Gentleman was, in his opinion, altogether wrong, for the Agent whose

version of the Ameer's grievances was accepted gave it to us after having been in the most confidential communication with the Ameer. Upon the statement of the Ameer himself the Viceroy was justified in saying that the grievances put forward by that mouthpiece were those upon which the Ameer insisted. At the Peshawur Conference between Sir Lewis Pelly and the Ameer's Envoy, the latter was informed that the Ameer's accepting a British officer to reside on the Frontier would be the condition of our agreeing to an offensive or defensive alliance. The Treaty was actually proposed, and it rested on that condition. The Envoy said he had no power to accept the condition, and the negotiations were broken off. Then it was said we had, in that case, acted precipitately, because another Envoy was on his way, who had full powers to treat. Why should they believe that, when we had for months before been negotiating with Envoys from Afghanistan, and all this time four or five Russian Agents were intriguing at Cabul? The Russian Mission to Cabul was, he might point out, received with great pomp and parade, and was by no means to be regarded as a matter of mere courtesy, as was shown by the evidence contained in the Papers. What, then, were we in those circumstances to do? It had been said that we ought, instead of dealing with Afghanistan, to have gone to Russia; but we had taken that course, and had asked for explanations. As a matter of mere self-defence we were bound to do something to prevent Russia from intriguing in Afghanistan and converting it into a Russian Province. But it was a mistake to suppose that we intended the Envoy whom we proposed to send to the Ameer to be a permanent official; we had merely asked the Ameer to allow us to send an Envoy on a temporary Mission for the purpose of placing the relations between the two countries on a more satisfactory and a sounder footing. It was contended that we had violated International Law by trying to force an Envoy on the Ameer; but that was not so, and it had been distinctly laid down by that eminent jurist, Sir Robert Phillimore, that to refuse to receive an Envoy at all amounted to a breach of International Law. Our Mission having been rejected by the Ameer, we had given him ample time to repent of the insult which he had inflicted upon us; and he wished to know from hon. Gentlemen opposite what other course they would, in similar circumstances, have pursued than that which had been taken by the Government? Were we to retire from Afghanistan baffled and defeated? Such a course would, he maintained, be unworthy of England, and would have disgraced us in the eyes both of Asia and Europe. The war, therefore, in his opinion, had been forced upon us not by any fault of our own, but by the misconduct of the Ameer himself, and we were bound to uphold the honour, safety, and dignity of the country.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that his hon. and learned Friend who had just sat down had set out by declaring that although there might be those who would not agree with him, he believed that the sole cause of this war was the conduct of the Ameer himself, and he ended his speech by a statement which implied that he evidently believed that he had proved what he asserted; but the whole tendency of his remarks went to prove that the cause of offence came from Russia. His hon. and learned Friend had remarked that it had been asserted that there was another Envoy on the road at the time the Conference was ended at Peshawur; and he used words, which he afterwards qualified, that he would not believe a word of it, and that the Envoy had no power. [Mr. FORSYTH: I said no power to accept a Mission.] The hon. and learned Member could not know that. The Viceroy evidently believed it. At page 222 would be found these instructions to Sir Lewis Pelly—

"If, in the meanwhile, new Envoys or messengers arrive to continue negotiation you will tell them that your powers are terminated."

So that it was quite clear that Lord Lytton had considerable reason to believe that there was another Envoy on his way with permission to treat, and even to agree to our proposal. His hon. and learned Friend had said it was a just and necessary war, and he defined a just and necessary war as a war in which there was a just cause for offence. In order to ascertain whether a war was just and necessary, the first document to which it was usual to refer was the Proclamation. Any hon. Member, however, who looked into the Proclamation of Lord Lytton, which had been circulated only that morning, would find that it consisted of unsupported assertions, hardly any one of which was capable of direct proof; and it was somewhat singular that no speaker who had followed the right hon. Member for Greenwich had taken up his challenge to justify the terms of that document. He now came to the speech of the right hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth (Sir Robert Peel), which to those who sat waiting for the customary fireworks gave the impression that for once the powder must have been damp. The right hon. Baronet had referred to Sir Henry Rawlinson as being an impartial witness on the Afghan Question; but the fact was that, eminent though Sir Henry Rawlinson might be in many respects, he was upon that question a very one-sided authority. The right hon. Baronet then went on to speak of the foreign policy of the late Government; but it was somewhat singular that he, who had at the time supported it, should now lose no opportunity of making an attack upon it. Again, the right hon. Baronet probably knew that the language used by M. Gambetta referred to a transaction of which he had most warmly approved; and when he spoke of the policy of the Opposition as supporting Russia over much, he might remember that no speech was ever more strongly Russian than that of the Prime Minister in 1876. The case against the Government was that the Ameer was not, on the whole, unfriendly until he had been forced into the arms of Russia by Lord Lytton's policy, as revealed to him in July, 1876. To this the Government speakers had replied that a few communications had passed between General Kaufmann and the Ameer before that date. Now, those communications had been made known by Shere Ali to the British Agent; they were not important, and they were made by means not of Russian, but of Russian-Afghan Agents. They were, in short, communications of which just complaint should have been made to Russia rather than to the Ameer. The Under Secretary of State for India had declared that Lord Salisbury had had the gift of prophecy, and had foretold the attempt of Russia to establish influence in Afghanistan. But he was reminded by that statement of that astrologer who prophesied long life to an English King. The King having died immediately, the astrologer, in disgust, prophesied his own death upon a given day, and killed himself in order to make his prophecy come true. Lord Salisbury, by his instructions to Lord Lytton, had made his own prophecies come true—that the Ameer would be thrown into the arms of Russia. It was not his intention to examine once more the question that was at issue between the occupants of the two front Benches. He thought the verdict of the country would be that on this secondary point victory rested rather with Lord Northbrook than with the Government, in spite of the casuistry of Lord Salisbury. The Government speakers had tried to show that the late Government had refused to guarantee Shere Ali against foreign conquest; and that for that reason he had thrown himself into the arms of Russia. That was not the case. The late Government had offered to guarantee Shere Ali against foreign conquest; but he wanted a guarantee against domestic insurrection. It might just as well be said that the present Government had refused to guarantee him, for they had made conditions—conditions which they knew he would not accept. Lord Northbrook would not consent to force Residents on the Ameer at the certain cost of war; and Lord Lytton, a more convenient person, had been found—not so much a Viceroy as a diplomatist; a Secretary of Legation rather than a ruler of men, and consequently a puppet in the hands of the Government at home. War had been determined upon. Everybody knew, but Lord Lytton said he did not know, that war was the certain outcome of the policy devised in Downing Street, and carried out by him. War for prestige; war for the rectification of a Frontier. His hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain), in the addition to the Amendment which he had placed upon the Paper, but which he had not moved, had singled out for special attack the concealment by Government from Parliament of their policy. He (Sir Charles W. Dilke) had already said his say with regard to that concealment. The Government would seem to have been too busy preparing the candidature to the Bulgarian Throne of his hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Sir H. Drummond Wolff)

to lay Papers at the proper time before the House. For example, Lord Lytton's Proclamation of War, published on November 22 at Lahore, and which ought to have been published in London on the 23rd, had not been circulated till the morning of December 10. Had it been published at the earlier date they would have been able to have verified its astounding and apparently unsupported statement that—

"The Ameer had openly and assiduously endeavoured by words and deeds to stir up religious hatred against the English, and incited war against the Empire of India."—[Afghanistan, No. 2, p. 20.]

Lord Lytton did not come into court with clean hands, for he had made, also without proof, a year and a-half before, a similar assertion in his memorable despatch about Khelat and Quetta. That Quetta case was, indeed, worthy of more notice than it had received; for it was both the strongest of all the instances of concealment of information from the House, and the main cause of the present Afghan War. There had been frequent allusions in that House, in the other House of Parliament, and in the Press, to many debates in which various Members of the Government had, on different occasions during the last three years, declared that they had initiated no change in our Indian Frontier policy. Little allusion to the Quetta debate had yet been made; for his hon. Friends the Members for the Border Burghs and for Birmingham had quoted it only for another purpose. Now, the only open sign of the change of policy which had occurred had been the advance to Quetta. That advance—the vast moment of which was clear now, but obvious at the time to all who were acquainted with the history of our Frontier policy—had been, according to the practice of the present Government, made without the knowledge of Parliament. Several Questions which had been put in that House had elicited a portion of the facts; but again, according to the practice of the present Government, re-assuring words had been spoken, the effect of which had not afterwards been confirmed. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had, as usual, talked to the House in the manner in which a dentist would talk to a child. The force sent forward had been called an "escort." The House had, over and over again, been informed that the occupation of Quetta was not intended to be permanent. Now, even at that time, it was intended that the occupation should be permanent, and contracts for permanent barracks had been made. He himself (Sir Charles W. Dilke) was not opposed to the occupation of Quetta from what might be called the military point of view; indeed, he had written in its favour as long ago as 1867, distinguishing carefully between political and military considerations; but the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in the debate of August, 1877, had taken exactly the opposite view, and had declared that he was opposed to the occupation from the military point of view, and that political considerations alone might be adduced in its favour. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in his speech, said that he belonged to the school which was

"rather for keeping back, and not committing us to advancing beyond our Frontiers. . . . I have always demurred to the idea which has been put forward by some, that the best way to meet danger is to advance beyond our Frontier, and have always held that the true lines we ought to lay down for ourselves are these—to strengthen ourselves within our Frontiers, and to do so by a combination of measures, moral and material. . . . It is most important that we should in every possible way endeavour to husband the wealth and resources of India . . . rather than that we should expend our force by distance, and weaken ourselves by an unwise advance."—[3 Hansard, ccxxvi. 718-19.]

The Chancellor of the Exchequer went on to explain that these were the views which he had always held as to the best means of protecting India from attack, and "there was no change whatever in the policy of Her Majesty's Government." Looking to the vast importance in its bearing upon our relations to the Ameer—that was to say, from the political point of view, which our occupation of Quetta had had—it was interesting to note that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had used the words, "as to the occupation of Quetta, or rather what has been called the occupation of Quetta"—for he denied that there had been an occupation—

"If we are to regard that advance from a military point of view—a step in the nature of taking up a certain position to defend ourselves against an apprehended attack—then I should maintain the opinion that it would be a false move."

But, he went on to explain, all that had been done had been

"to send an Envoy there . . . accompanied by a sufficient escort to secure him an honourable reception."—[Ibid. p. 720.]

Now, it was very singular to notice that those were exactly the same words which were afterwards made use of by the Government with regard to the despatch of Sir Neville Chamberlain and his lanciers as Envoy and escort to Cabul. He did not know whether Shere Ali read the Parliamentary debates: they had his own statement for the fact that he read Sir Henry Rawlinson's books and memoranda, so perhaps he did. If he did, or if he was advised by those who did, he must have drawn his own conclusions. With regard to Quetta, at all events, the mask was off; and it must be borne in mind that the House had been kept in ignorance of the advance until the occupation of Quetta had become an accomplished fact. The House had then been assured that it was no occupation at all, and had been told that all that we had done was to send an Envoy accompanied by a sufficient "escort" to secure him an honourable reception. Yet, at that very time, the erection of permanent barracks had already been begun; the telegraph had partly been laid down; and a survey had been made with a view to the extension to Quetta of the Indian railway system. There was another singular resemblance between the action of the Government in the Quetta matter and their action in the present case. The Papers with regard to Khelat and Quetta had been asked for in March, 1877, and they had been pressed for anxiously in April. They had been promised "immediately" in April, and they had been distributed on the 21st July, when it was altogether too late for the House of Commons to interfere. Three and a-half months appeared to be the usual time during which the present Government was accustomed to keep back Papers of vital moment which they had promised to give "immediately." Now, even Sir Henry Rawlinson had admitted that the occupation of Quetta was a most serious matter, and had said—

"It is doubtful how such a proceeding would be regarded at Candahar and Cabul. . . . If, as is more probable, the tribes in general regarded this erection of a fortress—above the passes, although not on Afghan soil—as a menace, or as a preliminary to a further hostile advance, then we should not be justified, for so small an object, in risking the rupture of our friendly intercourse."—[Afghanistan, No. 1, p. 41.]

That was exactly the view which he (Sir Charles W. Dilke) had always taken. It was the view which the present Government had taken at one time, and their sudden departure from it had had the effect which everybody, which even Sir Henry Rawlinson himself, had anticipated. Yet, as he had shown, the Government had kept all knowledge of the momentous step from Parliament until it was too late, and even after it was accomplished had assured the House that there was no occupation, and no change of policy. He would now, for a few minutes, dwell upon the facts revealed by the Papers "Central Asia, No. 1." It was a humiliating story. On August 8 last the India Office had written to the Foreign Office to the effect that Shere Ali had received a Russian Mission backed by "four columns" with "15,000 men," and suggesting that he had received the Mission "under pressure." The India Office insisted that the Russian Government should be brought to book, the "Russian Cabinet" as they said—a phrase which was rather wild, as there was not, and never had been, a Cabinet in Russia. These were their words—

"It is the Russian Cabinet alone which is responsible for the acts of its Agent, and it is the Russian Governor General of Turkestan, rather than the Ameer Shere Ali, who, with or without authority, is at this moment pursuing a policy of which the effect must be to seriously agitate the minds of Her Majesty's subjects throughout India."—[Central Asia, No. 1 (1878) p. 143.]

He (Sir Charles W. Dilke) thought so too; but what had their valiant Government done? They had begun by the use of brave words. They had informed Russia of what they, very properly, had called her "breach of her engagement." They told Russia that she was "menacing" the "integrity of Afghan territory." It was Russia, not England, who, according to England, was menacing the integrity of Afghan territory in September last. On the 19th August, and again early in September, we had been defending the integrity of Afghan territory. On the 9th November we were "rectifying our Frontier" by helping ourselves to Afghan soil. Looking to the present condition of Afghanistan, it would seem as though our defence of the integrity of the Afghan territory had been as fatal to that integrity as our defence of the integrity and independence of the Turkish Empire had been fatal to the integrity of Turkey. Our Government had told Russia that it was "impossible for us to ignore or overlook" what had occurred. They insisted that the Russian Mission should "be at once withdrawn." Russia had laughed at us. The Russian Foreign Minister was away; the Czar was away; the Acting Minister was away, having left the capital without sending a note to the British Embassy, although he had been courteously informed by the Embassy that we wished for an immediate answer. On the 10th September we had again insisted. Our Government then said that there was "no excuse" for what had occurred, and "pressed for a reply." At last, after more than three weeks' delay, we got a sort of reply. The words used with regard to the Russian Mission to Cabul were those which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had used a year-and-a-half before with regard to our "Mission" to Quetta. The Russian Mission to Cabul was "of a provisional nature." Naturally dissatisfied with this reply; afraid to hit Russia, yet determined to hit somebody, our brave Government hit Shere Ali; in fact, they tied him down to hit him, not giving him time to get away. He had received a Russian Mission, received it, as we ourselves admitted, "under pressure" from "four columns" of "15,000 men," and because he had done so we, shrinking from the possible consequences of our big words to Russia, fell on Shere Ali. The conduct of the Government had been the conduct of a bully; of a big boy afraid of another big boy, and hitting that big boy's acquaintance, who was small. England had suddenly turned from its defence of the integrity of the Afghan territory in September, and in November was "rectifying her Frontier" by the annexation of the Koorum. What could we expect to be the consequence of this cowardly policy? Had it made us any the safer against Russia? The result would probably be the occupation by Russia of Merv, which had been, over and over again, declared to be the key to Herat, itself the key to India. The rectification of our Frontier would do nothing towards preventing that occupation. Had or had not our Government, by their action, made our possession of India more secure? The attack on Afghanistan, like the bringing to Malta of 7,000 under-officered black troops, like the Anglo-Turkish Convention, like the occupation of Cyprus by a fevered battalion as a "strong place of arms," were all measures which had had for their object the security of India. Was India more secure at the present moment than it had been in the days of Lord Northbrook's rule? What was to be the outcome of the quarrel in which, by the action of the Government, they had become involved? They had been assured that there was to be no large annexation. But it was necessary to provide securities that the well-meaning section of the Cabinet should not be dragged by Indian fire-eaters into an annexation, or veiled annexation, of Afghanistan. Annexation had been disowned, but Sir Henry Rawlinson was still awake and active, and possessed great influence with the present Indian Government, and with some members of the Cabinet. The first Napoleon had said—"There is but one disease of which great Powers die; they die of indigestion." The Government had swallowed Fiji, Cyprus, and the Transvaal, and these had not agreed with us too well. They had the power, if they so pleased it, to swallow Afghanistan; and in the spring their friends were certain to insist that they should do so. Should we be able to digest it? It was a tough morsel, as we should find to our cost. He denied that our Indian prestige could possibly be raised. On the contrary, he asserted that it must be lowered by conduct of the kind he had described. The rectification of our Frontier was, of course, intended to make us safer against the advance of Russia; but he doubted whether it would have that effect; and a rectification of our Frontier obtained at such a sacrifice of honour and dignity as had been incurred could certainly have no consequence of the kind. And as regarded its material and physical effects, the probability was that Russia would think that her prestige in Asia would receive a blow if she did not make a move, which we would not be able to prevent, and our material and physical prestige would have suffered vastly more than it would have gained by this unjust war.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, it was with great regret that he found himself, for the first time, taking part in a Party debate on Indian affairs; but he should not complain if the debate had been carried on calmly, deliberately, and in argumentative language, such as the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea had throughout used. But his charge against the Government for withholding information about the occupation of Quetta was most unjust. His (Lord George Hamilton's) own statements on a former occasion were perfectly consistent with the Papers now laid upon the Table of the House. In 1875, owing to the policy—or rather to the want of policy—which had been adopted, the affairs of Beloochistan were in frightful confusion. Lord Northbrook had before him three alternatives—first, the annexation of that country; second, the total abstinence from interference with it—in which case, in all probability, some other Power would have interfered—and, thirdly, the course which Lord Northbrook himself had adopted. At the time that Lord Lytton was on his way to India he telegraphed to Lord Northbrook not to send an Envoy to Beloochistan until he arrived, because he wished to state the reasons for his interference in Beloochistan to the Ameer of Cabul, in order to allay any suspicions he might have as to our objects. Lord Northbrook, however, did not comply with that request, but sent his Envoy a week before his successor arrived with his own instructions. Major Sandeman succeeded in temporarily pacifying that country. Lord Lytton was far from wishing to occupy Quetta; even up to the end of 1876 he was adverse to it. The only reason of his doing so at last was because Major Sandeman and the military officers who went with him reported that Quetta was the only place the occupation of which would protect our trade, and fulfil the objects of our interference. He believed that if Lord Northbrook had been Viceroy he would have pursued the same policy. They might, however, dismiss altogether this question of Quetta in discussing the affairs of Afghanistan. In the early part of the evening a very remarkable speech was made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich. The right hon. Gentleman had carefully selected extracts from the context for quotation, the words of which were capable of bearing the exact construction which he wished to have placed upon them, and he made the choice for that sole and special purpose. Upon those quotations the right hon. Gentleman based one of the most formidable indictments, or rather series of indictments, ever thrown at any Government. He stated positively that when Lord Northbrook left India the relations between the Indian Government and Afghanistan were perfectly satisfactory.

MR. GLADSTONE: No. In the main.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Oh! in the main.

MR. GLADSTONE: Yes, certainly. I said, "in the main;" and I repeated the phrase over and over again.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, he would accept the correction of the right hon. Gentleman that he used the phrase "in the main"—whatever that might mean. The right hon. Gentleman next said that at the time at which we came into Office there was no reason whatever for attempting in any way to alter those relations. The right hon. Gentleman next said that the Indian Government deliberately and wantonly, contrary to the opinion of everybody who had any experience of Afghanistan, insisted upon forcing upon the Ameer officers whose location in Afghanistan would have been absolutely fatal to the independence of that country; that the negotiations were so conducted that they were intended to fail; that at the very moment the Viceroy knew the Envoy was coming to accept his terms, he deliberately broke off negotiations lest they should be accepted; and that the Indian Government had forced and hunted the Ameer into a corner, and had then on some frivolous pretext made war on him. The right hon. Gentleman then expressed his own opinion that the policy of the Government had not been what they pretended; but that their sole object throughout had been to annex a certain portion of Afghanistan. And the right hon. Gentleman, before he undertook to prove these allegations, took a course which it was to be hoped, for the credit of the House, would not be taken again—he deliberately stated that documents, signed by the Viceroy of

[Second Night.]

India, the Commander-in-Chief in India, and six of the ablest men in the most incorruptible service in the world, were, he would not say false, but contained gross and unpardonable errors and extraordinary deviations from fact, which, as they all knew, was merely an oratorical device for stating that the despatches of the Indian Government were not true. The right hon. Gentleman then found that there was one person in whom he could place implicit confidence; one whose every syllable was true, and against whose word any utterance of the Viceroy or his Council was not for a moment to be placed—this was the Envoy of the Ameer, who came down to Peshawur to negotiate on behalf of his master with the Indian Government. Now, the right hon. Gentleman had had 50 years of experience in political life, and he must know that when negotiations of that kind were entered upon it was the invariable custom for the negotiators to assume things which were not altogether correct for the purpose of obtaining the successful issue of such negotiations; and that all through these Conferences the Afghan Envoy always acted upon the assumption that the Ameer had got everything he wanted, though this assertion was the exact reverse of the language used by the same Envoy in 1873. The right hon. Gentleman then proceeded to charge Lord Lytton with having thrown to the winds all the assurances of Lords Northbrook and Mayo; but it was capable of proof that the interpretation put upon those assurances by Lord Lytton was identical with those of the right hon. Gentleman's own Government. In support of the charges which the right hon. Gentleman made against the accuracy of the Papers, he commented upon a statement in them that certain negotiations occupied several weeks which only took up a few days; but if he had examined the Papers a little more closely he would have found that these negotiations occupied exactly three weeks. Then with regard to the number of the grievances of which it was said the Ameer complained, the right hon. Gentleman endeavoured again here to make a strong point; but here again he would find that the statements made by different Envoys were described accordingly; and, further, that all the statements as well as the reports upon them were fully set out in the Papers which had been presented to Parliament, without any attempt at concealment. All the Indian Government did was, finding there were eight grievances stated by the first man, of which four were very trivial, to select four out of the eight, calling them special grievances; and, as regarded the statement of the Afghan Envoy, they call especial attention to it in the following words:—

“The statement of the Afghan Envoy, which is herein enclosed, in an interesting, instructive, and important document.”

He could not understand how an ex-Prime Minister, possessing more official experience than anybody in the House, could come down and deliberately state that he would put implicit confidence in the statement of an Envoy from Afghanistan—when it was in accordance with his own views—and would not credit what was set forth on their authority by the Viceroy and his Council. He regretted the right hon. Gentleman should have adopted such a course. Speaking from his own knowledge and experience as Under Secretary of State for India at the time when these transactions took place, he could assure the right hon. Gentleman that the officers whose statements he had impugned were men of honour as high as was his own. The right hon. Gentleman had eulogised every other Viceroy, but had held up Lord Lytton to the opprobrium of the House. He could not understand why Lord Lytton, whose responsibilities and difficulties since his assumption of office had been so grave and continuous, was to be thus treated by a political opponent. Lord Northbrook had recently made some amazing statements; but the noble Lord was a man of honour, and he (Lord George Hamilton) implicitly believed in his good faith. He saw no reason, therefore, why Lord Lytton and his advisers should not be treated with a moiety, at any rate, of the confidence and consideration which we reposed in his predecessor. The charges launched against them by the right hon. Gentleman were very formidable; and he hoped the House would excuse him if he went at some little length into what the actual state of affairs in India was when the present Government assumed office. If everything was at that time perfectly satisfactory, then he would admit they were unwise and deserving of blame in altering the situation. If, on the other hand, it could be shown that their relations were unsatisfactory; that every year they were getting worse and worse; that they might at any moment have been involved in a war with Russia, on account of entangling and undefined obligations, then he thought the position was altered, and that that which was in the one case unwise would be in the other absolutely necessary. It seemed to him that it was not thoroughly understood why successive Viceroys had attached such enormous importance to having a friendly and independent Power in Afghanistan. Afghanistan had a Frontier from which at any moment the Natives could invade or make a raid on India. The people who inhabited those mountains were, to use the language of Lord Lawrence, "a faithless, lawless, plundering people," who would join en masse an invasion of India from the West. It was an utter delusion to suppose that mountains were insuperable obstacles to invasion. India and Italy resembled each other in their geographical peculiarities; but no two countries had been so frequently and so successfully invaded as Italy and India, and in every single instance, save in our own case, the invaders of India came through the mountains. The reason there was so little danger there was that England was stronger in military power than Afghanistan. It was because they placed a large number of soldiers along the Frontier that they overawed the Afghans; and in proportion as the Afghans became disciplined and organized, so must we increase our Frontier forces and our military expenditure. It was said that it would be much better if they devoted their attention to internal reforms rather than to strengthening their Frontiers externally. This was true to a certain extent, but to a certain extent only. In any country, the people of which were homogeneous and self-governing, the more contented the majority were, the stronger was the Government of that country. But the people of India were not homogeneous, nor in any sense self-governing. The history of India for centuries before our advent was the rule of successive warlike minorities over peaceful agricultural majorities. The intrigues, cruelty, and rapine of these warlike tribes and castes made India for many years one battle-field; we were, in consequence, forced to interfere, and little by little to absorb the whole country. We, by the strong arm of the law, gave to the majority of the Natives of India a protection, such as they had never had before, from those who for centuries had fattened on them. To keep these elements of turbulence and disorder under control, we sent large numbers of troops from this country, and their presence maintained peace and order. The larger the number we had to station on the Frontier, the less there were for this purpose. To put our position in a graphic way before the House, let us assume that England was in such danger of invasion that it became necessary to garrison Portsmouth and Plymouth with Metropolitan police. The absence of the guardians of the peace might incite the criminal classes of London to do that which their presence would effectually prevent. It was for grave practical reasons such as these, and not for any chimerical dread of a Russian invasion, that we declined to allow the influence of any European Power to become predominant in Afghanistan, for the presence even of a few European officers with money and artillery would give us an infinity of trouble and expense. The next thing they had to consider was the means by which to attain that object. They made a mistake in 1838. They attempted internal interference and they failed, and for many years afterwards they did nothing to re-establish friendly relations. The history of Afghanistan for that period was well known to the House; but he must express his opinion that the policy which was sometimes called the "masterly inactivity" of Lord Lawrence, in 1864, had one great merit. It was a safe policy; but in every other sense it was absolutely unworthy of a great civilized Power. What he said to the Afghan Princes was this—"You may fight and kill each other; we shall keep the ring. Nobody shall interfere with you; and the successful combatant, who shall temporarily establish his Sovereignty, shall be entitled to the recognition of the English Government." To such an extent was this carried that there was a record of a letter being sent to the then Sovereign of Cabul, and the messenger was instructed to be careful who got it, as someone else might be in power when he arrived there. When Shere Ali overcame his opponents Lord Lawrence departed from his policy, and assisted him with arms and money. That was done at a time, certainly, when Shere Ali least required them; but he was grateful. Lord Mayo succeeded in ingratiating Shere Ali at Umballa, not because he followed the policy of Lord Lawrence, but because he departed from it: for there was no identity whatever between the original policy of Lord Lawrence and that of Lord Mayo and Lord Northbrook. Lord Mayo said that the policy which his Government had adopted was an intermediate policy. An intermediate policy meant that it was the natural consequence of something already done; and, in this instance, consisted of laying down certain lines of action capable of expansion as time went on. The right hon. Gentleman opposite had said that Lord Lytton had extinguished the promises of Lord Mayo; but what authority was there for that assertion? If the right hon. Gentleman would look at the official letter addressed by Sir Lewis Pelly to Shere Ali, he would find these words—"The British Government repudiates all liabilities on behalf of the Ameer. It does not withdraw from any obligation previously contracted by it; but it emphatically denies that it ever incurred such obligations as those alleged by Shere Ali, and will never undertake such obligations without the amplest guarantees." The interpretation which Shere Ali's Envoy put on Lord Mayo's assurances was that which already had been repudiated both by the Duke of Argyll, in 1869, and Lord Northbrook in 1873. Lord Mayo, during his Viceroyalty, succeeded in satisfying Shere Ali. He succeeded, not because he acceded to all or to most of his requests, but because Shere Ali felt that he was dealing with a man he could thoroughly trust. Between 1869 and 1873 our relations with Shere Ali were most satisfactory—more so, indeed, than they had been at any period before or since. Then Lord Northbrook succeeded Lord Mayo, and was Viceroy from 1872 to 1876. He had a very high personal opinion of Lord Northbrook; but it could not be denied that during the time Lord Northbrook was Viceroy Lord Lawrence's policy absolutely collapsed under the management of the late Government. The basis of that policy was this. "Be quiet in your Frontiers; do not in any way frighten the Afghans:

and the nearer Russia approaches towards Afghanistan, the more she will gravitate towards you—not from love to you, but from fear of the Russians." What Lord Lawrence predicted took place. The Ameer became thoroughly alarmed at the advance of Russia, and applied for definite assurances of protection. The Papers showed that his one object was to obtain definite assurances against Russian aggression. There had been some recrimination with regard to what took place in connection with the meeting at Simla. He thoroughly accepted Lord Northbrook's assurance. But the question was not what interpretation we now, in 1878, placed upon Lord Northbrook's assurance; but what interpretation Shere Ali placed upon it in 1873. This was a point of some little importance. Shere Ali believed, as was clearly shown by his letter, that his request with regard to an alliance had been unconditionally refused; and what steps did the late Government take to remove that impression? With the single exception of two telegrams from the Duke of Argyll, there is not a single line in the Office of despatches from the Duke of Argyll to Lord Northbrook on the subject during the whole time he was in India. When, however, the Duke of Argyll found his Party interests or his personal reputation attacked, he was not content to defend himself with meagre telegrams, but wrote three columns in The Times of vigorous invective. If but a moiety of the same industry had been displayed in 1873, in correcting Shere Ali's misapprehension, how different would our relations with him have been. While, on the one hand, Shere Ali found that his advances for an external alliance were rejected, on the other hand, unfortunately, Lord Northbrook was compelled to interfere, by protesting against the imprisonment of his son, Yakoob Khan. Thus the two principles of our previous policy were reversed; we refused an external alliance; we interfered internally in what Shere Ali believed to be the most sacred of the internal affairs of Afghanistan. When he contrasted the state of the relations which existed between Shere Ali and the Indian Government when Lord Lytton arrived in India and those which existed on the arrival there of Lord Northbrook, he was, he must confess, surprised at the observations on the subject.

which had been made by the right hon. Gentleman opposite. During the Viceroyalty of Lord Northbrook the advance of Russia in Central Asia had been greater than during any former period. Khokand had been annexed; Khiva had been annexed, contrary to the assurances which had been given by the Russian Government; and a Treaty had been made with Bokhara which made Russia practically supreme in all those regions. If, therefore, there was any efficacy in the policy of Lord Lawrence Shere Ali ought to have been more friendly to us when Lord Northbrook left India than when he arrived there, because Russia was much nearer to our Frontier. Now, everybody who knew Lord Northbrook must be aware that he would leave no stone unturned to bring a policy in which he so thoroughly believed to a successful issue. Neither was he in any way overruled by the Home Government. Let the House contrast our relations with the Ameer in 1873, when he was ready to receive an English officer on a friendly Mission to Cabul, and those which subsequently existed in April, 1876. The first act of Lord Lytton was to make exactly the same request, which was curtly refused. Up to 1873 Shere Ali gratefully received a subsidy from the Indian Government; for years previous to 1876 that subsidy was sullenly refused. Up to 1873, almost to the end of 1874, not only were the letters of General Kaufmann sent to the Indian Government, but they were asked to answer them. In the year preceding 1876 the Ameer made no such request, and there was reason to believe that he was receiving a far greater number of letters then than before. Up to 1873 every request of the Indian Government and all their advances were graciously granted and accepted by Shere Ali. Between 1873 and 1876 they were invariably ignored. The Ameer positively refused, in the most discourteous terms, to allow Mr. Forsyth and other Englishmen to pass through his territory. He absolutely ignored altogether Lord Northbrook's intervention on behalf of his son; and he could not, in short, conceive a more unsatisfactory state of affairs than that which then prevailed. That was not all. During the time Shere Ali received 12 cannons, 21,000 rifles, 1,200 carbines, and £250,000. How, under those circumstances, he would ask, could the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich contend that our relations with the Ameer were so satisfactory, as he had described them to be? The right hon. Gentleman had used very strong language with regard to certain statements which had been made by Lord Lytton; but he should like to call the attention of the House to a statement which had been made by the right hon. Gentleman himself. The right hon. Gentleman, speaking a short time ago, said—

“We found the Indian policy of the country justly and wisely guided by a man who, though he did not belong to our political Party—I mean Lord Mayo—yet was as honest and as good a Governor General as ever held the high Office of Viceroy of India. Within three or four months after we acceded to Office a meeting of the most friendly character was held at Umballa, where Shere Ali, the Ameer of Afghanistan, and his favourite son, stood upon the platform as friendly, by the side of Lord Mayo. Lord Mayo, at a fixed point in the proceedings, produced a jewelled sword, and handed it to Shere Ali, and said—‘I trust Your Highness will use this sword with effect against your enemies;’ and Shere Ali replied—‘I will use it against every enemy of the Queen of England.’ That was the state of feeling; that was the state of affairs which prevailed at the commencement of our government on the North-Western Frontier of India; and that was the state of affairs when we handed them over to the charge of our successors in Office.”

MR. GLADSTONE said, that he was not responsible for the accuracy of the newspaper reports from which the noble Lord quoted; but he, in truth, spoke of the state of affairs as being substantially the same.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, that the word “substantially” did not appear in any report of this speech. But that our relations were, at the time of which he was speaking, eminently unsatisfactory, he thought he had demonstrated. He now had to deal with by far the most embarrassing part of the circumstances which they found to exist on their assumption of Office. Lord Northbrook had undertaken that, under certain circumstances, the Indian Government would assist Shere Ali by force in resisting Russian aggression; but he had made no arrangement whatever for carrying out that assurance. At any moment General Kaufmann might advance, and we should have found ourselves in this position—either we must acquiesce in his annexation, and imperil our influence as well as the sanctity of our assurances, or else go to war with Russia. Her Majesty's Government believed the maintenance of peace to be one of the greatest of British interests; they declined, therefore, to allow the greatest of British interests to rest on no safer foundation than the validity of General Kaufmann's assurances, or the whims of a sulky and semi-civilized barbarian. He had, he thought, revealed a state of affairs that called for some remedy. Lord Salisbury, he wished to add, had not acted in a haphazard or hasty manner in the matter. He had deliberately looked through the records, and he had ascertained, upon evidence which to his mind was perfectly indisputable, that Shere Ali was willing, in 1869, to receive British Agents in certain places. Captain Grey, whose opinion was of the greatest weight—for he was not a mere interpreter between the Ameer and Lord Mayo, but had been specially told off to attend to that Potentate—had said that the Ameer did freely consent to the appointment of British officers in Balkh, Herat, and other places. That statement was confirmed by the terms of the despatch from Lord Mayo, as well as by the letter of Shere Ali in 1869. Yet they were now told by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich that the introduction of an Agent into Afghanistan was impossible and inconsistent with the independence of that country. In the year 1869 the language of Shere Ali was exactly the reverse. He said—

“I strongly hope that the British Government will always do good and be kind to me, and keep me under its protection.”—[Afghanistan, No. 1, p. 91.]

Lord Salisbury, therefore, communicated with the Indian Government, and asked them to take measures to ascertain whether Shere Ali would agree to the appointment of an Agent at Herat. That Agent was to be placed there simply in order to report the proceedings and advances of the Russians, and thus to give the British Government in India time to avert a collision which everybody wished to avoid. If there was any doubt upon the matter, the reply of the Indian Government was conclusive. They said that if Russian authority were established over Turkestan

sirable to enter into a Treaty engagement with him; and the establishment of a British Resident at Herat would be the natural consequence of such an engagement and of the nearer approach of the Russian frontier.”—[Afghanistan, No. 1, pp. 134-5.]

To that despatch Lord Salisbury had replied that he could not accept the opinion that we ought to wait until Merv was occupied, as then our opportunity would, in all probability, be past. Then he said that, although a refusal to receive an Agent would illustrate the feebleness of our interest with the Ameer, yet no useful purpose would be served by keeping up an appearance of influence with him without the reality. He went on to say that he considered it of paramount importance that our whole relations with the Ameer should be put upon a satisfactory footing. The first step would be to induce him to receive an Envoy, for which a pretext must be found, or, if necessary, “created.” To this expression “create” a great deal of strong language had been very needlessly devoted. He would undertake to say that there was not a sensible man in that House who, finding that, through misapprehension, his relations with some neighbour were becoming unfriendly, would not take an opportunity—or, failing that, create an opportunity—by which he could correct that misapprehension. That was what Lord Salisbury did; for the Envoy was to be sent for the purpose of discussing matters with Shere Ali and ascertaining what his real views were. In reply to that despatch the Indian Government once more invited the Home Government, if they wished to establish fresh relations with Shere Ali, to give instructions to the Viceroy to do so, and that was exactly what Lord Salisbury did. He gave instructions, in the most definite terms, to Lord Lytton to act in as friendly a manner as possible towards the Ameer. The hon. Gentleman opposite had assumed that our relations with the Ameer were thoroughly satisfactory. He thought he had proved that nothing could be more unsatisfactory and dangerous than the state of those relations when they came into Office. Such being the real state of affairs, it might be a matter of opinion how best they could be remedied. Some were inclined to do nothing; shut their eyes to the danger of the position, and trust to the chapter of accidents. Such a policy of inactivity was justifiable and "masterly" on one condition alone—that time was on your side. But if every year your difficulties grew, and your position became worse, a policy of inactivity was both culpable and cowardly. We wished to avert war; and, with the unhappy precedent of the Crimean War before us, we believed war could be best averted by plainly stating what we could allow and what we could not. The first essential of such a policy was to obtain accurate information as to Russian movements in Central Asia. Those who placed implicit confidence in the assurance of an Autocrat, because he had, or was supposed to have, complete control over his servants, committed a great blunder. The more autocratic a State was, the more dependent the Sovereign was upon the good-will of his Civil and Military Services. When once any policy of aggression became so ingrained in the minds of a Service as to become a tradition, there was nothing to prevent the realization of that tradition except the personal will of the Head of the State. He was liable, however, to removal by death, and other agencies. The prosecution of the policy of aggression was continuous, whilst the opposition was intermittent and uncertain. Everybody knew that there was a tradition among a certain section of Russian society that it was their mission, one day or other, to conquer India. It was also known that there were certain adventurous generals in Central Asia who utterly disregarded the assurances given at St. Petersburg; and until the British Government had the power to put an Agent at Herat they were in continual danger of the outbreak of war with Russia. Every possible precaution was taken to insure the success of the Mission to the Ameer. But the tone which Shere Ali had adopted towards the Indian Government was one in which it had never been addressed before; his Envoy throughout had endeavoured to cause delay. At the very time—at the very moment—when we were proposing to concur with his master in an unconditional alliance, by which we should undertake to support him under all circumstances, there came rumours from all quarters that he was engaged in stirring up a Jihad, or religious war, on the Border. These rumours were the source of the greatest possible anxiety to Lord Lytton's Government, though they did not like to break off negotiations on that account, for it would then have been necessary to make it a casus belli. But, on the other hand, Lord Lytton did not think, in the exercise of the discretion with which he had been intrusted, that he would be justified in concluding a dynastic Treaty with a man who was endeavouring to promote a war of extermination against us. He must again protest against the manner in which the right hon. Gentleman had quoted from the despatch of Lord Lytton—that the negotiations were broken off simply because the Ameer did not show sufficient eagerness to reciprocate our friendship. If he had only read one line lower down in the despatch he would have seen what Lord Lytton's real reason was, and how, by promptly seizing the opportunity afforded by the death of the Envoy, he extricated himself from the difficulty. A great deal had been said about a change of policy, and much hard language had been used against the Government in consequence of that change having led us into war. What was this change of policy? There was no proposal to interfere in the internal affairs of Afghanistan, nor had it ever been proposed to force upon the Ameer a Resident at Cabul whose presence would have overshadowed the authority of the Ameer. No such proposal was ever made; and it was a totally different thing to sending an Agent to the Frontier to enable the Indian Government to carry out the guarantee that had been entered into with the Ameer. In the Instructions given by Lord Lytton to our Native Agent at Cabul, which would be found on page 186 of the Papers, it was stated that "It will be the duty of any such British Agents to watch the external affairs of the Frontier, furnishing timely and trustworthy intelligence thereof to the Ameer, as well as to the British Government. Should the Ameer at any time have good cause to complain that any British Agent has interfered in the internal affairs of the country, the Agent will at once be recalled."

The present Government were in agreement with the late Government as to the internal policy in Afghanistan; but as regarded the external policy there was this difference—that Lord Northbrook had offered the Ameer a binding, but not unconditional assurance; whereas the present Government had given an assurance which was unconditional, except for this one stipulation—that if we undertook responsibility in the matter we must have an Agent on the Frontier to prevent Shere Ali from embroiling us in war, as without it he could have done at any moment he liked. The main reason for making our assurance unconditional and definite was the evidence, of which the Indian Government were possessed, that Lord Northbrook's proposal in 1872 being conditional had caused great displeasure to the Envoy from the Ameer. In 1873, when the Ameer's Envoy came to Simla and asked Lord Northbrook to give him an English guarantee, that noble Lord, in reply, gave him a Russian assurance to the effect that General Kaufmann's intentions were perfectly friendly. He scarcely liked to refer to the sarcastic observations of the Envoy on the subject of the introduction of the name of Russia into the negotiations. He said—

“As regards the name of Russia, which I mentioned in connection with aggression, it was owing to an observation made by Lord Northbrook in the interview of the 12th of July, who said, ‘It is necessary that the Ameer should be informed that, since the country of Afghanistan is a ‘buffer’ between the territories of the English and Russian Governments, it is therefore advantageous for Hindustan that Afghanistan should be strong and independent.’ Therefore, since he called Afghanistan the buffer against Russia, does this, or not, prove the aggression of Russia? Ultimately the Viceroy observed that ‘even a friendly Government can become an aggressor. But the English Government, considering the repeated certain assurances which they have received from the Russian Government, cannot entertain any likelihood of it.’ After hearing this, I remained silent, because I thought that unity and friendship between Governments is a matter of the greatest importance.”—[Ibid. p. 205.]

He did not know how the English Government, with the knowledge it possessed that Russia did not care for its own assurances, could expect Afghanistan, which was most liable to attacks from Russia, to place implicit confidence in its assurances. He thought that he had shown that the situation which existed when he came into office was one with which it was absolutely necessary for them to deal. His firm belief was that if right hon. Gentlemen opposite had been in Office, and had known the facts, they would have taken the same course. Unfortunately, the Ameer did not trust the sincerity of the British Government; from first to last he had played with them. Then came this unhappy business of receiving the Russian Mission. When hon. Gentlemen opposite said that we had gone to war with the Ameer because he received the Russian Mission, they totally and entirely mistook the cause of the war, which was not because he received the Russian Mission, but because he by force refused to receive ours. For years past the Ameer had said that he would not receive any English Mission, as he could not be responsible for their lives; and that if he received English officers he must also receive Russian officers. At a moment when our relations were most strained with Russia he ostentatiously received a Russian Mission at Cabul, thus plainly showing that his previous reason against receiving English officers was a mere pretext. It must be remembered that the Ameer of Cabul was not the only Asiatic Prince with whom we had to deal. There were a great number of Princes under our protection who possessed far greater wealth and power than he did, and who were besides far superior to him in culture and intelligence. They would never be allowed, and they had never attempted, to treat the English Government in the way that the Ameer had. But because a man was a barbarian he could not be allowed to set us at defiance. They were watching our conduct in this matter; and, in all probability, if we were to act without firmness in his case some of the Indian Princes would be adopting the tactics of the Ameer. He trusted that he had shown that the action the Government had taken did not in any way deserve the language which had been applied to it; and he hoped that he had also shown that a very considerable number of the charges which had been brought against the Government were mere fictions. There was another question which had been raised. It was said that if we went to war with anyone we ought to have gone to war with Russia. But the main object and policy of the British Government as regarded the North-Western Frontier of India was to have upon it not only a friendly, but also an independent Power. If they had had a war with Russia because it had sent a Mission to Cabul, they would at once have made Russia responsible for the conduct of the Ameer, and, by making her responsible, have placed Afghanistan under Russian tutelage. We should then have had to fight Afghanistan, plus Russia; and the object of the war being to maintain the independence of Afghanistan, we should, at the outset, have destroyed it. If we were successful in the war having destroyed the independence of Afghanistan, we should have been compelled to annex it, a consummation all wished to avert. He could not conceive any single object which would have been gained by going to war with Russia. Had a little more care and attention been exercised some years ago, it was his firm opinion that the necessity for war at the present time would have been avoided. If, on the other hand, finding matters as they were, the British Government had allowed the Ameer to set it at defiance, and had not insisted upon the reception of its Mission, war would only have been postponed for a time, and would have inevitably broken out at a later period; perhaps under more disadvantageous circumstances. Before he sat down, he wished to say a word concerning the Viceroy of India, who, he thought, had not been very fairly treated in the course of that debate. It had never been the fashion before to distinguish between the Viceroy and the Government under which he served, and to hold him up to opprobrium and ridicule on questions of veracity. And if any man might have expected exceptionally considerate treatment, surely that was Lord Lytton. He was not, it should be borne in mind, a Member of one of the great political Parties, like Lord Northbrook or Lord Mayo, with many great and powerful friends in the Legislature. He had served for many years with distinction in the Diplomatic Service, and it was known that he, with great reluctance, accepted the office of Viceroy of India. From the moment he arrived until the present day, he had had to deal with a succession of the greatest difficulties. He had had to contend with famine, financial and currency difficulties, great administrative changes, and the anxiety any Viceroy must always feel when there was a great upheaval in the social and political affairs of the Eastern world. Throughout all this Lord Lytton had shown the greatest courage and ability. It must be admitted that he had not been always understood; but there never was an abler, more courageous, and, he might say, more industrious Viceroy. And when Lord Lytton's tenure of office came to its natural end, and it was possible impartially to consider his conduct, and, to study the numerous State Papers which, on almost every conceivable subject, he had written, he was sure that the almost universal verdict would be that under the genius of the poet there lay the true instincts of the statesman. He was very much obliged to the House for the attention with which it had listened to him while he had thought it his duty, at very great length, to endeavour to lay before the House what the course of events had been. He would not attempt to anticipate what the decision of the House would be. If adverse to Her Majesty's Government, they would once more resume their place as an united Opposition; but if, on the other hand, the verdict was in their favour, by a majority much in excess of that which they generally obtained from their supporters, he thought they might fairly take that majority as a censure upon the peculiar tactics of the past two years—tactics which, while they had elevated and popularized the Government they were intended to degrade and destroy had, on the other hand, systematically endangered those great national interests, to promote and protect which should be the common object of all.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

(Mr. Rathbone, Sir John Kenneway, Sir Charles W. Dilke, Mr. Ritchie.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. RATHBONE, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that he really thought it would not be necessary to detain the House long, as a simple explanation of the Bill would be quite sufficient. The object of the measure was to provide that no person should be deemed to be disqualified to be registered as a voter at Parliamentary or Municipal Elections by reason that he, or any member of his family, had received medical treatment or relief for any infectious or contagious disease as an in-patient or out-patient of any hospital, infirmary, or dispensary. He thought that anyone who had observed the spread of certain diseases, and who had taken any part in attempts to limit or control their spread, would see the importance of allowing the medical authorities to have the earliest information of their outbreak, and the fullest control over, or the charge of, those patients who were afflicted with typhus or scarlet fever, small-pox, and cholera. Those were the diseases which we had most to dread, and which required to be treated promptly in order to prevent them spreading, especially in large towns. Taking the case of scarlet fever, it was known that articles of clothing—even a single bit of rag, or a pocket-handkerchief, which had been infected at a certain stage of the disease—would, after lying years in a cupboard, spread the disorder afresh throughout the whole household; and, therefore, the necessity of inducing patients at once to enter a sanitary institution was of the utmost importance. It was possible to have a complete and proper organization over districts where these diseases broke out. He spoke with knowledge of these things, as it was his duty to assist in preventing the spread of an outbreak of cholera at Liverpool some years ago, when they tried to confine the disease to small areas. Cholera broke out in two quarters of the town, and they took means to get hold of every case the moment it was attacked, and by doing that they confined the cases to those two districts. Perhaps the most important point was to persuade persons to go into hospitals where they would be properly taken care of; but there was in the minds of many of the working classes a prejudice against doing that, which it was highly desirable to remove; and this prejudice would be greatly increased by the knowledge that if they did so they would be disfranchised, and that disqualification the Bill proposed to remedy. A case very recently came before the Vestry of Kensington, where it appeared that a householder, whose name was on the list of voters, and two of whose children, attacked with small-pox, had been removed, against his will, by direction of the local medical officers of an hospital, was objected to before the Revising Barrister, who held that he was disqualified from exercising the franchise because he had received parochial relief. In consequence of that decision the Guardians had taken up the question, it being one of considerable importance; and it was now proposed to place these four diseases upon the same footing as public vaccination when the patients were sent to any hospital. From a paper which he held in his hands it appeared that in February, 1877, the proportion of patients in the hospitals who were paupers was under 10 per cent, so that

90 per cent, who were not paupers, became disqualified by the law in force from exercising the franchise. That was a great injustice to those persons; and now that public attention had been drawn to the subject, the prejudice against going into hospitals would be greatly increased; and as there would be more difficulty in dealing with these diseases by the sanitary authorities, it was proposed by the Bill to put them, as he had stated, upon the same footing as public vaccination. Another body—namely, the medical officers of Vestries—had taken the matter up strongly. They said that the proposition was a reasonable one, so far as the Metropolis was concerned. This was not an instance in which the danger of pauperizing by relief arose, for there was no fear of people becoming purposely affected by these diseases in order that they might receive medical relief. The Bill was confined to those diseases which might spread and become a public danger; and therefore there was a reason for inducing patients to go into a hospital. It had been suggested that instead of allowing these patients to go into the general hospitals already provided other hospitals should be provided at the expense of the parishes, and be placed under the control of the sanitary authorities, and that the going into those hospitals should not disqualify any person from the exercise of the franchise; but to provide fresh hospitals would inflict upon the community a very large and unnecessary expense, and perhaps for only temporary purposes. Such a course would be oppressive in ordinary parishes, though it might not be felt in large towns or in the Metropolis. Others said that persons who went into the hospitals for these diseases should be reinstated in their rights upon repaying the expenses of being treated there; but that was not a reasonable proposition, nor, indeed, would it be practicable to carry it out. He could not help thinking that it would be very hard, as had been sometimes suggested, that poor men, whose wages were perhaps not more than 20s. a-week, should be called upon to repay the cost of the maintenance of their children during their treatment in public institutions. Rather than agree to such an arrangement many poor men with children suffering from contagious or infectious diseases would run the risk of keeping them at home, and he contended that as the sufferers were removed to an hospital for the public safety the public ought to bear the burden. He trusted, in concluding, that the House would give approval to the principle of the Bill, of which he would now move the second reading.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Rathbone.)

MR. GREGORY said, if the Bill received a second reading it would require to be dealt with with considerable care in Committee. As he understood it, the Bill provided that a voter should not be disqualified because he, for the public benefit, was compelled to go into the hospital or other place provided for contagious diseases. But they must take care that the Bill was confined to the object for which it was intended, and it appeared to him the Bill, as it stood, would go somewhat beyond that. It was a virtual alteration of the Representation of the People Act, and they must see that it did not affect the disqualification inflicted by the receipt of ordinary parochial relief. They must take care to mark the exceptions, and separate them from the receipt of parish relief. They should confine the Bill to the case of an individual or a family sent into one of these places for the benefit of the public and for the purpose of preventing contagion and the spread of the disease. That he took to be the intention of the Bill, and it was a fair and legitimate object, and one which met with his approval.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY said, he thought the suggestion just made by the hon. Member (Mr. Gregory), as to the safeguards to be attached to the Bill, were worthy of consideration. If poor persons receiving parochial relief—that was, relief other than that contemplated by the Bill—should be retained on the franchise, it would undoubtedly be an abuse, but, subject to that suggestion, he thought the Bill deserved to be read a second time. In Ireland the Bill would be a very great advantage, and would not alone prevent persons who received such medical relief from being excluded from the franchise, but it would be an inducement to them to co-operate with the sanitary authorities, and so lead to the prevention of the spread of disease. In the City which he represented (Limerick) they had adopted economical measures somewhat similar to those suggested by the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Rathbone). They had been obliged to withdraw assistance from the various hospitals in the city, and they had brought round them various institutions to meet those contagious diseases and prevent their spread among the poorer classes. It often happened that a tradesman, or one of his family, who would never have sought relief under ordinary circumstances, went into the Union fever hospital or small-pox hospital, and remained there until the disease had been removed and all dread of contagion had disappeared. It was quite evident that in the case of such a man it would be a very great hardship, and an unnecessary stigma, to deprive him of his civil rights because he had gone to such a hospital to obtain relief. It was not merely from a civil point of view that he thought the Bill desirable. He considered it was necessary in order to remove a stigma which attached now to occasional relief at the expense of the rates. Under the present circumstances, they found it very difficult to get poor people affected with those diseases to avail themselves of relief from the rates, and the medical relief got in poor-houses; but if the Legislature came forward and said that no disgrace attached—that there should be no deprivation of civil rights in connection with such medical relief as that—the difficulty would be greatly reduced. Therefore, both on the ground of constitutional fairness and sanitary disciplinary administration, he hoped that the Bill, guarded by the suggestion made by the hon. Member opposite, would deserve the support of the House.

MR. MARTEN said, he thought the subject one of great importance, and well deserving the attention of the House; but he must call attention to the fact that the Bill was only delivered to hon. Members on Thursday, and that there had not, therefore, been time to communicate with the different persons throughout the country who were best qualified to express an opinion on the proposal contained in it. [MR. RATHBONE said the Bill was the same as that of last Session.] Last Session the Bill was not publicly discussed, and just now public attention was absorbed by foreign affairs, and had not, therefore, been so fully directed to this Bill as would otherwise have been the case. Previous to the Reform Act of 1832 parochial relief given on an outbreak of cholera or small-pox or an unforeseen accident did not disqualify. The old law thus recognized cases of emergency as exceptions to the general rule. In modern legislation exceptions had been established on the principle that the subject should be manifestly one involving the public benefit, and should be one of compulsory legislation. The Compulsory Vaccination Act of 1867, and the Education Act of 1870, proceeded on this basis. He would also point out that the Bill did not appear to fit in with the Public Health Act of 1875. That Act contained provisions respecting Infectious Diseases and Hospitals, and the prevention of epidemic diseases. The Bill extended to contagious diseases, and should be limited in this respect. Where there was compulsory action by local sanitary authorities for the general public benefit—as in the case of education and vaccination—there might be fair grounds for considering that exceptions should be made, but the present Bill seemed to have been drawn without much regard to this principle. There was great danger that if they adopted the Bill as it was they would do more than they intended, and thus lead to mischief. He thought a fair ground for exception from the disqualification of voters that was the consequence of parochial relief would be made out in the case of persons who were medically treated by the parish authorities for the protection of the public. It was, however, desirable that the Bill should not go beyond that; and therefore, although he was not prepared to support the Bill as it stood, he was ready to give his assent to its second reading, on the understanding that it should be amended by the introduction of certain safeguards into it in Committee. If the Bill was designed simply to extend exceptions already recognized by the law in regard to disqualifications, he should not be disposed to give it any opposition even in Committee. The Bill should, however, be amended, so as to make it applicable to the municipal franchise as well as to the Parliamentary franchise. The object of recent legislation had been to assimilate the Parliamentary and municipal franchise in boroughs, and it would be very undesirable to introduce a new element of difference between them. If the Bill were read a second time, he thought it would be desirable to postpone the Committee for a considerable time—say until March—in order that opportunity might be given to ascertain some local opinions, which would be of great value on this subject.

MR. RITCHIE thought it was most desirable, from every point of view, that the disqualification should be removed. He therefore gave the measure his most cordial support; and while he agreed that it was desirable that safeguards against abuse might with advantage be introduced into it, he hoped that no Amendments would be made upon it of a nature to make it inoperative. The real object of the Bill was to prevent the spread of infectious diseases. He thought it was even more important to prevent people who already had disease from spreading it than it was to insist upon vaccination. In the case of public vaccination, which was paid for out of the rates, no disqualification was the consequence; while as the law at present stood there was a disqualification in the other case. The Bill was introduced last Session, and the question had received a great deal of consideration in the country, in consequence of some recent decisions of the Revising Barristers. He therefore would not advise his hon. Friend to put off the Committee till the period suggested by his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Marten).

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that as his hon. Friend (Mr. Rathbone) could not speak a second time, he would say, on his behalf, that he would confer with hon. Members who had stated their views in favour of the principle of the Bill, but advocated certain Amendments in its details, and the Committee could be postponed. He would suggest that the Committee should be put for Monday, in order that, in the meantime, the question as to the time for discussing the Bill in Committee might be considered.

MR. WATNEY thought the Bill was too wide in its scope. He objected to out-patients being included in its operation, and should move an Amendment in Committee with a view to their exclusion. He would also suggest that it might be fair to ask people who had been treated in hospitals to contribute a sum towards the expense of their treatment.

MR. SALT said, that hon. Members on all sides would sympathize with the motives which had led to the introduction of the Bill, for he thought there was a general agreement that cases of infectious disease should be carefully isolated, and that poor people afflicted with infectious disorders in the crowded alleys of great towns were deserving of all kindness and consideration; but they must be careful lest they deviated from the general principles that guided the administration of the Poor Law. Those who had taken any part in the administration of the law had acted on the principle that when a man accepted relief under any circumstances he accepted the position which was entailed upon him in consequence; and it was necessary, for the good administration of the law, that principle should be jealously preserved. No doubt the Legislature had made an exception in the cases of vaccination and of education, and it might be that the exception should be extended to infectious diseases. The hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Rathbone) suggested that working people were afraid that in accepting relief they would lose the power of voting. The difficulty that he (Mr. Salt) had found among the working classes with regard to the matter was this—not that they feared the loss of the vote, but that they objected to their children going into a hospital, because then they could not themselves look after them. That was a natural and a kindly feeling, and one honourable to the parent's feeling, but it tended to spread disease. He did not suggest on the part of his right hon. Friend (Mr. Sclater-Booth), who was absent, any opposition to the second reading of the Bill; but, at the same time, it must be closely watched at the next stage, lest it might be so framed as to do more than was intended, and thereby do more harm than good. He was prepared to assent to the second reading of the Bill; but he must not be considered as in any way pledging his right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board as to the course which he would take in Committee.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

INDIA—AUGMENTATION OF THE MILITARY FORCES.—QUESTION.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether the proposed increase to the Native Army of India will include any addition to the number of British Regimental Officers; and, if not, whether he can give the House any information as to the grounds on which such decision has been arrived at; and, whether the General Commanding in Chief in India and His Royal Highness the Field Marshal Commanding in Chief have been consulted on the subject?

MR. E. STANHOPE: Sir the Government of India have made no recommendation for any increase of the number of English regimental officers. No opportunity has, therefore, arisen for consulting His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge on the subject. I presume that whatever decision is come to on the subject by the Governor General in India will be upon the advice of his responsible military advisers.

SOUTH AFRICA—EXPENSES OF THE WAR.—QUESTION.

MR. WHITWELL asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he can now state what he could not state last Session, how the Government proposes to provide for the expenses that have already been incurred and which may arise out of the war in South Africa?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I am afraid that I cannot at present answer the most important part of the hon. Gentleman's Question, with regard to the expenses that may arise. I can add, to some extent, to the Answer which I gave last year with regard to the expenditure to the time of making up the financial estimate for the year. I informed the House that I had reason to believe that there would be an excess upon the accounts of the year 1877-8 in consequence of the war expenditure at the Cape, and I made some allowance for that amount. I am happy to say that, as far as we have gone in making up the accounts for the year 1877-8, we have reason to think that any excess that there may have been on that Vote will be fully covered, and more than covered, by saving on other Votes. Therefore, so far as the expense incurred for the financial year goes, we shall be better off than we were at the time I made that statement. With regard to the coming expenditure, I am sorry to say that the news from the Cape has been of late disturbing, and we have reason to fear that there will be considerable expenditure there; but I am not at present in a position to say what the amount of it may be, or what arrangements we shall have to make with regard to it.

MR. CHILDERS asked, If the right hon. Gentleman could give the particulars of the items on which there would be an excess?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: No, I have not got the particulars; but it will not exceed the amount stated last Session.

POOR LAW—DEPORTATION OF IRISH POOR.—QUESTION.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether it is his intention to introduce in the present Session a Bill to amend the Laws regarding the removal of the destitute poor receiving relief from the poors' rates from one kingdom to another in the United Kingdom; and, whether he intends to deal with the Law of Settlement, with the view of abolishing or amending the same?

MR. SCLATER-BOTH: Sir, in reply to the Question of the hon. Gentleman, I have to state that the subject is under the consideration of the Government; and they hope to be able to make some proposal with reference to it within the present Session, sometime after the Recess. The Resolution of last year come to by this House has been undergoing careful consideration; but there are many difficulties in the way, and these I cannot enter on. I can only repeat the promise I have already given—that the matter is under our consideration, and we will deal with it as soon as possible.

ISLAND OF CYPRUS—MR. DI CESNOLA. QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether in October last Mr. di

Cesnola, an American citizen, was tried for an offence against Turkish law in digging up objects of antiquarian interest without a Firman, by the district Court of Larnaca in Cyprus; whether the Court was presided over by a Turkish Cadi, assisted by an English assessor; whether Mr. di Cesnola was sentenced to a fine, afterwards remitted by Sir Garnet Wolseley, and the confiscation of the objects found pronounced by the Court; whether the latter portion of the judgment was carried into effect; whether any protest was made by Mr. di Cesnola against the jurisdiction of the Court; whether Turkish sovereignty continues to exist in Cyprus; and, if so, what power there is to try foreigners, not being British subjects, in disregard of the capitulations; whether appeals from the Courts in Cyprus to Constantinople will be allowed by Her Majesty's Government; and, whether there exists any Correspondence upon the subject of jurisdiction in Cyprus?

MR. BOURKE: Mr. di Cesnola, who described himself as an American citizen, was tried, on the 23rd of October, before the Court of the Medjliss Davi at Larnaca, assisted by an English assessor. The Court was presided over by a Turkish Cadi, assisted by an English assessor. Mr. di Cesnola was sentenced to a fine, afterwards remitted by Sir Garnet Wolseley, and the confiscation of the objects found was pronounced by the Court. The latter portion of the sentence was carried into effect. Mr. di Cesnola protested against this. As to whether Turkish sovereignty continues to exist in Cyprus, I must refer the hon. Baronet to the Convention on this subject. [Laughter.] I hope the hon. Baronet does not think that I mean any discourtesy by that answer. [Sir CHARLES W. DILKE: No, no.] It is the best answer I can give. In regard to jurisdiction in Cyprus, I have to state that, pending arrangements which are now in progress, I hope this point will very soon be completed. Every precaution is taken to secure a fair trial to any foreigner who is charged with any offence.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Have negotiations been concluded?

MR. BOURKE: Arrangement is a better word. There is no negotiation going on between the Porte and Her Majesty's Government. With regard to appeals, no appeal from Cyprus to Constantinople is allowed by Her Majesty's Government. There is no Correspondence whatever with any foreign Government in regard to jurisdiction in Cyprus.

ARMY' (INDIA) — OFFICERS' SICK LEAVE.—QUESTION.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Under what Indian regulations Officers of the British Service, ordered to England from India on medical certificate, have to pay their own travelling expenses and expenses for conveyance of baggage from Portsmouth to London, and do not receive detention allowance whilst waiting in London till the Medical Board assembles; whereas Officers of the same Service, arriving home from any other foreign station are paid their travelling expenses from Portsmouth to London and receive detention allowance until the Medical Board assembles?

MR. E. STANHOPE: Sir, I am informed that the Government of India have never required officers coming to England on sick leave to appear before a Medical Board on arrival. Accordingly, expenses incurred by such officers under other than Indian regulations and for other than Indian regiments have not been admitted as a proper charge against Indian revenues. The War Office Regulation to which the hon. and gallant Member refers has been abolished as regards India and the Colonies.

CHINA—THE CHEFOO CONVENTION. QUESTION.

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether anything has been yet settled with regard to the 3rd clause of the 3rd section of the Chefoo Convention; and when the Papers relating to this subject will be presented to the House?

MR. BOURKE: Sir, nothing is as yet settled with regard to the clause in question. Sir Thomas Wade is visiting India on his way to Peking to confer with the Viceroy on the subject, and it is hoped the Convention will soon be completed. Further Papers will be laid on the Table when a final arrangement has been arrived at.

PEACE PRESERVATION (IRELAND)
ACT, 1875—DONEGAL.—QUESTION.

MR. O'DONNELL asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether the districts of Donegal proclaimed under the Coercion Acts (Ireland) on the occasion of the murder of the late Earl of Leitrim are still proclaimed districts?

MR. J. LOWTHER: Sir, the districts referred to by the hon. Member were placed, by Order of Council, dated April last, under proclamation, and that Order still remains in force.

MR. O'DONNELL: Then, Sir, I beg to give Notice that I shall call attention to the matter on going into Committee of Supply.

THE RAILWAY COMMISSIONERS—LEGISLATION.—QUESTION.

MR. A. MILLS asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce any Bill continuing the powers of the Railway Commissioners, which will otherwise expire in August next?

MR. J. G. TALBOT: Sir, it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce the Bill referred to by the hon. Member.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

—o—

THE ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.

(MR. WHITBREAD).

ADJOURNED DEBATE. [THIRD NIGHT.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [9th December], "That the said Address be now read a second time."

And which Amendment was,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House disapproves the conduct of Her Majesty's Government which has resulted in the War with Afghanistan,"—(Mr. Whitbread,)—instead thereof.

MR. GRANT DUFF: There is a passage in Holy Writ which the learned now tell us is mistranslated in our version, but which has passed into current use in the form in which it there appears — "O that mine adversary had written a book!" If, Sir, there are any nations which wish us ill—if, above all, it be true, as some appear to believe, that there is a great nation lying between Asia and Europe whose statesmen spend their time in little else than in scheming against us—those nations, or that nation, need not say — "O that mine, or our, adversary had written a book." We have written a book, and written one with a vengeance. Some such reflections, I think, must have occurred to the mind of most people who have read the astonishing document which the India Office put forth a fortnight ago, for seldom, I suppose, has there been seen so wonderful a revelation. There stand for all eyes to see those astounding Instructions with regard to sending a special Mission to Cabul which Lord Salisbury gave to Lord Northbrook; there stands Lord Northbrook's reply, which it can hardly have been agreeable to receive; there stand, in page after page, proofs of the painful truth that the Rulers of this great civilized people whose fathers conquered India, who advanced our outposts in that country during the military service of one single man over 1,000 miles of fertile territory, are now trembling because a Power 100 years behind us in civilization and strength is humbly following our example amidst deserts and oases. There stands, amongst many other strange things, the account of that Conference at Peshawur between the Envoy of the Viceroy and the Envoy of the Amcer, which reads like a scene in a comedy. Would to God it had not been the prologue to a tragedy! This Blue Book, or Drab Book rather—strange colour for a volume so redolent of war — contains, as I have said, many strange things. There are two things, however, for which we search its pages in vain. The first is an explanation of the reasons why the policy to which statesmen on both sides of politics were so deeply committed from 1868 to a very recent period has been so completely thrown aside; and the second what it is proposed to effect by the new policy. As no light is cast upon these most important points by this large and interesting mass of Papers, it is all the more satisfactory that we have in this House the statesman who having, as Secretary of State for India, introduced the policy with respect to Afghanistan which we took up and followed when in Office, has, as Chancellor of the Exchequer, felt himself obliged to give up that policy and adopt a new one. A living authority when we can get it is better than the letter of any Book—blue, or other—and the right hon. Gentleman can, if he so pleases, sweep away by a short statement all our doubts and many of our difficulties. I will endeavour, accordingly, to make as clear as possible what we desire to know from his lips. Before, however, I do this I should like to advert to some of the remarks which fell from the noble Lord the Vice President of the Committee of Council and the Under Secretary of State for India. The noble Lord told us “that the policy of masterly inactivity had one great merit. It was a safe policy; but in every other sense it was absolutely unworthy of a great civilized Power.” In that phrase I recognize a thought which I believe to be much in the mind of the Viceroy, as to whom I take this opportunity of saying, that in spite of all that has occurred in connection with this disastrous Frontier business, I think there is a great deal of truth in the account which the noble Lord gave of him. Others have been more to blame than he in this matter—others who, happily, are nearer at hand, and whom we can attack with the satisfaction of feeling that they can have their say in return—although he, too, set by them on a wrong road—has latterly been misled by the magic of his own misconceptions. But as to the thought itself, I think it is a mistaken one. The whole thing is a question of relative duties. Shall I be thought very parochially minded if I say that these people are not in our parish? India is, after all, only a corner of the great British Parish, and it contains 250,000,000, for whom we are doubtless doing much, if we look at it from the point of view of our numbers and position on the earth's surface, but on whom, after all, we are producing very moderate results. Is it, then, wise to enter upon a course of policy which is but too likely to end in landing us with the additional responsibility of what a friend of mine epigrammatically described the other day as “Four Switzerlands inhabited by savages?” The noble Lord further explained that the reason why we desired to have an independent and friendly Power in Afghanistan was that Afghanistan had a Frontier from which, at any moment, “the Natives could invade or make a raid on India.” Well, if that is so, all I can say is that I trust not 24 hours will pass before the India Office telegraphs to Lord Lytton to wind up the Indian Empire and come home. Talk of British India being invaded by the Afghans! Talk of England being conquered by the gipsies! To base a policy on a dream like that is, indeed, strange. But the noble Lord went on to quote Lord Lawrence's account of the plundering propensities of the Afghans. Who doubts them? I do not mean to say that they would not be too glad to invade India if they could, and I dare say the gipsies would be very glad to conquer England. We want the Afghan Ruler to be strong, because we want from him, as I have said before, “that kind of indirect assistance which a civilized Government must always derive from being known to exercise a pacifying and semi-civilizing influence around its own borders.” But as for fearing the Afghans, I cannot understand what it means. Has it come to this, Sir? Has the shadow gone back upon the dial? Are we really not living in the year 1878, under the auspicious reign of Lord Beaconsfield and a Government which loves a spirited foreign policy? Are we afraid even of the Afghans? Is this not 1878 but 1761? Is Ahmed Shah, and not Shere Ali, on the Throne of Afghanistan? and we, are we like the last great ruling race which preceded us in India, about to suffer a crushing defeat at the hands of the Afghans? What! am I to be told that when our troops have to meet this Afghan invasion, they will advance to do so as the Mahrattas are said by a historian of those times to have advanced at Paniput, with “every symptom of hopeless despair, rather than that of steady resolution?” Would “everything in our host bespeak the despondency of sacrifice prepared rather than the courage of victory determined?” And when the fight was over, would our commander have to write a letter to the Viceroy like that one which the Mahratta commander wrote to the Peishwa, and which broke his heart, as well it might, Sir, for it conveyed in figurative Oriental language only too true an impression of agonizing and intolerable disaster? Is that what is feared by this Government, which talks so much of a spirited foreign policy? India, as the noble Lord told us, has been often invaded from beyond the Passes. Doubtless it has, and England has been often invaded by the Norwegians and Danes. Are we afraid of the Norwegians and the Danes now? There are real dangers enough in India without inventing new ones. Did the noble Lord ever hear the Mahratta saying—"If each of us only threw a single clod of earth, we could overwhelm the white faces." Of course, they could; but did this prevent our taking fort after fort, each a sort of inland Gibraltar, and making the Mahratta country in no long time as quiet as Buckinghamshire or Kent? But we are told that a few Russian officers and a little money can do all sorts of dreadful things against us in Afghanistan. Supposing they could. Our policy is to keep them out of Afghanistan. Of course, if we went to war with Russia, we could not prevent her sending officers and money to Afghanistan, or anywhere else she could; but as long as we are at peace with Russia, we have a right to hold Russia to her engagements, one of which is to consider Afghanistan as wholly beyond her sphere of action. I am not hostile to Russia, but friendly to her, as long as she keeps her engagements, as a civilized Power should; but if she really sent into Afghanistan those European officers and that money of which the noble Lord speaks, I, for one, would desire to see it made a casus belli. I have ever been against fidgetty interference with the advance of Russia; but I have always maintained that we must draw a line at Afghanistan. Southern Central Asia is her affair—not to annex, if she be wise, but to influence; Afghanistan is our affair, not to annex, if we be wise, but to influence. There were a number of other things in the noble Lord's very interesting speech, as to which I shall state my views later, incidentally. I pass now to the speech of the hon. Gentleman who represents the India Office (Mr. E. Stanhope), to whom I should like to say that, although we are at the opposite poles of opinion about this particular matter—which is, indeed, not an Indian matter, but a broad question of Imperial policy—I shall hope usually to be able to give on purely Indian matters the kind of support which the right hon. Gentleman who now leads the House gave to me, and which I tried to give to the noble Lord, as he so gracefully acknowledged the other night. The hon. Gentleman, with more courage, I think, than discretion, attacked Lord Northbrook for his disregard of the orders of the Home Government. That, Sir, was a manifest afterthought, the offspring of disappointment at the course Lord Northbrook has seen it his duty to take in this business. If it was not an afterthought, why did the Government make Lord Northbrook an Earl? A Viceroy who disobeys the Secretary of State is criminally responsible. Bad as the consciences of right hon. Gentlemen may be, they cannot think that being raised two steps in the Peerage by them is equivalent to a prosecution. But if Lord Northbrook was so guilty, why did the noble Lord who represented India on August 9, 1877, defend him in a manner so honourable to both parties? Then the Under Secretary of State complained of the mist of conditions and doubts in which, as he said, Lord Northbrook wrapped up his assurances to the Ameer. Would he, then, have wished that the assurances should have been unconditional? If so, he is in conflict with Lord Cranbrook, who expressly says that it was clearly impossible to make them unconditional. But perhaps he does not object to the assurances being conditional, but would have put conditional assurances in somewhat different words? If so, why did the Government which he represents never give a hint to Lord Northbrook that it would have preferred different words? Why did Lord Salisbury fail to authorize the Government of India, all the time Lord Northbrook remained at the head of it, to make any new concession to Shere Ali—new either in form or in wording? Is not this attack on Lord Northbrook equally good as an attack on Lord Salisbury? Then the hon. Member attacked Mr. Seton-Karr, and pooh-poohed his evidence about what went on at Umballa with respect to having British Agents in Afghanistan.

Mr. Grant Duff

Well, Sir, who is Mr. Seton-Karr? Mr. Seton-Karr is a gentleman who has been distinguished from the very beginning of his life, as all readers of Stanley's Life of Arnold know. After a long and successful Indian career, he found himself in 1869 Foreign Secretary. Through him went every single communication between Lord Mayo and Shere Ali which was of any real importance, and his evidence is, that Shere Ali and his people would not tolerate the idea of having British Agents in Afghanistan. Now, what do the Government set up against the evidence of Mr. Seton-Karr, who is, by the way, a strong Conservative, and has, in consequence, no bias in favour of our views? Why, chiefly the authority of Captain Grey, his own subordinate, and they make such reckless use of Captain Grey's evidence, that they quote him as an authority for what passed at an interview at which he was not even present. Then they press into the service a paragraph from a despatch of Lord Northbrook's Government, which runs as follows:—

"On the whole, however, we think that either the Ameer himself or his Minister Noor Mahomed Shah, did in confidential communications with Captain Grey express a readiness to accept at some future time not far distant the presence of British Agents at places in Afghanistan, excepting Cabul itself."—[Afghanistan, No. 1, p. 131.]

But they take precious good care not to quote the final conclusion of Lord Northbrook and his Government, which will be found at page 132, paragraph 20—

"Looking to all the circumstances of the case, the absence of any formal record of the alleged admission, its entirely private and confidential nature, and the uncertainty as to its scope and intention, we consider that we should not be justified in founding any representation to the Ameer regarding the Mission of a British Agent to Herat upon the assumption that he had, when at Umballa, expressed his willingness to agree to such an arrangement."—[Ibid. p. 132.]

But what will hon. Members say when I tell them that Lord Northbrook authorizes me to mention that if, previous to sending that despatch he had been able to consult Mr. Seton-Karr, who was in England, and not in India, he would have considered his evidence as absolutely conclusive. That carries the matter a long way, but I can carry it further; for I am permitted to read an extract from a private letter from Lord Mayo to the Duke of Argyll, which absolutely settles the question. On June 3, 1869, Lord Mayo writes—

"The only pledges given were that we would not interfere in his affairs; that we would support his independence; 'that we would not force European officers upon him.'"

Now, any hon. Member who re-opens this question, of which so much has been made in this controversy, simply asserts that Lord Mayo deceived his official Chief—which no one will, I think, venture to do. I was led to these remarks by speaking of Mr. Seton-Karr; but Mr. Seton-Karr is not the only distinguished Indian who has been hardly treated by eminent persons during this controversy. Lord Lawrence has fared even worse, and the name of Lord Lawrence is too closely associated with some of the most stirring Indian memories for one who has represented the Indian Government in this House to hear him attacked without pain. In a great foreign city takes place a ceremony which I have never had the good fortune to see, though I know the place well, but which some who hear me may have been fortunate enough to have seen. Year by year the garrison of Seville marches into the great Cathedral, and lowers the colours to the tomb of St. Ferdinand; the King who took the city from the Moors six centuries and more ago. Sir, I think that, at least as long as he lives, Members of both Houses of Parliament would consult their self-respect if, when speaking of the North-West Frontier, they were to lower—observe, I do not say to strike—their colours to John Lawrence of the Punjab. Are great men so abundant in this age of ours that the son of a great man should speak of one of our not too numerous great men, as the right hon. Member for Tamworth (Sir Robert Peel) did the other night? Great men come only, Sir, at distant intervals, for opportunity must unite with Native force to make men great. Just look at some of our families most favoured by fortune. Take the Cecils. In the Elizabethan age there were two Cecils, one or possibly both of whom, at least as seen through the dimness of history, may fairly be called great. Well nigh 300 years have passed away before another Cecil has appeared who has risen sufficiently high on the ladder of success to have a chance of attaining even that sinister, that ill-omened greatness which comes from involving your country in grave calamity. Then an attempt was made to show that Shere Ali began to waver in his dependence on the British before Lord Lytton arrived in India. Had Lord Northbrook's policy been continued by his successor, I believe Shere Ali's ill humour would never have turned into anything like hesitation about the value of our alliance. But had not Shere Ali's uneasiness a good cause? Did the Under Secretary of State ever hear of a book called England and Russia in the East, and does he know by whom that most interesting book was written? That book was written by a Member of the Secretary of State's Council, Sir Henry Rawlinson. That book is full of most valuable things; but that book contains some passages which well might have frightened Shere Ali out of his senses. Well, that book, or parts of that book, are known to have been translated and to have reached his hand. I deeply regretted that that most valuable work was not weeded of some passages which could not fail to do mischief. I said so at the time, and I had some controversy with Sir Henry Rawlinson about it. I owe him, however, an apology, and I will make it. Trusting to the assurances given by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir Stafford Northcote) in 1873, and by Lord Derby in 1874, I believed that Sir Henry Rawlinson's book was to be blamed, as giving a view of English policy different from that of the Government. I now see that I was mistaken, and that Sir Henry Rawlinson, although writing under his own responsibility, spoke the secret mind of his official Chief; but, I still think as I thought, that passages in that book are most deeply to be regretted. I should be sorry to be misunderstood. I think Sir Henry Rawlinson's writings are of the greatest value. I have been in the habit of reading them for years with the keenest interest; but Sir Henry Rawlinson is like fire, an excellent servant—a bad master. The right hon. Gentleman made him a Member of the Indian Council, and acted most wisely in so doing. But did the right hon. Gentleman follow Sir Henry Rawlinson's advice about Central Asia? No, Sir; he knew better. What did he do? He took Sir Henry's Memorandum of 1868 and sent it out to India, thereby eliciting from Sir John Lawrence and his Council, by way of criticism and objection to that document, one of the most valuable sets of State Papers ever laid before the British public. The Duke of Argyll succeeded the right hon. Gentleman. He, too, valued Sir Henry Rawlinson, and found him most useful. But did he follow Sir Henry's advice in Central Asia? No, Sir; he knew better. Time passed, however, and another Secretary of State ruled where the Duke of Argyll and the right hon. Gentleman had ruled. Then was seen a pendant to the old story of the magician and his apprentice. The right hon. Gentleman was an accomplished magician. He could raise his familiar spirit, make it do his bidding, and then lay it again. Not so the apprentice. Not so Lord Salisbury. He could raise the familiar spirit, and make it do his bidding for a while, but he could not lay it again. The familiar spirit was the stronger of the two, and imposed its will. Then the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State told us that no ordinary human being could understand the telegram which the Duke of Argyll sent to Lord Northbrook about Afghan affairs in 1873. Well, Sir, Lord Northbrook, to whom it was sent, understood the telegram, and acted on it. What more would the hon. Gentleman have? It has further been made a matter of complaint that the Duke of Argyll did not embody his views as to the affairs of Afghanistan in a formal despatch to Lord Northbrook in 1873. Why should he have done so? He had no new policy to announce. He found a very sensible policy in operation when he arrived at the India Office—the policy of the right hon. Gentleman opposite. He held to that policy, never varying it in any one particular. Long before 1873, it had become, as he considered a “settled policy,” past all discussion, so far as he was concerned. Had anyone called his policy in question in “another place” he would have been ready to defend it. He is not particularly slow in defending himself—rather likes, I should say, a free fight of an argumentative kind. When his policy was criticized in this House, I had his orders to defend it, and did so to the best of my ability. Whether I did so successfully or not is another question; but at least, neither in 1869 nor in 1873 did I leave in any doubt what his policy as to Afghanistan or the Russian advance in Asia really was. If those who called it in question thought they could have got any considerable minority of hon. Members to agree with them, I suppose they would have tried their luck in a division; but they knew that they would have had not only the then Government to fight, but all those Members on the other side who could be influenced by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who spoke on our side in both debates. And now, Sir, I turn from the noble Lord and the Under Secretary of State, to the great living authority to which I alluded some time ago. The right hon. Gentleman who now leads the House was Secretary of State for India when Sir John Lawrence came to the conclusion that Shere Ali was really the person whom the bulk of the Afghan people desired to support; and, when he determined, in consequence, to give material aid to that Prince, that step had the full support of the right hon. Gentleman, just as Lord Lawrence's previous policy—a policy absolutely commanded by our Treaty engagements, and advised by Dost Mahomed, of refusing to take a side as long as the issue of the civil war in Afghanistan remained doubtful—had also his full support. What I may call Sir John Lawrence's second policy remained the policy of successive Viceroys up to the time of Lord Northbrook's retirement. There was not one jot nor one tittle of difference between the Afghan policy pursued by Lord Lawrence at the end of his career, by Lord Mayo, and by his successor. All three assisted the Ameer, all three gave him to understand that, as long as he conducted himself reasonably, he might rely upon our friendship; but not one of them was rash enough to give him the guarantees for which he constantly showed himself anxious. More than once, as I have said, the affairs of Afghanistan were before this House during the Vice-Royalties of Lord Mayo and Lord Northbrook, and the views which commended themselves to Her Majesty's then Advisers, and which were identical with those which he had held when in office, received the support of the right hon. Gentleman. Now, however, we find the right hon. Gentleman supporting a totally different policy, and what I want to discover are the reasons which have led the right hon. Gentleman to change his opinion. It may be that when we have heard his explanations we, too, shall be convinced. It will not be enough to say vaguely that circumstances have changed. How have they changed? It will be replied that Shere Ali has shown himself in less good humour with this country than he was at various periods since 1868—say, for instance, at the time of the death of Lord Mayo. Well, but I presume that the right hon. Gentleman when he sanctioned Lord Lawrence's later policy did so with his eyes open. If so, he knew two things; first, that Shere Ali, though a man of natural ability, was a moody barbarian, with a dash of something very like insanity; secondly, that Afghans surpass the rest of the world in their addiction to the common practice of giving too little and asking too much. He must then have foreseen the inevitable. He must have foreseen that the course of true love between Calcutta and Cabul would not run smooth; that Shere Ali would want more than he got, and would, from time to time, be very cross indeed with us. If he did not foresee this, then the policy which he inaugurated was wrong, and Mr. John Wyllie, the highly-gifted man, whose chance expression in an article in The Edinburgh Review—the expression, I mean “masterly inactivity”—has become one of the winged words of our generation, was right, in clinging to Lord Lawrence's first Afghan policy, and in censuring both the right hon. Gentleman and us. Up to Lord Lytton's taking charge of the Government, there was nothing whatever in Shere Ali's bearing to this country which might not have been expected by those who had studied his character. We had recognized his rights in the North to all the Dominions which had belonged to his father, from Wood's Lake along the Northern Oxus, and so right down the main stream to Khodja-Saleh; but we had not, in order to oblige him, done injustice to another of our Allies, the Persian Monarchy, nor would we give him guarantees, which would have been agreeable, but also it is but too probable fatal to him. Why would they have been probably fatal to him? Because, if we had given them the guarantees which he wished, the result in all likelihood would have been,

first, that he would have embroiled himself with his neighbours; and, secondly, that he would have ruled so harshly at home as to cause the civil war to break out again. Take the case of Seistan. Will anyone tell me that if Shere Ali had thought he could reckon upon us to the uttermost, he would have allowed that question to be settled without a war? And what should we have gained by backing him in committing a wrong against Persia? Then as to his home government. Who that knows how influenced is the Court of Cabul by the lowest and worst kind of intrigues, would have thought it wise to go further than Lord Mayo did in his general assurances of goodwill with respect to Shere Ali's internal administration? Would it have been pleasant to have found ourselves engaged to support the side of one of the parties in a raging civil war, perhaps against the wishes of the bulk of the people? Supposing, for instance, we had guaranteed the succession of Abdoollah Jan, as Shere Ali wished us to do, and that that unhappy youth had lived, but that the bulk of the Afghan people had declared for Yakooob Khan, or some one else, would that have been pleasant? The world moves fast, and we forget the history of yesterday; but let anyone look back to Mr. John Wyllie's article, now re-published, on the old civil war, and see in what a pleasant predicament we might have found ourselves. All these considerations, I think, must have been present in outline to the mind of the right hon. Gentleman when he sanctioned Lord Lawrence's second policy; and, if so, the state into which Shere Ali was thrown when he wanted us to give everything he asked, while refusing to give anything soever in return, must have appeared perfectly natural. I should have expected then that the right hon. Gentleman would have exerted his influence in the Cabinet to have left things in statu quo; to have allowed the Ameer having got out of humour to get into it again, as he doubtless would have done, whenever the pressure of necessity made him anxious once more to receive our liberal presents of money and arms. Unfortunately, however, this course was not followed. No sooner had Lord Lytton got to India than attempts were made to open negotiations with the Ameer, and proposals were pressed upon him of a nature most disagreeable to him. Now, I want to know from the right hon. Gentleman why this course—so contrary to all that he had done and to all that he had said during a long series of years—was adopted. I think I have made it clear that there was nothing in the attitude of the Ameer himself which should not have been foreseen by the right hon. Gentleman. Had then circumstances changed elsewhere? Had the attitude of Russia become such as to require us to throw over the old policy of the right hon. Gentleman, and to adopt a new policy with regard to Afghanistan? I reply that, in 1868, when the right hon. Gentleman was at the India Office, and when he sanctioned Lord Lawrence's second policy with regard to Afghanistan, every reasonable man who studied the question—and the right hon. Gentleman, a very reasonable man, must have studied it as a matter of political duty—ought to have come to the conclusion that the advance of Russia within a few years to the point which she has now reached was quite inevitable. Any policy adopted in 1868 with regard to Afghanistan which did not keep in view that Russia would gradually, and not slowly, advance in the three Khanates was a shortsighted policy and a bad policy. If the Afghanistan policy begun by the right hon. Gentleman and continued by us was to be rendered obsolete by the advance of Russia during the last decade, then it was built upon a shifting sand, and was altogether a wrong policy. I maintain, however, that as far back as 1868 the only wise way to look at this whole matter was this—Our interests are in no way so affected by anything that Russia can do in the three Khanates as to make it worth our while to take any steps with reference to her advance there. Our interests do not become affected till she approaches Afghanistan; but with regard to Afghanistan—and especially with regard to Herat—it must be distinctly understood that we could not for a moment tolerate any hostile interference. That country we hold to be within the legitimate sphere of our influence; and under no reasonable interpretation of Russian interests can it be of the slightest advantage to Russia to interfere with its boundaries. Then if the Ameer got into a panic because the Russians succeeded in their Khivan expedition, was it the part of men of firm mind to share his panic, to change their policy with regard to him, and to begin to negotiate with a view to counteracting Russian influence at his Court? That does not seem to me to have been the part either of firm men or of men who had a proper sentiment of their own dignity. It was with St. Petersburg, and not with Cabul, that we should have negotiated—if it was necessary to do anything at all. We should have reiterated to the Ameer the assurances so repeatedly given to him, and so solemnly renewed by Lord Northbrook under orders from home; and if we had not said it sufficiently before at St. Petersburg, we should have again said there that any aggression on Afghanistan meant war with us. That position would have been intelligible and honourable, and would, I believe, have been supported by the whole people. Well, then, I think I have shown it to be extremely improbable that the right hon. Gentleman can have changed his frequently expressed policy for the reasons which I have examined. There must be some other reasons, which I cannot even guess, but which the right hon. Gentleman will, doubtless, be able to explain to us with his usual clearness. Granted, however, that the right hon. Gentleman had some good reason for changing his policy, I want to know what his new policy is? What is the Government driving at? Why are we making war? What end do we propose to attain when that war closes? Upon what do we propose to insist when we come to dictate the terms of peace? Is the war waged—as we have been told by a high authority—in order to obtain a scientific Frontier? or is it waged in order to force Shere Ali into being in all time coming an attached friend of the British Government? or is it waged because the Ministry, having by their mismanagement put themselves into the position of being slighted by Shere Ali, saw no other way of getting out of their scrape without a sacrifice of amour propre? or is it waged in order that in some mysterious way we may strengthen ourselves against Russia? or if for none of these, then for what other objects? First, then, as to the scientific Frontier. That opens two questions. Can we improve our present Frontier, and have we a right to improve it by going to war? As to the former of these questions, most diverse opinions are held by good authorities. My own impression, after comparing a great many different views, both at home and in India, is that, if you take political and military considerations together and balance the advantages and the disadvantages of your present position, you have got, on the whole, a very good Frontier. I do not at all mean to say that those military men are not right, who tell you that for the purpose of defending yourselves against a great and well-appointed European Army, you ought not only to have the line of hills on your Frontiers, but the open country beyond. I have no doubt, for instance, that the Balkan Frontier—which the Government so much congratulated itself upon obtaining for those unhappy Turks at the Treaty of Berlin—is a very bad Frontier; and if everything were entirely different from what it is now, if Russia were five times richer than she is, and if she were ruled by a man as able and as warlike as Napoleon I., who was determined to invade India, it might be desirable before he started on his enterprize that we should, with the assistance and goodwill of the Afghans, who would have to bear the first brunt of invasion, be holding the triangle formed by Cabul, Ghuznee, and Jelallabad, with your present Frontier for your second line. I daresay that is true enough; anyhow, I am, for purposes of argument, perfectly willing to assume it to be true. But what has such a speculation as that got to do with the present state of affairs? Does anyone, not a candidate for Bedlam, believe that the Russia of 1878 could invade India if she wished so to do? and are we now going to go to the vast expense and trouble necessary for acquiring under present circumstances that coveted triangle, because it might conceivably be useful 50 or 30 years hence? It is hardly possible to imagine that any sane men should propose to embark on such an enterprize. Well, but perhaps it is not of this large rectification of the Frontier that the Government are thinking. Are they, then, going to turn Candahar and Herat into fortresses in advance of our Frontier, as has been proposed by another high authority? If so, have they counted the cost? The advance to Quetta looks very like taking the first step toward that most unwise and dangerous policy. If they are thinking of either of these two rectifications of our Frontier, no doubt they could not obtain them, as things stand, without war. But are they thinking of something much smaller—of certain little improvements at different points of our Frontier, then, I say, probably there are some improvements that they might make; but these would be at the expense not of the Afghans, but of some of the wild tribes between us and the Afghans. There is a little district very near Peshawur which, if there were no such thing as the eighth Commandment, or if our neighbours would sell it to us, I, for one, should be delighted to see in our possession, and I daresay our Frontier officers could show a good many such places. To attack the Ameer, however, in order to obtain those coveted spots, would seem a vain labour. Many of them do not belong to him, but to the wild tribes between us and him. To beat the Afghans in order to produce an effect on them is to invite a reply in the spirit of that which the English proprietor of Irish estates made to his agent when the unhappy man wrote to say that his life was in danger—"If my tenantry expect to intimidate me by shooting you, they are much mistaken." But is it, perhaps, of none of these Frontiers that the Government is thinking, but of a fourth, a new suggestion which has been lately imported into the controversy? Well, I, for one, am anxious to hear all that can be said for that new suggestion; but it is obviously open to many of the objections I have brought forward to the others. And one word now, Sir, about this scientific Frontier. What is a scientific Frontier? The phrase is a translation from the French, and in that tongue une frontière scientifique means a Frontier for which Nature has done nothing, and man has been obliged to do everything. The Frontier of France towards the Low Countries, which was defended by Vauban and others, with the line of fortresses which has become so famous, is the frontière scientifique, par excellence. The Frontier which Nature has defended by the Pyrenees is not a frontière scientifique. What the Prime Minister meant when he told us that we went to war for a scientific Frontier, goodness or the opposite of goodness only knows;

but what he said was, that we went to war for a Frontier which we should be obliged to defend by a costly line of fortresses, leaving in order to do this a line of Frontier which Nature had made so strong that very little expenditure would be needed on it, even if an invasion were imminent, and none at all unless invasion were imminent. Under no circumstances could this scientific Frontier be found without taking in the whole of the wild tribes, nor, so far as I can see, without going right over into the valley of the Helmund. But supposing you take in the wild tribes, the proceeding is surely a most surprising one from a military point of view; while from a civil point of view, it is just as if a beekeeper should annex 10,000 wasps' nests by way of a profitable investment. Supposing, however, that there is really some "scientific Frontier" in Afghan territory which we can obtain, and against which none of the objections I have stated can be brought—some "scientific Frontier" which has not yet been explained, but which the right hon. Gentleman will explain in his reply—have we a right to obtain that scientific Frontier by war? I do not think we have, unless it is a question of necessary self-defence. If it were proved that we should not be able to continue the vast civilizing process which we are carrying on in India without obtaining this "scientific Frontier," war might, no doubt, be a justifiable though hard necessity. But then it would have been our manifest duty to have put this scientific Frontier into our Ultimatum, to have said—"This scientific Frontier is to us a matter of life or death—give us it, or we will take it." No other course is consistent, I will not say with justice to our neighbour, but with justice to ourselves. Yet we have done nothing of the kind. We have never asked for a scientific Frontier, and it has, of course, never been refused to us. But perhaps this idea that we are going to war for a scientific Frontier is all nonsense, and we are going to war to shoot and sabre Shere Ali and his people into loving us for all time to come. If that be so, I will simply observe that the method has rarely succeeded in history; and our experiences with the Afghans in time past are not encouraging as to its success now. What is it that makes it so difficult to station British officers in their country? Chiefly the bitter recollections of the last war. The men who remember that war are beginning to die out, and it was probable that with time you might have overcome inveterate prejudice and suspicion. Now, however, you deliberately revive all the old feelings. Is that in accordance with common sense? But perhaps you do not wage war for a scientific Frontier; you do not expect to beat Shere Ali into good temper; and war has been merely resorted to as the easiest way out of a humiliating position. I confess it looks to me very much as if this were the case. I am afraid that when Lord Lytton was sent out, those who gave him his instructions were thinking rather of the effect to be produced at home by playing the card of a spirited foreign policy, than of anything else. I am afraid they did not calculate upon Lord Lytton going either so far or so fast, and that vast amounts of blood and treasure are now being sacrificed to questions of amour propre. If so, it may possibly pay for the moment. There are a great many people who like to find, when they open their papers in the morning, that we have taken a fort over night. They do not much care where or what the fort is. Undoubtedly the feeling which was expressed by the ferryman who, having asked a passenger if there was any news, and having been told, in reply, that the Dutch had taken Holland, thoughtfully observed, as his boat touched the further shore—"Guess we must turn them out of that, Sir," is a feeling pretty widely spread in this country, but it is not the deepest feeling in the breast of our people; and those who trust to it will find that they can build upon it neither enduring power nor enduring fame. But, perhaps, I do the Government great injustice, and it really has before it some vast scheme of policy with reference to Russia, of which this Afghan War is merely the prelude. If so, what is it? Are the Russians going to be driven over the Jaxartes? I firmly believe that that would be about the best thing that could happen to them; for I hold that their Central Asian possessions will, before the account is closed with them, cost them very dear indeed, in more ways than one. For Central Asia, however, I believe that it would be a great calamity.

Russia in Central Asia has committed, doubtless, sins enough, and will commit many more; but she is, on the whole, a good and not a bad influence. But perhaps the Government is not dreaming of anything of the kind; if so, what is it dreaming of, or planning for, towards what goal are we advancing? May we not hope to have not vague phrases, but a clear, intelligible, definite statement of what we are fighting for? Of course, as I have admitted, the right hon. Gentleman may have something to tell us which will put an altogether new aspect upon this matter; but, if we are fighting merely to make the Ameer sue for peace, and promise to be our loving friend in the future; or, if we are fighting to make him accept a British Embassy at Cabul and elsewhere; or, if we are fighting to make him receive British officers into the towns along his Northern Frontier, and not at Cabul itself; or, if we are fighting to obtain a small rectification of our marches; or, if we are fighting in the hope that Shere Ali will be overthrown and a more pliant Ruler substituted for him, then I say that, irrespective altogether of the moral aspects of the transaction, we are buying brass with gold—we are pursuing, at vast expense and trouble, objects, some of which might be worth attainment, but none of which are worth making great sacrifices for. The Opposition has been taunted with not having a policy. It is not the business of an Opposition to find a policy; but, I presume, if we were in power, we should try to conclude the war as creditably as possible which the Government has so rashly begun, and then go back, as nearly as circumstances would permit, to the state of things when Lord Northbrook left India. The right hon. Gentleman does not wish to annex Afghanistan; of that I am sure. But what are we to think who read the following passage in a recent article of Sir Henry Rawlinson's:—

"The master of the upper plateau of Afghanistan commanding access to the Passes from the North is, in fact, the master of India, and it was in recognition of this military necessity, and not from any lust of territory or any hope of a re-imbursement of expense, that the Delhi Kings, whose rule we have inherited, held Afghanistan for 200 years as a province of the Empire. Afghanistan, indeed, is both geographically and politically a part of India, although, since our last conquest of Cabul, in 1842, we have virtually and for our own convenience admitted the independence of the country."

It will be said that Sir Henry Rawlinson, in writing this, is merely acting as a private person, and not as the trusted adviser of the Secretary of State for India, and at this very moment the head of the Political Committee in the Indian Council. In fact, Sir Henry does say so in so many words. He said, however, precisely the same thing in his book, England and Russia in the East, which was, as I have pointed out, one of the most important factors—perhaps the most important factor—in throwing the Ameer into the state of discomfort and suspicion which has led at last to this unhappy war. When Sir Henry published that book, he found himself in flagrant opposition to the views repeatedly put forward here by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer; yet it is Sir Henry's policy which has prevailed. Who shall say that his forecast will not turn out to be correct now also? If that be so, we shall only have gained a loss; we shall have brought about prematurely that meeting of the Sepoy and Cossack on the banks of the Oxus, which all wise politicians, who have studied the question, have at once foreseen and desired to postpone. It will not be necessary, even if they do meet, that they should meet as enemies; but, looking to the unjust and erroneous estimates of each others' characters which prevail in the two countries, it is but too probable, if they meet soon, that sooner or later they will engage in an armed conflict, while Asia stands by in silent amazement. If wise counsels had prevailed, it might have been that the meeting of our Frontiers would not have occurred till that weary group of East European and West Asiatic questions, which are the real cause of the estrangement between us and Russia, had been put in the way of settlement. Never were truer words spoken than some that were spoken to me in 1876 by the late Prince Tcherkasky, when he said that Central Asia was to Russia "l'Orient de fantaisie, while Turkey was l'Orient serieux." Now, however, the same Government which has upset the old arrangements between Peshawur and Samarcand has committed us, to the best of its ability, to strenuous opposition to Russia in Asia Minor. Just in so far as that opposition is successful do we increase her pressure upon us on the Oxus. If ever there was a state of circumstances which repeated trumpet-tongued to politicians the saying—"Can't you let it alone," it was that which has prevailed for many years back in the region lying between us and the outposts of Russia. An event once occurred which has not been very much noticed, but which struck Lord Ellenborough, who was Governor General at the time, very much indeed, and which may be worth mentioning. No sooner had the army which avenged our disasters in Cabul returned to India, and with all its vast train of followers put the Sutlej between it and the work which it had completed, than that mighty river came down in flood and swept away both the bridges by which it had crossed. There could hardly have been a more fitting ending for a melancholy chapter in our national history. It really almost looked as if a Higher Power had meant to give us a warning not to re-commence to play at the expense either of England or of India what was lightly and wickedly called, ere yet our first ill-fated army crossed the Frontier, the Great Game of Central Asia. I apologize, Sir, for having spoken at so much length; but there are numbers of points of the greatest interest which I have advisedly passed over. My wish has been chiefly to put a series of questions which might elicit from the right hon. Gentleman a statement as to the reasons why he has changed his old policy, together with a statement as to what he proposes to effect by the new one, and, in doing this, to indicate that unless he has some great surprises in store for us, I think he will find it difficult to convince us that the situation on our North-Western Frontier—difficult and anxious at the best of times—is likely to be improved by anything that has been done since Lord Northbrook left India. It is for the right hon. Gentleman, rather than for the Representative of the Indian Government in this House, to do this; for it cannot be too distinctly kept before the minds of hon. Members that none of the responsibility for this unhappy affair is shared by the Indian Council. The Indian Government had no more to do with the despatch of Lord Cranbrook, which let loose the dogs of war, than had anyone who read it for the first time in the newspapers, as was, doubtless, the case with many Members of that Council. Despatches about Indian affairs which have passed a Council of specialists, many of whom have been studying these affairs since boyhood, carry with them quite a different kind of authority from a despatch in which they have neither part nor lot; and to which not a few of the most experienced Members of the Council must have given the most determined opposition, had an opportunity been afforded them, unless they were to turn their backs upon some of the most important opinions they had held and expressed in a long and honourable career. It is the right hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues alone who are responsible for the blood which is now being shed. The Cabinet is quite peculiarly responsible in this matter. In 1877, attempts were made throughout all the Session to extract from the Government explanations as to what was going on on the North-West Frontier of India. We were met again and again by dilatory pleas; and when at last, on the 9th of August, I was able to bring the matter before the House, the right hon. Member assured us that "the main lines of our policy on the North-West Frontier were unchanged"—I say, Sir, that we were not met fairly in that debate. Things were kept back which should not have been kept back—it was not fair as between man and man. But what happened "elsewhere" was a great deal worse. The answer given to the Duke of Argyll prevented the two highest authorities in this country upon Indian affairs initiating a discussion which would, as I verily believe, have roused the attention of the country in time, and have prevented this war altogether. The right hon. Gentleman will not, I hope, meet us in this debate, as he did in the Quetta debate. Of course, he will tell us the truth; but he will, let us hope, tell us the whole truth. There are certain people with whom, if I were addressing them, I should have to make some stipulations as to the kind of truth. I should ask them not to give us the kind of truth which would have made Escobar's hair stand on end, not the kind of truth which is thought good enough for the Duke of Argyll. The right hon. Gentleman will give us, I am sure, the good old-fashioned English article which goes down with the House of Commons—"Hear, hear!"—I say, Sir, the House of Commons. There was once a great historical Assembly, I forget where, but in some far-off country, I suppose, in which a Minister, having been charged with giving to an ex-Minister a reply which it is impossible to characterise in language which I dare to use in your presence, calmly replied—"If such answers are not satisfactory, you shall have no answer at all." In that great historical Assembly the Members represented themselves. The Minister does not live who would venture thus to address the Representatives of the British and the Irish people. I have the greatest respect for the Chancellor of the Exchequer; but I pity the Chancellor of the Exchequer. A Chancellor of the Exchequer must have many bad quarters of an hour who belongs to a Cabinet which is prodigal of everything except authentic information to the two Houses of Parliament. I have, as I say, the greatest respect for the Chancellor of the Exchequer for many reasons; amongst others, because I also have respect for that old-fashioned virtue, economy, and I believe the Chancellor of the Exchequer to be an economically-minded man. Yes, Sir; but let him be economical of everything except of the facts which are necessary to enable the great Council of the nation to do its duty to the people and the Crown, and convince us that we are wrong. If he does, I, for one, am ready to follow him into the Lobby. I have expressed no opinion to-night which I have not expressed again and again in this House and out of it. I do not put Party above principle. I am open to conviction of the wisdom of the Government policy; but unless the right hon. Gentleman is going to burst upon us with some entirely new revelation, I cannot conceive how any man, unless he is actuated by mere Party motives, can do otherwise than vote with my hon. Friend the Member for Bedford.

MR. BOURKE said, the hon. Member who had just sat down began his speech by making an announcement they were all glad to hear—namely, that he did not mean to make any imputations upon the character of Lord Lytton; but he had ended by casting aspersions upon the character of Lord Salisbury, against whom he had ingeniously made certain inuendoes; and he had also cast asper-sions upon the proceedings and acts of the Members of Her Majesty's Government which he did not think the most subordinate Member of that Government could sit and hear and refrain from endeavouring to answer. The story of the answer given last year by the Marquess of Salisbury to the Duke of Argyll was now before the public; and he could not for the life of him see anything in the answer of Lord Salisbury that was not consistent with perfect truth, or that the answer was not as ample as the responsible position he occupied enabled him to give. Lord Salisbury was asked categorically by the Duke of Argyll whether we had endeavoured to force an Envoy upon the Ameer at Cabul? The Duke of Argyll knew as well as any person did that the gist of the question was in the words "forcing an Envoy at Cabul." Lord Salisbury answered that question with a distinct negative. The Duke of Argyll asked whether troops were being brought up to the Frontier; and Lord Salisbury answered that part of the question with perfect candour. The Duke of Argyll further asked, whether there were any boats being prepared on the Indus; and Lord Salisbury answered that with the most perfect candour. The Duke of Argyll further asked, and it was last year, whether there had been any change in our relations with Afghanistan? Lord Salisbury replied that there had been no change for the last 12 months. Lord Salisbury gave the perfectly candid answer with which they were all acquainted; and, considering his position, he would not have been justified in going further than he did. Upon this incident the hon. Member had founded a general charge of want of candour on the part of Ministers in answering questions. He did not believe there ever was a Government that had been so much questioned as the present, and personally he had not been the least catechized; and he challenged the ingenuity and research of the hon. Member to detect any error of fact in any answer he had given.

MR. GRANT DUFF: I never dreamt of charging the hon. Gentleman with inaccuracy.

MR. BOURKE said, he knew that the hon. Member did not say so; but he made a general charge against the Government. Not being acquainted with the archives in the Offices of his Colleagues, of course he could not do more than speak for himself; and he challenged the ingenuity of the hon. Member to find a single error of fact in any answer he had given to a Question. He must add that he had been asked many Questions suggestive of a great many things that it would not have been his duty to have gone into in his Answers. The gravamen of the charge against Lord Salisbury was that he did not choose, in his responsible position, to embark in all sorts of speculations with regard to Central Asia which now, a year afterwards, hon. Gentlemen thought would have thrown some light on the circumstances then occurring, but which had nothing to do with circumstances anterior to 1877. A great portion of the hon. Gentleman's speech was taken up with taunting Her Majesty's Government on the assumption that they were afraid of the Afghan tribes, and the hon. Member founded that charge upon the speech of the noble Lord sitting behind him (Lord George Hamilton). The hon. Member seemed to have misunderstood the tenour and purport of the noble Lord's speech, just as much as he did the Answer given by Lord Salisbury. Certainly, so wild a notion as our being afraid of the Afghan tribes was never entertained by his noble Friend, who only said that Afghanistan was peopled by turbulent tribes, whose incursions had given us trouble for some years, and urged how desirable it was to terminate this state of things, both from a financial point of view, and also because of the effect these continual incursions had upon the minds of the people of India. That was a perfectly sound position, and entirely different from that which the hon. Member had described. The hon. Member went at some length into the question of the neutral territory. He stated that he would have left the question with regard to neutral territory just as it was; but he would have gone to Russia and said—"If you invade that territory in any way we will make it a casus belli." Well, why did the hon. Gentleman not do so? That was not the policy of the Duke of Argyll or the last Government. Lord Northbrook suggested that something of that kind should be done. He suggested that a despatch upon the subject of our relations in Central Asia should be brought to the notice of the St. Petersburg Cabinet, and they had on record in the last letter of the Central Asian despatches the distinct refusal of the Foreign Office to do anything of the kind. The hon. Gentleman complained of the expression which had been used with reference to Lord Northbrook's letter to the Ameer that it was involved in such a mist of conditions that it was calculated to confuse and irritate the mind of the Ameer. He thought any candid mind reading these Papers must come to the same conclusion. That letter certainly did mystify the Ameer. The hon. Gentleman also referred to the Memorandum, with which all were acquainted, written by Sir Henry Rawlinson, which certainly had evoked some very valuable opinions, and no one who read that Memorandum carefully and candidly could hesitate to admit that there was a great deal of truth in it. Whether the author of the Memorandum or its critics were right, he would leave to the judgment of those who were most competent to form an opinion. The hon. Gentleman described at considerable length what he conceived to be the policy of the Duke of Argyll in regard to this question. A great many hon. Members, no doubt, knew from his speeches what was the policy of the noble Duke on this question. It was, however, unfortunate, and it might be regarded as an extraordinary omission in these Papers, that for a period of nearly five years there was not a scrap of paper to be found from which any human being could detect what the policy of the Duke of Argyll was. It was, therefore, so far satisfactory to hear an authentic account of that policy from the hon. Gentleman; but it would have been still more satisfactory if the House could have known from the Blue Book what that policy really was from 1869 to 1874 with regard to this great question. The hon. Gentleman devoted the latter part of his speech to the criticism of what was called a scientific Frontier, and he said we had gone to war for a scientific Frontier. We had gone to war for no such purpose. We had gone to war to wipe out an insult offered to the honour of England; and no British Minister could have avoided going to war for that purpose. As to the questions which the hon. Gentleman had raised with reference to a scientific Frontier, he would only say Her Majesty's Government would be perfectly prepared to justify any arrangement that might be arrived at; but the time had not yet come when they could talk of such a thing as our Frontier arrangement of the future. The hon. Gentleman had spoken of the improved state of feeling in Afghanistan while the old policy was maintained; but he (Mr. Bourke) had failed to discover any satisfactory evidence of this in the Papers which had been produced. On the contrary, all that could be seen from the Blue Books was that our relations with Afghanistan since 1869 had been going from bad to worse, and the Border inhabitants could not visit Afghanistan without encountering hostile manifestations. But the hon. Gentleman said this was the effect of British policy in the East. Why, the measures to which the hon. Gentleman thus alluded were defensive measures. They were calculated to avert evils for which we were not responsible—against which we protested from the first—evils which were directed against the power and liberties of Europe; and those measures were ratified and approved by that House in a most signal and emphatic manner. And now, forsooth, these measures were to be condemned, according to the hon. Member. And why? Because, according to the theory of the hon. Member, they had been the means of developing the danger which some public men had foreseen, but which the public did not before believe in, and which some, who should have known better, refused still to believe in with obstinate simplicity. A great deal had been said upon authority on this subject and on personal character connected with it. He did not complain of any hon. Member for citing authorities, and when one cited living authorities the citations had necessarily more or less of a personal character. But there was one great difference between the authorities on the one side and on the other upon this question, and that was that the authorities who had been in favour of the inactive or old policy had been the means of landing us in the failure of 1873, from which we had never recovered; while those who had been on the side of Sir Bartle Frere and others had seen their prophecies altogether fulfilled. But this was not a question on which the House of Commons should be guided by authority only. They had the means of judging for themselves. No person with half the intellect of an ordinary Member of the House of Commons could fail to arrive at a conclusion satisfactory to his own mind. He would put aside the question the hon. Gentleman had addressed to the Chancellor of the Exchequer; when his right hon. Friend had the opportunity of speaking he would, no doubt, explain the opinions he had formerly expressed in a manner that would be satisfactory to the House. The hon. Gentleman stated that the estrangement of the Ameer had been caused by persistent attempts on the part of the Indian Government to locate British Residents in his territory. He would undertake to prove that the estrangement of the Ameer happened before 1876, and there was no reason to believe that the Ameer in his heart really objected, under certain conditions, to have British officers resident in his territory. At any rate, he should be able to show that the demand for the residence of British officers in Afghanistan was a necessary and just demand. Between 1869 and 1873 active negotiations were carried on between the Cabinets of St. Petersburg and London with regard to Afghanistan; and the main result was that the good offices of England were to be exerted to restrain the Ameer from aggression on Bokhara, whilst, on the other hand, Russian influence was to be exerted to restrain Bokhara from aggression on Afghanistan. Those negotiations were brought to the notice of the Home Government and they took them into their serious consideration. They were referred to in a despatch from Lord Northbrook, which would be found in the Blue Book dated June 30, 1873, No. 28. Lord Northbrook, after reviewing the general features of the case, said—the passage would be found at page 106—

“At the same time, much will depend on the firm adherence to the policy of non-annexation both by England and Russia; for we have good reason to believe that an advance of the Russian Frontier towards that of Afghanistan would undoubtedly revive in that country the uneasiness which the frank avowal of the good understanding between Great Britain and Russia on the general question of Central Asian policy has done much to allay.”

It was suggested that a copy of that despatch should be sent to St. Petersburg; but the Government of that time were certainly not of the opinion either of the hon. Member who had just addressed the House or of Lord Northbrook, because the despatch was not sent. Lord Lawrence was much of the opinion of the hon. Member—namely, that we ought to have entered into an arrangement with Russia, and if Russia violated it, we were bound to go to war. But that was not the opinion of the late Cabinet. Well, the Ameer evidently became alarmed at this time by the advances made to him by the Governor of Turkestan. His alarm was expressed in a letter from the Vakeel at Cabul, which would be found at page 197 of the Central Asia Papers. In it were the following passages:—

“Yesterday a murrasila from the Russian Governor in Turkestan was received by the Ameer in answer to His Highness' communication mentioned in my petition of 18th May, 1872. . . . His Highness in private said that he gathered from this murrasila that it was the wish of the Russian authorities to establish a regular and frequent correspondence with the Cabul Government. What demands careful thought in their inconsiderate language is, that notwithstanding that the Russian Government must have thoroughly apprehended and been convinced that the weal or woe of the Afghan State is entirely bound up in and associated with that of the British Government, still when writing about boundaries they make use of this unguarded expression, which may indicate God knows what intentions in their minds, viz., ‘for as much as the slightest alteration in intention leads to displeasure between parties, it destroys entirely the harmony which may exist between them.’ Further, when the Governor of Turkestan writes in his letter that the instructions of his Sovereign are to avoid all interference with or annoyance to his neighbours, it is a cause of astonishment that the Russian interpretation of harmony with neighbours is a strange one, for in but a few years they have extended their possessions from the foot of the Throne of Russia to the borders of Bokhara, and now style the Afghan State ‘their neighbours,’ oblivious of the fact that Bokhara and Khiva intervene. If (which may God forbid) the country of Bokhara and Khiva becomes theirs, and their Frontier is extended without the intervention of any buffer (‘pardah’) to the limits of Afghanistan, which may indeed be truly styled the Frontier of Hindustan, God only knows what line of policy or demeanour they will adopt towards Afghanistan, and what troubles may be in store for the Afghan and English Governments. On these considerations he was induced to hope that when the British Government has read and understood the drift of this murrasila, they may bestow even more serious attention than they have hitherto done on the establishing and maintenance of the boundaries of Afghanistan.”

[Cries of “Date!”] The date was July 20, 1872. It was perfectly clear, therefore, that the Ameer was at that time thoroughly alarmed; but the Government of India, relying on the engagement with the Russian Government about the Ameer's territories, treated his alarm as visionary, and wrote a letter telling him to regard the matter in a friendly spirit. We were told that anxiety day and night pressed on the Ameer; and when, after receiving such a letter from the Governor of Turkestan and attaching such a meaning to it, he found no notice was taken of it by those whom he had been led to look to as his protectors in case of need, he was naturally estranged. And, again, in a translation of a letter from the Agent at Cabul to the Commissioner at Peshawur, which would be found at page 110 of the Afghan Papers, there was an account of a conversation in which the Ameer said—

“My anxiety which I feel on account of the Russians will never be removed unless the British Government adorns the Afghan Government with great assistance in money and ammunitions of war for the troops, and unless great aid is given for the construction of strong forts throughout the northern Afghan border. And, further, if an emergency arises for the Afghan Government to oppose the Russians, such opposition cannot take place without the co-operation of the disciplined troops of the British Government.”

At that time, therefore, it was perfectly evident that the Ameer was ready to admit the disciplined troops of the Indian Government into his territories, and that he was not averse from seeing British Residents in his dominions under certain circumstances. An Envoy was sent from the Ameer to Peshawur, and on his arrival he made two distinct propositions which would be found at page 114 of the Afghan Papers. He requested, in the first place, that in the event of any aggression in the Ameer's territories the British Government would distinctly state they would consider the aggressor an enemy; and the next was that the contingency of aggression by Russia should be specifically mentioned in the written assurances to the Ameer. Telegrams, therefore, passed between the Indian and the Home Governments, the result of which was that the Ameer's Envoy was told it was advisable to postpone the question to a more convenient season. This refusal of the British Government to allay his anxiety was warmly resented by the Ameer, for he always looked upon that Mission as a failure. The Ameer's feelings could be gathered from the reply which he gave to the Viceroy. That was the satirical reply which had been read before and which, of course, he would not read again. He would only say he did not think that anything more clever or satirical had ever been penned by a Potentate, and it certainly showed that the Ameer was then smarting under feelings of the deepest kind—feelings from which he feared the Ameer never recovered. After indulging in this sarcasm the Ameer curtly refused a very plain request of Lord Northbrook with regard to a General who proposed to pass through his territories. About that time—1873—Yakoob Khan, his eldest son, who had for years been on bad terms with his father, was summoned to Cabul, where he went on condition that he should not be detained. He was arrested, however. We know that Lord Northbrook wrote a letter to the Ameer on the subject, and there was no one in this country, he was sure, who would blame Lord Northbrook. If he had been in Lord Northbrook's place he would have been inclined to do the same thing, accompanied, perhaps, by other suggestions. But that proceeding, whether prudent or not, had always been resented by the Ameer, and over and over again he had looked back to it as one of the greatest grievances from which he suffered. He should not have mentioned this subject had not the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread) brought forward the charge that the estrangement of the Ameer began in 1876. As great reliance was placed on that assertion by the opponents of the Government, it was important to meet it, and to show that there was not only an estrangement, but a decided feeling of injury in the mind of the Ameer before that time. We could not be much surprised at this; because at that period the Ameer's chief object was to obtain the recognition by the British Government of his favourite son Abdoolah, and he naturally thought that otherwise all the evils and misfortunes he had suffered himself would devolve upon his favourite son. He would now proceed to the second proposition—that there was no reason to believe that the Ameer entertained originally any real objection to receive British Residents in Afghanistan under certain conditions.

[Third Night.]

The hon. Member opposite (Mr. Grant Duff) seemed to attach greater importance to the testimony of Mr. Seton-Karr than to that of Captain Grey, simply because the former gentleman was the official Secretary. He was happy to say he believed he enjoyed the friendship of Mr. Seton-Karr; but that was no reason why he should not express his opinion that as Mr. Karr did not speak Persian, and as Captain Grey had a colloquial knowledge of that language, the latter would be the better authority as to a conversation carried on in Persian. At page 143 of the Blue Book it was stated that—

“From a reference to the secret records of the Persian Office, it appears that on the 17th March 1869 (while the Ameer was at Lahore) X. Y. reported the substance of a discussion which took place at Cabul on the receipt of the Viceroy's letter of the 9th January 1869. In this discussion the Ameer, Noor Mahomed Shah, and others took part, and the conclusion arrived at was that the British Government had no intention of interference in the internal affairs of Afghanistan. This discussion was followed next day by a private discussion between the Ameer and Noor Mahomed Shah, at which no third person was present. It turned upon the following passage in the Viceroy's letter:—‘It will be left to the Head of the Government of India year after year to determine what shall be done by the British Government in proof of its desire to strengthen your Highness' power, and what assistance in the shape of money and arms shall be given year after year for the consolidation of your Highness' Government and in evincing the good-will of the British Government.’ Syud Noor Mahomed Shah observed that ‘it does not appear from the wording of the passage what are the wishes of the British Government. If the Government desires to ask for any place in Afghanistan wherein to establish a cantonment, it is impossible to comply with its wishes, considering the usage of Afghanistan. If the Government should desire to send its troops to this country under the name of an auxiliary force, this will alienate the tribes from us and unsettle men's minds. What is practicable is this, that the money and arms be given by the British Government; the men composing the troops should be provided by us, and the power and management should rest with ourselves.’”

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: Who are you quoting from?

MR. BOURKE replied that he was quoting from the secret records of the Persian Office in India. This document, which would be found at page 143 of the Blue Book, purported to be a conversation with the Ameer and his friend in 1869 when he came down to Umballa.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: Who is the witness?

Mr. Bourke

MR. BOURKE: The hon. Gentleman will find it all in the Blue Book.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: The witness is X.Y.

MR. BOURKE: Yes; I hope the hon. Gentleman will not follow the example of others who say that these documents are untrustworthy.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: I want to see evidence that they are trustworthy.

MR. BOURKE said that, at any rate, all these documents were prepared ante litem; so that there could be no aspersions as to the wish of any individuals connected with the Government of India to put forward anything after the facts of the case were before the public. The document went on to say—

“Hearing this interpretation the Ameer said—‘May God will that at the time of treaty the wishes and requisitions of the British Government be such that there may seem nothing to prevent our complying with them. I would agree even to this, that the troops be our own and the military officers and drill instructors be furnished by the British Government, and that a confidential Agent of the Government be stationed in Balkh and Herat!’ Syud Noor Mahomed Shah said—‘Be that as it may, at the present time the British Government has also its own objects in view. You are the same Ameer Shere Ali Khan who after the defeat at Candahar repeatedly asked for assistance. Why did not the English agree then? Now both the parties have their own objects. May God vouchsafe all that is good!’”

Then it appeared that—

“On the 18th March X.Y. repeated a discussion that took place in the Saniman Boorj in the Lahore Fort on the 17th March, at which the Ameer observed that personally he would have no objection to an English Envoy being stationed at Cabul, but that owing to the turbulent character of the people it would not be safe. The same objection, however, did not apply to Balkh, Candahar, or Herat, and the arrangement by which an English officer should be stationed at these places would be beneficial to both Governments. A translation of this report was sent to the Foreign Office, and printed in extenso.”

MR. CHILDERS: Read the context.

MR. BOURKE proceeded to read as follows:—

“The Ameer and his councillors are reported to have said—‘The object of the British Government appears to be to place their own men on the Frontier. On every account the best plan would be that the Ameer arrange himself to procure intelligence and send it to the British Government. His Highness would be prepared to expend two lakhs of rupees annually for this purpose from his own treasury. On the 2nd April 1869 X.Y. reported that the previous night Syud Noor Mahomed Shah had represented to the Ameer that it would be advisable that the British Government depute Mahomedans to the borders of Afghanistan, Candahar, and Herat, and after the conquest of Balkh to Balkh, for the purpose of procuring information."

That, however, was only the opinion of Noor Mahomed, and he had already directed the attention of the House to what was the opinion of the Ameer. He hoped hon. Members would observe the sentence which followed—

"No more than one European or Native news-caterer should be stationed at one place. The Ameer approved of this advice."

MR. CHILDERS : Read the last sentence.

MR. BOURKE read as follows:—

"X. Y. now states that, so far as he could ascertain at Umballa in 1869, it was the belief of the Ameer's councillors that he never agreed to the location of British Agents in Afghanistan."

He was perfectly content to put the question in the way in which Lord Northbrook put it; and this disposed of the contention of Mr. Seton-Karr and other persons. There was no trace in 1873 that the Ameer would object to the presence of British Agents in Afghanistan, excepting Cabul itself. At page 131 of the Correspondence this passage occurred—

"On the whole, however, we think that either the Ameer himself or his Minister, Noor Mahomed Shah, did in confidential communications with Captain Grey express a readiness to accept at some future time not far distant the presence of British Agents at places in Afghanistan, excepting Cabul itself. But our impression is that the intimation was intended to be contingent either upon the receipt of far more substantial assistance than was promised the Ameer at the Umballa Conferences, or upon the conclusion of a Dynastic Treaty, that is, upon obtaining the recognition, in a Treaty with the British Government, of his son Abdoolah Jan as his successor. Such a formal recognition His Highness was anxious to secure, but Lord Mayo, for obvious reasons, declined to entertain the proposal."

That placed the whole case quite clearly and fairly. The truth was, that until the Ameer got alarmed in regard to the invasion of Central Asia, he looked much more to the safety of his own Throne from his family than to anything else. He hoped he had clearly established that up to the year 1876 there was no reason to believe that the Ameer would have objected to Residents being placed on his Frontier on certain conditions. He would next proceed to show that the demand that British Agents should be established in certain towns in Afghanistan was a demand which it was wise, necessary, and just for the Government to make. When Lord Salisbury assumed the Seals of the India Office in 1874 this country, it must be remembered, had undertaken very serious obligations with regard to Afghanistan, and he hoped he was not egotistical when he said that he took an opportunity of pointing them out to Her Majesty's Government at the time. The arrangement made in 1873 with Russia was the cause of an entirely fresh consideration of the whole affairs of the country; and from the very nature of the case, from the very circumstances in which the Ameer was placed, and the unsettled state of Turkestan, and all the regions between Persia and Merv, it was perfectly clear to the Government that what was now called the old policy, or rather the old method of proceeding, should be revised, and our position re-considered. At page 56 of the Central Asia Correspondence it would be found that Mr. Doria wrote from St. Petersburg, on October 6, 1875, to Lord Derby, saying that Baron Jomini had read to him a paragraph from a despatch from Krasnovodsk, in which it was stated that the Ameer of Afghanistan was said to be intriguing and exciting ill-feeling among the Turkoman tribes near Merv, which, his Excellency added, it was very desirable should be avoided. It was, therefore, perfectly clear that the Russian Government was ready to cast upon us the responsibility for what occurred with respect to Afghanistan and Merv; and that was quite sufficient to induce the British Government to take into serious consideration the whole of our relations with Afghanistan. Lord Salisbury's object, when he came to consider the state of the Ameer's mind, and to read the documents that were forwarded to him from India, was to win back the Ameer, if he possibly could, to the disposition in which he was when he left the Umballa Conference, and to draw closer the relations between the two countries. Then was written the despatch of 1875, which had been so much commented upon. Lord Salisbury directed that measures should be taken for establishing a British Agency at Herat. A great deal had been said about the animus shown by Lord Salisbury at that time; and the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread) had given the House to understand that he was guilty of a very high-handed proceeding in pressing the admission of an Agent at Herat. He did not think that was a fair charge. But in order to understand what was really in Lord Salisbury's mind and intention, they should read the concluding paragraph of his despatch to Lord Northbrook, in which he said—

"I have dwelt upon the importance of an English Agency at Herat exclusively for the sake of the information an English officer might collect. But it will have other material, though more indirect, results. It will be an indication of English solicitude for the safety of our allies, and may so tend to discourage counsels dangerous to the peace of Asia."—[Afghanistan, No. 1, p. 129.]

So that when he wrote that, Lord Salisbury had the most kindly intentions towards the Ameer. Then came Lord Northbrook's despatch objecting to that course. But considering what they knew regarding the advances made by Russia, and considering the communications which the Governor General of Russian Turkestan was making to the Ameer were becoming every day more frequent, was it not, then, the duty of Her Majesty's Government to ascertain what was really passing in Afghanistan, and not to be dependent on Native Agents for the information which should guide their relations with that country? At that time it was perfectly clear that their means of obtaining information were extremely unsatisfactory. Sir Richard Pollock's testimony on that point was thus referred to at page 137 of the Blue Book—

"Any Native Agent who took a perfectly independent tone at Cabul, and made no secret of reporting regularly to his Government, without reference to the wishes of the Ameer, all information that he believed to be correct, would very shortly find his position at Cabul unbearable."

That showed that the means of obtaining real information did not then exist, and that the proposal to place British Agents in certain places was politic and necessary. The hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread) was extremely indignant with Lord Salisbury; and the House evidently went with the sentiment which that hon. Gentleman uttered when he described the suggestion of Lord Salisbury to Lord Northbrook, that the latter should find some opportunity, some pretext, for pressing that matter on the Ameer, as "conduct unworthy of a British statesman." The words used by Lord Salisbury were, he thought, "find occasion." [Mr. CHILDEES: "Create."] It was very easy to put an evil construction upon anything. And it was impossible really to argue with anyone who came to the discussion with a foregone conclusion that some person or other, whose writing he was about to discuss, had been guilty of an ignoble action. But he asked the House to take that paragraph and compare it with one which appeared in Lord Northbrook's despatch in answer to one of these very communications. Speaking about the question of having a resident Agent at Herat—the advantage of which, the House should recollect, was never disputed for a moment by Lord Northbrook—that noble Lord himself, at page 133 of the Correspondence, wrote thus—

"We recommend that no immediate pressure be put upon the Ameer, or particular anxiety be shown by us upon the subject, but that advantage be taken of the first favourable opportunity that his own action or other circumstances may present for the purpose of sounding his disposition and of representing to him the benefits which would be derived by Afghanistan from the proposed arrangement."

Well, as he read that, it was almost a paraphrase of Lord Salisbury's words "find occasion." Lord Northbrook, very naturally and very properly, did not wish to deal brusquely with the Ameer, but desired that the Ameer himself should afford or create an opportunity, and that when that opportunity was presented it should be taken advantage of to discuss the matter. There was really no difference between the proposition thus made by Lord Northbrook and that for which Lord Salisbury had been so much blamed. The proposal that an Envoy should be received was made and rejected. A Vakeel was sent down to Simla to have communication with Lord Lytton. It was at this time that Lord Lytton first became acquainted with the real feelings of the Ameer on the subject. He wished here to refer to what was called the "aide mémoire for the British Agent at Cabul," given at page 185 of the Afghanistan Papers. Lord Lytton had been accused of using at that time imprudent language, of bullying the Ameer, and of authorizing the Vakeel to use most imprudent language to the Ameer. It was no part of his duty to defend every word of the language which had been used by Lord Lytton to the Vakeel. But before the House came to any decision upon this question it must be understood that Lord Lytton did not wish his conversations with his own confidential Agents to be conveyed to the Ameer as expressing his views, but rather the aide mémoire, which was drawn up with the special intention that it should be presented to his Highness as the expression of the views of the Viceroy; and he defied any hon. Member to find anything in that document which was not of the most kind, considerate, and flattering character. The words of Lord Lytton's aide mémoire, to which he wished to call attention, were the following:—

"I authorise the Agent to tell the Ameer that I am glad to find it in my power to relieve his mind from many apprehensions as to my intentions, which appear to have been caused by circumstances previous to my assumption of the Government of India. 2. I authorise the Agent to tell the Ameer that, if His Highness wishes to make me his friend, I will be a warm and true, a fast and firm, friend to him, doing all that is practically in my power to stand by him in his difficulties, to cordially support him, to strengthen his throne, to establish his dynasty, and to confirm the succession in the person of his son Sirdar Abdoolla Jan. 3. I am, therefore willing to give him a Treaty of friendship and alliance, and also to afford him assistance in arms, men, and money, for the defence of his territory against unprovoked foreign invasion. I am further willing to give him immediate pecuniary assistance, and to give to his son, Abdoolla Jan, the public recognition and support of the British Government. 4. But I cannot do any one of these things unless the Ameer is, on his part, equally willing to afford me the practical means of assisting His Highness in the protection of his Frontier, by the residence of a British Agent at Herat, and at such other parts of that Frontier, most exposed to danger from without, as may be hereafter agreed upon. I do not even wish to embarrass the Ameer, whose present difficulties I fully sympathise with, by carrying out this arrangement until after the signature of a Treaty of Alliance between us, on terms which ought to satisfy His Highness of the perfect loyalty of our friendship; nor until after the Ameer shall have had the means of making known to his people that the presence of a British Agent in Afghanistan signifies that he is there without interfering in internal State matters, as the firm supporter of the Ameer and of the heir-apparent, to aid them with all the influence and power of the British Government in defending their country against foreign aggression, and to discourage attempts on the part of the disaffected to disturb its internal tranquillity or weaken the throne of His Highness. 5. It will be the duty of any such British Agents to watch the external affairs of the Frontier, furnishing timely and trustworthy intelligence thereof to the Ameer, as well as to the British Government. Should the Ameer at any time have good cause to complain that any British Agent has interfered in the internal affairs of the country, the Agent will at once be recalled." —[Afghanistan, No. 1, pp. 185-6.]

What more could be said than was actually said by Lord Lytton in the document which he had quoted? He could not help thinking that if the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread) was aware of the actual state of the facts at the time when he spoke he acted unfairly in basing this part of his case against the Government, not upon the aide mémoire, which was, but upon the record of confidential communications, which was not, intended to be laid before the Ameer as the expression of Lord Lytton's views and wishes. So far as he was personally concerned, it was no part either of his desire or his duty to justify the wisdom of Lord Lytton in stating, so freely as he did to the Vakeel, his own opinion as to the position of the Ameer; but he challenged the hon. Member for Bedford to show that Lord Lytton desired to convey to the Ameer any language that was really offensive. An attack had been made upon the Government for the manner in which the Conference was closed; and it was said by the hon. Member for Bedford that Lord Lytton took the step because he found that the British officers would not do what he wanted, which was to obtain an extension of Frontier, and that the Government were anxious to pick a quarrel with the Ameer. He did not think anyone could read the history of the Conference without concluding that Sir Lewis Pelly, who knew exactly the mind of the Viceroy on the subject, and was in close relationship with him, showed the greatest patience, temper, and skill in the way in which he managed the negotiations. Sir Lewis Pelly's account of the whole business was perfectly clear; and it was not only grossly unfair, but inconsistent, for the Opposition to base their whole case upon confidential communications which had passed between the Vakeel and the Viceroy — communications which were never intended to be repeated to the Ameer—and to ignore altogether the aide mémoire used by Sir Lewis Pelly which was intended to be read to the Ameer, and which declared the opinions of the Viceroy. The negotiations for the Conference were broken off, and the whole case was fully stated in the final letter of the 15th of March, 1877, from Sir Lewis Pelly to Syud Noor Mahomed Shah, one passage in which was as follows:—

“If, however, as would seem to be the case, the Ameer, influenced by circumstances or considerations still unknown to the Viceroy, has completely changed his mind since he entered upon the negotiation (which, in its present form, was originated by His Highness), the very last thing desired or attempted by the British Government would be to pin His Highness pedantically to the fulfilment of an understanding from which he now wishes to withdraw, or the adoption of an arrangement which he does not regard with satisfaction. So far from wishing to urge upon his reluctant consideration the expediency of British Officers being appointed to assist him in the defence of his Frontiers, I am to inform your Excellency that the proposal of this arrangement was regarded by the British Government as a great concession; and that the British Government will most assuredly not allow its officers to undertake duties on behalf of Afghanistan involving a residence in any part of that country, unless their presence there is specially invited and cordially welcomed by the Ruler of it.”—[Ibid. p. 216.]

It was also said that the Conference was broken off because Lord Lytton feared he should not be able, in consequence of it, to carry out his own peculiar views—a most unwarrantable statement. The Ameer was increasing his military strength, massing his troops on the Frontier, inciting his troops to a religious war, soliciting the support of the Akoond of Swat, tampering with the tribes, and corresponding with the border Chiefs. In such circumstances, Lord Lytton believed it would have been wrong then to continue the negotiations; but he did not close the door to their resumption between the months of March, 1877, and September, 1878. The Ameer, however, took no advantage of that. Finally, the Ameer, who had based his refusal to receive English Residents in the towns on the ground that he would, in that event, have to receive a Russian Mission, and that Christian lives would not be safe in his territories, received a Russian Mission at Cabul with great pomp and ceremony, and prepared to fire on a British Mission.

Mr. Bourke

It was a mistake to suppose that our relations with Afghanistan had ever been of a neutral character. Afghanistan had always been regarded as under British protection. All the negotiations between the Russian and British Cabinets in the years from 1869 to 1873 proceeded on that basis. We were looked upon as the protector of that country by every Power in Europe, and by the Ameer himself. Large subsidies of money had been given to the Ameer, and extensive supplies of guns and firearms of every description, so that his conduct, in the face of these facts, indicated base treachery. He should like to know what the result would have been had England sent a Mission to Bokhara, and had it been received in a pompous manner, a Russian Mission in the meantime being fired upon. He thought there would soon have been an end to the Ruler of Bokhara. The Viceroy had treated the Ameer with full consideration, and after all that had passed the Government placed Shere Ali in a locus penitentiae. They gave him a month to consider, but it was all to no purpose. If there had been further procrastination, what would have been the effect on the tribes of the Frontier, who had already entered into friendly arrangements with the Representatives of the Viceroy, and with whom it was so essential, under any circumstances, to be on good terms? What would have been the effect on the Princes of India generally, who were looking on with anxiety? They had seen an insult offered to the troops of their Empress, and they spontaneously came forward with offers of aid to wipe out the insult. There was, in his opinion, nothing more gratifying in the whole of this business than the fact that from all parts of India Her Majesty had received the most cordial offers of the great Princes to co-operate by force and sympathy. The Nizam had sent from Hyderabad to offer his support; the Maharajah of Cashmere had offered to send a large number of troops into the field. The Maharajah Scindia of Gwalior, and the Maharajah Holkar of Indore, had done the same; and so had all the Rajpootana Chiefs, whose long lines of ancestry gave them a most commanding influence in the public life of India. All the great Rajahs of the Punjab, who 30 years ago were their enemies, had come forward to support them. Apart, therefore, from all other considerations, it behoved England to be careful not to do anything to discourage what was in the minds of the Indian Princes, or to tarnish in their eyes the honour of the Empire. But it was said by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich that the Papers had been "kept back." This was a very convenient phrase, and one that it was always desirable to fasten on a Parliamentary opponent. He could not help thinking, while the right hon. Gentleman was denouncing the Government, that he had laid himself open to a very obvious retort. If the House would turn to the Blue Book, it would be found that more than one-half of this Book was "kept back" by the right hon. Gentleman himself. One hundred and seventeen pages of the Book recorded transactions which had occurred before the present Government came into power. It might be said that no opportunity had arisen for the production of the Papers; but he would be excused for mentioning that in 1873, when the discussion took place on the Central Asian Question, he (Mr. Bourke) expressed regret that the House had not at that time the opinion of the Indian Government upon this question. Several hon. Gentlemen had spoken about the Prerogative of the Crown being strained by the Government. He regarded that charge as the most serious that could be brought against a Government. He looked upon the Prerogative of the Crown as being just as much a portion of the liberties of England as trial by jury or habeas corpus. These rights had been given to the Crown to exercise for the benefit of the people; and the Constitutional Advisers of the Crown ought to be the last to suffer any interference with them. But he held there was no wiser Prerogative of the Crown, or one which contributed to, or was more necessary for, the liberties and safety of this country, than that which threw upon the Crown—or, rather, upon the Constitutional Advisers of the Crown—the responsibility and solemn duty of declaring war to be necessary. To deny that right would be fatal to the best interests of England. He believed that our commerce would not be safe for a single day in any part of the world if retribution did not follow upon insult. He believed that English life in many portions of the world would not be safe if quick retribution did not follow upon outrage to English life; and he thought it would be a serious gain to great military and arbitrary Powers if, restrained by no Constitutional shackles, as we were, they could inflict a blow upon our honour or our territory, and that that blow could not be returned without the dilatory process of a vote in Parliament. What would have been the consequences in the present case had they been compelled to make a representation to Parliament before undertaking the war? They would then, in all probability, have lost advantages which had now been gained. They would, in all probability, have found Afghanistan fully armed; they would have found it fortified; they might have been obliged to sacrifice much more of English life; and they would, no doubt, have been engaged in a protracted war. In addition to all that, if they had been compelled to consult Parliament they would have been landed in a diplomatic antagonism which, under the circumstances, might have brought on serious difficulties. The Peace Party said—"Why did you not go to war with Russia?" All he could say upon that point was that they had done what they invariably did in dealing with a weak Power—and which, he thought, was very much to their honour—they had submitted to that from the weak which they would not have endured from the strong. If any great State had given England a tittle of the offence which Shere Ali had given, there would have been war long since. Lastly, he had to refer to another point which had been raised in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) at Greenwich—with reference to the Russian Mission to Cabul. The right hon. Gentleman quoted two despatches—the first, in which Lord Salisbury wrote to Mr. Plunkett—

"Should it prove that there is any truth in the statement that a Russian Mission has proceeded to Cabul, you will express the hope of Her Majesty's Government that it may be at once withdrawn, as being inconsistent with the assurances so frequently received from His Highness." — [Central Asia, No. 1 (1878), p. 150.]

and that in reply, in which M. de Giers wrote to Mr. Plunkett—

"I should add that the Mission, which you erroneously attribute to General Abramoff, is of a provisional nature, and one of simple

[Third Night.]

courtesy; it cannot, therefore, interfere in any way with the pacific assurances which you mention."—[Ibid. p. 164.]

And the right hon. Gentleman founded upon that the theory that Lord Salisbury acquiesced in that construction. That might be, if these two passages stood by themselves; but the right hon. Gentleman omitted to quote these important words from M. de Giers' despatch—

"The dispositions of the Imperial Government . . . . have necessarily been affected by the political condition in which we were placed by the attitude of England during the recent crisis in the East."

But he entirely denied that Her Majesty's Government had ever admitted that the Russian Mission to Cabul, being one "of a provisional nature and one of simple courtesy," was, on that ground, consistent with the engagements of Russia. But if the Russian Mission was at Cabul on account of the political condition of the relations between England and Russia, that was an answer the justice of which we could not dispute. That was the ground taken by Lord Salisbury. The provisional or courteous character of the Mission did not affect the question, but the relations between the two Powers did; and the Russian Ambassador had admitted that the Mission was an infraction of the agreement. He was sorry for having detained the House so long. He had endeavoured to meet some of the arguments that had been advanced in support of the proposed Vote of Censure, and he had endeavoured to prove that the war was just and necessary. He hoped and prayed most sincerely that, as it had been undertaken in self-defence, it would come to a speedy conclusion. He believed there never was a war undertaken more strictly in self-defence—that was, the defence of our Indian Empire, which he trusted would ever be as dear to the House as our own homes and our own honour.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY: I have endeavoured to examine this question strictly on its merits, and to form an independent opinion, entirely apart from Party considerations. I have tried to guide myself by a sense of right and justice, having regard also to the lives and taxes which the inhabitants of Ireland—and of Scotland and England too—may have to expend on any foreign quarrel that may arise. I have had to record a good many votes against the Government on foreign questions on which the Government appeared to trench on the rights of this House, or where they appeared to be leading us into very undesirable wars. At last, when Her Majesty's Government at the end of the last Session brought us peace—peace with honour—and saved us from a war—at least kept us out of one—I felt no hesitation in recording my vote for them. It turns out now that while we were discussing the Berlin Treaty, and for months and years before that Treaty came under discussion, a series of proceedings were being carried on under the direct guidance of statesmen in this country, which were calculated, if they were not intended, to launch us into the war in which we are engaged. I confess if I had known when the Berlin Treaty was before us that the Government, while holding out peace on the one hand, was on the other engaged in the measures which have led to the present war, I should have hesitated before I recorded that vote. Within living memory there never was a time when such commercial depression and agricultural distress prevailed both in this country and in Ireland, and it is in the midst of a state of things like that that this war comes upon us. I have spoken of the proceedings of the Government as being calculated, if not intended, to produce the present war. I do not believe that the wise and prudent heads in the Cabinet, to whom we particularly owe it that we escaped war with Russia last Session, could be fully acquainted with the proceedings of the last three years between Lord Lytton and the Ameer; but I think it is evident that by one head or by two heads—and those ingenious ones—the diplomacy and negotiations of the last two years were intended deliberately to produce the war, though they give but a very poor justification for the aggression now made. All through it has been argued, and all through the negotiations have proceeded on this footing—that those negotiations were intended to enforce the reception of British Envoys in Afghanistan. I venture to say that after the statements that have been made, and the debates we have listened to, no one can believe that the reception of those Envoys in Afghanistan was the end and object of the negotiations.

Why, we have been told by the most experienced Indian administrators that the Native Envoys we had in Afghanistan were sufficient to give us all necessary information. We were told furthermore—and the negotiations proved it—that the insistence on the reception of those Envoys could only have one effect, and that was to add to their refusal the irritation of the ancient and faithful ally we had in the Ameer. We are told all these things, and yet we are asked to believe that the First Lord of the Treasury, and an able statesman like the noble Lord who represents this country as Minister of Foreign Affairs, and who was then connected with India, conducted these long negotiations simply for the purpose of procuring the reception of British Envoys into a country in which it was admitted that the lives of British Envoys would not be safe, and where Native Envoys admirably performed all the duties that could be expected from delegates of any kind. There is further proof that it was never intended to make the reception of the British Envoys the end and object of the negotiations. When the first Envoy at the Peshawur Conference died, the Viceroy of India knew, as has been stated—and it remains uncontradicted in this House—that a second Envoy was coming, and that the second Envoy came prepared to concede what had been put forward as the pretext of those negotiations for two years. Then suddenly, and without any reason being given, the Conference of Peshawur was closed, because it was found that the pretext which was to lead to this war was about to disappear. Something further—the moment war becomes inevitable, I suppose in the one unguarded moment of his career, the First Lord of the Treasury comes forward, and says that the result of the war was to be an appropriation of territory. That was the object of the war. Was that a just object? I will not ask whether it would be worthy of the memory of our former conquests in India, because that is a delicate subject; but I will ask whether it is worthy of the principles which are supposed to govern this country in its foreign relations? It seems to me that it would have been more dignified and more worthy for this country to have negotiated openly with the Ameer for the cession of those territories, and to have said—"Give us those territories, which will be useful to us against our common foe, and our alliance will be cemented." Thus, under pretext of an object which would have been futile if persevered in, we have got into war, and I believe the result will be to lower the honour and prestige of this country. A few moments ago the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs congratulated us on the loyalty shown by enlightened Native Princes in coming forward with offers of assistance. Enlightened truly! They are enlightened as to the course the British Government will pursue towards any Native Prince who would thwart its purposes. They know that the sword of Damocles hangs over their heads, and that their safety depends on their offering assistance when required. We have been consoled, at an early stage of the Session, by the announcement that the people of India were to bear the burden of the cost; but it is a poor consolation to any 'generous mind' in either of the two Islands we represent that the expense should be thrown on the wretched people of India, who have already greater burdens than they can bear. For my part, although I represent a population who complains of its taxes, and which can hardly bear them, I reject the consolation. If the spirit which dictates this war proceeds we shall find ourselves engaged in other contests, and the poor taxpayers of India may not be able to bear the cost of extended operations of the kind. A great deal has been said by the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) on the infraction of Constitutional rights involved in the course pursued by Her Majesty's Government, and we heard from the Under Secretary of State the old doctrine literally advanced of the right of the Crown to declare war. There is no question of the right of the Crown to declare war—the question is whether, for the sake of the harmony which ought to prevail in a great Empire like this—where union is strength and dissension is weakness—the Crown ought to have declared war without consulting the other Estates of the Realm? Her Majesty's Government have put us in such a position that no man dare refuse the Supplies, because he will then be charged with failing to support the Government at a grave and critical moment. They take away the right of deliberation by Parliament; they take away the right of refusing Supplies. No Englishman would be willing to refuse Supplies when he knew the troops were depending on them. This Ministry has uniformly deprived us of all real control over the foreign affairs of this country. I have heard weak men say that Parliamentary government is on its trial at present. That means that if Parliament does not assent to the proceedings of the Government—if it insists on the right of the people of these Islands to see that their money is wisely, honestly, and justly spent—Parliament must be in some manner passed over, and its influence set at nought. I entertain very little fear on this score. There have been occasions in the history of this country when the power of Parliament was put in opposition to the power of another branch of the Government, and put into that position by the unwise exercise of the authority of the superior branch; and if the present course was persevered in, and a reverse were to happen to the arms of England, what branch of public authority would be in danger? Would it be the House of Commons, representing millions, whose prosperity was interfered with—whose fortunes were spent, whose blood was lavished by the authority of Ministers—or would it be that authority which Ministers abused? Everyone must know which would be the victor. In the history of the country from which I come we have in the past seen such negotiations entered upon, and Treaties made and tortuous diplomacy exercised, just as they have been exercised against us for definite purposes. We have seen Native Chiefs and Native owners of property and Native sources of authority and administration trapped and led into these negotiations, and we have seen the framework of social disorders. We have seen property taken away from the people, and we have seen Chieftains deprived of their inheritances, and that, too, in not very remote days, for it is only 180 years ago since the thing was finished. We have seen all this fresh in our history, and it is the same thing as that which we are now carrying on in Afghanistan. You will conquer this Afghanistan Monarch—you will add strength to your Frontier; but where is your civilizing influence to govern now when you have driven Afghanistan into the arms of Russia?—if, indeed, you have not planned with Russia a nefarious scheme of dividing the territory among yourselves. ["Oh, oh!"] I make no hesitation in repeating a view which occurred to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, and a view which has not yet been contradicted on either side of the House. ["Oh, oh!"] At any rate, if it has been contradicted, it is yet open to me to say that if you have no plan with Russia implicitly or explicitly, you have given Russia an excuse for doing North of Afghanistan what you have done to the South; and it is not by appealing to British justice, by appealing to your own spotless conduct, that you will prevent Russia from following your own course. If you want to do that, you will do that which will at last drive this country to go to war with Russia. I have felt that it is the duty of Irish Members to make this protest, though some of us have doubts whether we do not make some sacrifice of opinion by taking part in any but Irish affairs. I do not share those feelings. I have always felt, however small their weight, that Members coming here should discharge their duty according to the oath they have taken to be true to the Queen. It is their duty to stand up against what appears to them to be unjust to foreign countries. Perhaps we do not exercise as much influence as we ought; and perhaps those unfortunate dissensions which appear so amusing to you, but are so disastrous to us, prevent the voice of Ireland being raised, as it ought to be raised, in defence of the weak and in defence of right and justice in other countries. I think that if the voice of Ireland could be heard now it would be proclaimed against the unjust acts to which I have referred; and that I am acting in unison with my constituents, and the large majority of the Irish people, in joining the Liberal Party to-morrow in protesting against a war which it seems to me there is no necessity for, and for which, if there was a necessity, it is a necessity created by the conduct of the Ministry, and which necessity admitted has led in any case to a most unjust and un-Christian war.

LORD WILLIAM HAY said, they had been told that this war had been undertaken for the purpose of resenting

the insult which England had received. Nobody doubted that an insult had been given; but the position which he took, and which was shared by many Members sitting on his side of the House, was that the collision which had ended in war ought never to have taken place. Before stating the grounds on which he supported this Vote of Censure he would for a moment refer to what had fallen from the last speaker, questioning the loyalty of the Native Princes of India. He had some knowledge of the feelings of those Princes, and that warranted him in saying that there was no foundation for any such assertion. He believed the policy pursued towards them continuously since the Mutiny had removed from their minds every feeling of distrust. He had in candour to say that he did not share in what had been said in the course of this debate in condemnation of the Secretary of State for India for initiating what had been called the new policy; because when he went into office he had information as to what was going on in Asia which induced him to come to the conclusion that some vigorous measures should be taken with regard to our relations with Afghanistan, and he was not going to blame him for so doing. Further, he would say this—that if they were to maintain their supremacy in Afghanistan, Russia should have nothing to do with that country, and he believed that was admitted by all leading statesmen; and if they were to carry out that policy, it could only be done by their having an Envoy in some part of that country. Everybody who knew anything of Indian affairs would tell them that it was utterly impossible to learn anything referring to Indian States unless there was a Representative in those States, and to ask that an Envoy should be received in Afghanistan was a reasonable and proper request. There was another point to which he would refer, and it was this. It had been assumed throughout the debate that what was called the policy of masterly inactivity had been universally carried out since we entered into relations with Afghanistan, and that there had never been the suggestion of any other policy. Such, however, as he understood the Blue Book, had not been the case. It was, in fact, impossible to maintain a uniform policy—our policy must be changed according to circumstances; and it was a reflection on Lord Lawrence to say that he was unable to change his policy in the face of a change of circumstances. He would mention an instance of this in the conduct of Lord Northbrook. In 1875, when it came to his knowledge that the Russians were making an advance upon Merv, did he recommend the policy of masterly inactivity? He recommended nothing of the kind. On the contrary, he said that, having regard to Turkestan, it would be desirable that we should have a resident Agent at Herat. There was another instance of this in the conduct of Sir John Lawrence in 1867, when it was rumoured that Shere Ali was negotiating with Russia to recover his position in Afghanistan by ejecting his brother, who then reigned as Ameer of Cabul. When that rumour reached Sir John Lawrence, did he suggest that nothing should be done? On the contrary, he said in his letters—

“Should the rumour prove untrue, of course the necessity for any unpleasant action will no longer exist. But if it turn out to be founded on fact, then in that event we think that it might be highly . . . . for the interests of British India to declare the Treaty at present existing between us and Ameer Shere Ali at an end; and to openly assist the party in power at Cabul.”—[Afghanistan, No. 1, p. 20.]

or, in other words, he declared that the proper policy, under the circumstances, was to declare war. No doubt further down he said it was not desirable to send a resident Agent into Afghanistan; but the distinction between going to war because of a refusal to secure a British Agent and going to war because of Shere Ali's intrigues in Russia was a distinction without a difference. He referred to these matters to show that there had been a great deal of unnecessary discussion with respect to the initiation of a new policy. The reason they were now at war with Afghanistan was not, as had been repeatedly stated, because a new policy had been initiated, but because Lord Lytton was sent out to India with a determination to have a war, and he did not believe in what had been said about the reluctance of Lord Lytton to engage in hostilities. He did not believe at all that there was that extraordinary repugnance on the part of the Ameer to receive an Envoy; and he felt that had the other conditions been different the Ameer would have accepted. But the fact was Lord Lytton never intended that the conditions of an exceptional kind should be entered into, and he came to that conclusion after a careful perusal of that part of the Blue Book relating to Lord Lytton's administration. He admitted that the position of affairs when Lord Lytton went out to India in 1876 was one of extreme difficulty, and he (Lord William Hay) was the last man not to make full allowance for it. At that time our relations with Russia were very much strained, and war with that Power was not only possible but probable. In Central Asia, on the Northern Frontier, there was a Russian officer, General Kaufmann — resolute, courageous, adroit, and not over scrupulous. In Afghanistan we had a country ruled over by a clever, energetic, but, at the same time, an affrighted Prince. He would not refer to the reasons which led to that state in Shere Ali's mind in which he refused the Mission. He believed that it was produced by various causes, not the least of which was the vulnerability of his Turkestan Frontier. He did not believe that Shere Ali was at any time thoroughly hostile to Great Britain; but that, on the contrary, he would have preferred an alliance with England to an alliance with Russia. What, in the face of these circumstances, was the duty of Lord Lytton? It was his duty to imitate the conduct of General Kaufmann, and to have done everything in his power in defence of the interests of his country; and he (Lord William Hay) would be the last to support this Vote of Censure upon that nobleman for anything he did up to the date of the Treaty of Berlin; but what he did complain of was the unworthy sentiment which prevailed in the despatches on this question. For instance, he found this expression in one of the letters—

[Third Night.]

“As regards the latter, our only interest in maintaining the independence of Afghanistan is to provide for the security of our own Frontier.”

Could they conceive anything more distasteful or abrupt? It did not appear that Lord Lytton cared an atom about the Chief or people of Afghanistan any more than if they were so many sheep upon the mountains, or, to use the expression of the hon. Member for Oxford, our only regard for Afghanistan was that it should act as a buffer between ourselves and Russia. As he had said, the spirit and tone pervading these documents were disastrous. Then followed the Conference at Peshawur. There was a story told of an officer of irascible temper being sent on an important Mission; and when it was asked why a person with such an infirmity should be entrusted with such a delicate duty, it was said he had been sent there to be a blister; but in saying this he did not wish to imply that Sir Lewis Pelly had been sent to the Peshawur Conference with any such intention: but from his knowledge of that clever and distinguished man he should say that he was the man least likely to effect an amicable understanding with the Ameer. He found no fault with what took place before the Treaty of Berlin was entered into; but the Treaty had effected a total change in the position of things. After the Treaty was signed it had become the duty of the present Government to make every representation in their power to the Russian Government to induce them to withdraw their troops from, and to recall their Mission from, the territories of the Ameer. He believed that the Government had very wisely and properly adopted that course; but, at the same time, to make their policy effectual, they ought to have sent instructions to the Indian Government to avoid the risk of collision with the Ameer. It was indispensable that that should have been done. The position in which Russia had been placed in consequence of this war was a most peculiar and unpleasant one. How was it possible for Russia to withdraw altogether from the position which she had taken up at Cabul when it was known throughout Central Asia that the war had been declared in consequence of her having taken up that position? To use an Eastern expression, if Russia withdrew from it now, her face would be blackened. Moreover, this war gave Russia the excuse she wanted for further extending her Possessions towards India. Had she been asked to withdraw her Mission, and had we at the same time acted in a conciliatory manner towards the Ameer, Russia would have had no excuse for doing what she was now doing—extending her forces to Merv, and perhaps, in a few years, to Herat. He believed that if Shere Ali had had a little time allowed him he would have come round, because he thought he was never really hostile to England. The Blue Book afforded evidence of his desire to be on friendly terms with England; and no better evidence of that friendly disposition could be furnished than the fact, that when choosing an asylum to which he could send his relations in time of trouble, he looked not to Russian territory, but to India. He would further say that, in his opinion—and he had some knowledge of the country—the military position would not have been in the least degree imperilled or prejudiced if a little further delay had been allowed; it would have been just as good next spring as during the autumn of this year. When they considered how mischievous would be the consequences of provoking this war, there was really no explanation of it, but that the Government were determined to go to war. The right hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) said he believed this war was undertaken because the Government considered it necessary to maintain the prestige of England. He heard a very brilliant speech the other night, in which the speaker said that of all the fruitful causes of war he knew the most fruitful was the dogma of “peace-at-any-price.” If that were so—and no doubt there was some truth in it—he ventured, on the other hand, to say that of all the other causes fruitful of mischievous and unnecessary war, this doctrine of prestige was one that exercised the greatest influence. The hon. Member for Oxford (Mr. Hall) said that prestige was like the credit of a bank or a mercantile institution. He agreed in that comparison; but what did the credit of a bank depend upon? It depended upon its resources, and upon the knowledge that those resources were adequately, carefully, and prudently administered. The prestige of a country depended exactly on the same conditions; and what he had to complain of was that the administration of this country was not at present conducted on sound and prudent principles. They had recently had melancholy experience of a bank sustaining its credit long after it had ceased to deserve it. It was badly managed, and not only that, but it was badly managed in secret. The innocent shareholders woke up one morning and found themselves on the brink of ruin. Our affairs were badly managed in India, and managed in secret; and we might wake up some day and find not only war declared, but the most disastrous consequences inevitable. It was because he sincerely believed that the management of the affairs of the State was now in hands that ought not to be trusted to manage them, and that mismanagement had led to an unnecessary and therefore unjust war, that he should heartily give his support to the Amendment.

MR. A. GATHORNE HARDY said, that the speech of the noble Lord who had just sat down had proved, at any rate, that any reason offered in support of the Amendment was sufficient to gain the approval of hon. Members below the Gangway, however much they differed among themselves. He desired to state, at the outset, that he considered it deplorable that they had been unable to carry on the debate on a great question of policy without importing into it imputations of dishonesty and fraud. Such a course was calculated seriously to lessen the dignity of that great Assembly. The hon. Member for the Elgin Burghs had thought it fitting in him to speak of Her Majesty's Government as being prodigal of everything but of authentic information. [“Hear, hear!”] He was obliged to hon. Gentlemen opposite for that cheer, as it showed that not only the hon. Member for the Elgin Burghs (Mr. Grant Duff), but other hon. Members, were content to make and to carry on those personal imputations. Another personal imputation had been made in reference to the despatch of Lord Cranbrook, which had been remarked upon in a similar way; but, for obvious reasons, he would not comment upon that matter. Nor would he quote the speeches which the right hon. Gentlemen the Members for Greenwich and Pontefract (Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Childers) had delivered to their constituents. But the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich had stated, in respect of the despatch of Lord Cranbrook, that in it

“the art of saying one thing and of suggesting another had been carried to such a pitch of perfection that he doubted whether the future, with all its development, would be able to improve it.”

He did not propose to say one word in defence of the character of Lord Cranbrook, or of his despatch. That he left in the hands of the House, in which the noble Lord had sat for 20 years. The right hon. Gentleman went on to say that the Blue Book involved mis-statements of fact amounting to reckless negligence, which he stopped short of saying raised suspicions of deliberate deception. That, as the noble Lord the Member for Middlesex (Lord George Hamilton) observed, was saying, as nearly as it could be said in Parliamentary language, that the Blue Books contained untruths. Well, he listened with interest for the proof which the right hon. Gentleman might adduce in support of those accusations; and he was astonished—as he was sure hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway were also—at the mouse which the mountain in labour brought forth. It turned out that the right hon. Gentleman had armed himself with the microscope of prejudice, and having scanned the Blue Book thought he discovered certain inaccuracies, which, if true, were of very little importance, for what did they amount to? For his part, he was far from admitting that the right hon. Gentleman had adduced any conclusive proof of his assertions. The despatch of the Indian Government to the Home Government of the 10th May, 1873, was, the right hon. Gentleman said, intended to deceive. How could it deceive, when it inclosed the 52 documents on which it was based? In like manner, how could Parliament be deceived by the despatch, when, with the despatch, they received copies of those 52 documents? Then, again, it was said that the Instructions to Sir Lewis Pelly, which he read to the Ameer's Envoy, were intended to deceive him. It certainly could not deceive the Envoy, who was thoroughly acquainted with all the facts; and it could not deceive Parliament, to which it was presented, with the explanatory documents. The imputations cast upon Lord Salisbury—greatly, as he thought, calculated to discredit both Houses of Parliament—he would not refer to, as they had been satisfactorily refuted by the noble Lord. It was, however, interesting to remember how Lord Salisbury, who, when he, for reasons which did him the highest honour, separated himself from his Party, became the idol of the Party opposite, as being a most honourable and straightforward man, was now sought to be degraded by them, so that among them there were “none so poor to do him reverence.” He ventured to think that Lord Salisbury would disregard the blame passed on him now as he did the praise bestowed on him then by the Liberal Party from the same unworthy motives. There were three questions of varying importance to which he desired briefly to refer. The first was, Who was responsible for the estrangement and ill-will of the Ameer? Next, was it caused by the policy of Her Majesty's Government? And, most important of all, was it true, as hon. Gentlemen opposite asserted, that that policy was not an honest policy, but was one used as a pretext for going to war? That was a serious assertion to make. A Government might err, and could, in consequence, be turned out; but if they adopted a particular policy as a pretext for going to war, they would be guilty not of an error, but of a grave and serious crime. When he heard those accusations so freely made by hon. Gentlemen opposite, he was reminded of an anecdote told of a scion of a distinguished Liberal house, who had attained the advanced age of three years, and who, having heard a great deal of political conversation, addressing his mother, said—“Mamma, are all Tories born bad, or do they only grow bad?” He did not know whether it was the original sin of Toryism, or the Toryism that had grown up that they were now accused of. Well, but to what was due the blame for the estrangement of the Ameer from the British Government? He believed it was due to the policy pursued by Lord Northbrook in 1872. The cause was to be found there—the effect, the evidence of his estrangement appeared subsequently, and was evidenced by his letter, in which he showed the greatest proof of hostility that had appeared in any epistle ever addressed by an Oriental Prince to the British Government. The Ameer demanded certain assurances from us, and he was far from saying that he ought to have received them. One was that we should protect him against aggression from Russia. His Envoy entreated that such an assurance should be given, and he received one which was vague and unsatisfactory. But they were now told that the assurance given meant the same thing. But, if it did, why was it not given in plain terms? Hon. Gentlemen opposite said that such an assurance would have been offensive to Russia; but as Russia had declared that she did not intend to interfere in Afghan affairs, in what respect could it be offensive? No doubt the assurances given by Lord Northbrook to the Ameer were very much the same as those given by Lord Mayo; but it should be remembered that circumstances had considerably altered in the interval. The Russians had advanced; and while, at the time of the Umballa Conference, the Ameer had barely attained official recognition, and was glad to have Lord Mayo's friendship on any terms, at the period of Lord Northbrook's Viceroyalty he came forward to say—"I have Lord Mayo's assurances, but I want something more definite," and was met with the answer—"No; we will adhere to our settled policy." It was alleged that the negotiations carried on by Lord Lytton were nothing more than a pretext for war; but Lord Derby and Lord Carnarvon, who certainly could not be regarded as favourable witnesses for Her Majesty's Ministers, were in the Cabinet during the greater part of the time, and they saw no tendency in the policy of the Government to war. He had intended to deal with the Constitutional question, but he would not now take up the time of the House by doing so. He would only say, in conclusion, that he considered that the temporizing policy of the Ameer left the Government no other course than they had adopted. The Ameer temporized, in order to see whether he could come to terms with Russia. He (Mr. A. Gathorne Hardy) ventured to think that Her Majesty's Government had been treated, under circumstances of the greatest difficulty, as no other Government had ever before been treated. Their negotiations had been interrupted and their actions misinterpreted. The Opposition had shown but little generosity, and if the wish of the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) were fulfilled—namely, a speedy appeal to the country—he believed the country would show more generosity than had the Members of the Opposition. He did not believe that the country was frightened by the Constitutional bogies that had been conjured up; but he believed it would support the Government, recognizing that, though under circumstances of great difficulty and danger, there might possibly have been some blundering, the Government had acted honestly, and had done its duty.

MR. FOLJAMBE dissented entirely from the three pleas which were offered in justification of the war—namely, the so-called insult to our Embassy; the danger apprehended from Russia; and the necessity for a rectification of Frontier. The insult to our Embassy, it seemed to him, had no better foundation than one of those convenient telegrams of which, unfortunately, we had had so many, official or unofficial; and which, having served their purpose of inflaming the passions and exciting the supposed patriotic zeal of Englishmen, were contradicted. With regard to our jealousy of Russia, surely there was no reason for its existence now that "peace with honour" had been brought back from Berlin, and that Russia was one of our Allies. And as for fear of Russia, under whatever Government might exist, he hoped this country occupied too high a position to do anything derogatory or unjust from fear of Russia. The third, or "rectification of the Frontier," plea was of all three the one that ought to have least weight in an assembly of Englishmen. In plain language, it meant nothing more nor less than coveting your neighbour's property and removing your neighbour's landmark. Nothing could be politically right which was morally wrong; and all the three reasons alleged for the war appeared to him abhorrent to his own moral sense as well as contrary to the principles of hon. Gentlemen sitting on the Opposition side of the House. The policy of the present Government reminded him of the lines of Moore—

Has love to that soul, so tender,
 Been like our Lagenian mine,
 Where sparkles of golden splendour
 All over the surface shine—
 But, if in pursuit we go deeper,
 Allured by the gleam that shone,
 Ah! false as the dream of the sleeper,
 Like Love, the bright ore is gone."

MR. C. BECKETT-DENISON said, this was one of the rare occasions on which he was not content to give a silent vote, and it was with regret he found himself taking part in a "Party" debate on a grave Indian subject which ought to be looked at from a far higher point of view. But hon. Gentlemen opposite had chosen to depart from the healthy traditions of Parliament on such questions, and with them the responsibility of the matter lay. The debate,

unfortunately, was not only to be regretted for itself, but also for the language imported into it, particularly by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich. He had always before listened to the right hon. Gentleman with pleasure and admiration, and more than often with instruction and advantage; but when he heard the right hon. Gentleman speak the other evening he said to himself—"How are the mighty fallen!" When he thought that the other day he was a powerful Minister of a powerful Party, always receiving for his opinions generous interpretation of motives, his language the other night was to his mind, he would say, deplorable. He could not better sum up his opinion than in the words of a favourite actor now living, in which he said—"Of all the shows that ever we did see, this is the most scorching exhibition of all." The right hon. Gentleman's speech was a scorching one, scorching in its terms, but certainly not from the strength of its arguments. Passing from that painful subject, he came to the indictment formulated against the Government. He would ask on what that indictment was based? and he thought the reply was that during the last 12 years—under a succession of Viceroys—a perfectly peaceful policy with regard to Afghanistan was pursued, and that all of a sudden, without adequate motive, and without the cognizance of the people of this country, that policy was designedly changed, and that Lords Salisbury and Lytton, acting in concert, so conducted their negotiations that they had virtually, and with malice prepense, brought on the war which was now upon us. That, if substantiated, would be the basest accusation that could be brought against public men; and, if so substantiated, they would certainly deserve to be driven from Office and from power. But what were the facts? Lord Lawrence and his successors pursued a policy which, perhaps, was fitted for the times in which they ruled—a policy designated by the high-flown title of "masterly inactivity." It was not a very appropriate title; for it was a policy of referring to a more convenient time and a later day subjects that might have been dealt with and grappled at the time. It was not necessary to say a word in disrespect of the three noble Lords, for they stood too high in public estimation to be affected by hard words. But he lamented, as did the country, that hon. Members in that and the other House should come home and, by implication, throw dirt on successors, who had to deal with the difficulties they bequeathed them. The case of Lord Lytton stood on different grounds. He was engaged in carrying the standard of the Queen in a far distant country, and consequently was not here to defend himself from the charges of misconduct that had been brought against him by the Opposition; and he regretted that the noble Lord (Lord William Hay) should have said that the present Viceroy went out to India with the settled purpose of provoking war with Afghanistan. When Lord Lytton read the debates, and found that all objections were centred on him, and that he had gone to India with the settled purpose of provoking a war—when Lord Lytton read that language, and saw that it was cheered by hon. Members below the Gangway, he would ask himself, was that the justice a man ought to receive from the British Parliament? There was no doubt but that his policy was the policy of the Home Government, because they were the last men to shrink from their portion of responsibility, and he should be ashamed to support any Government that attempted to shift their responsibility on to the shoulders of another. The point raised in the debate sorely touched the honour of Lord Lytton, for he was charged with having purposely, knowingly, and designedly so conducted the negotiations at Simla, and later on through Sir Lewis Pelly, as to make it impossible for the Ameer to come to terms and enter into a Treaty, and then carrying on until he had worked the Ameer up to give serious cause for offence. That was a view of the subject which it was impossible that he could take. It was not fair to Lord Lytton or Lord Salisbury; and here the indictment of the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread) broke down. There was nothing in Lord Salisbury's instructions to Lord Lytton at which any high-minded statesman need blush, or anything in them that might not see the light of day. No secret was made of the fact that the instructions were founded upon the altered position of Russia in Afghanistan; and the flaw in the Amendment, and in the arguments by which it was supported, was that sufficient consideration was not given to the changed circumstances in which Lord Salisbury found himself. Was a statesman responsible for the government of India to shut his eyes to what was going on in Afghanistan and on the Oxus, and continue to treat Indian subjects as in the days of Lord Lawrence, and in the early days of Lord Northbrook? Any Minister would have been bound to take the changed circumstances into consideration and to issue instructions accordingly. Speaking of the Ameer, Lord Salisbury said in his despatch—

“He may think himself bound to assert supposed rights which may trench on the claims of Russia or of her allies; and steps may be taken which, in the judgment of the Frontier commanders, may render a movement in advance necessary to the honour of Russia before your Government has had the opportunity of interposing either remonstrance or restraint. The chance that any of these opportunities would be offered for the establishment of a dominant Russian influence in Afghanistan would be materially diminished, if not wholly neutralized, by the presence of a British Officer in that country. The evils to which I have referred would lose their formidable character if warnings could be given to your Government, or advice tendered to the Ameer, in good time. They could only grow to dangerous proportions if their first commencement were hidden from your knowledge. . . . The case is quite conceivable, in which Her Majesty's Government may be able, by early diplomatic action, to arrest proceedings on the Frontier which a few weeks, or even days, later will have passed beyond the power even of the Government of St. Petersburg to control. On all these grounds, Her Majesty's Government continue to attach very serious importance to the presence of a British Agent in Afghanistan. I do not gather that your Excellency is inclined to differ from this judgment. But, in your opinion, the moment for giving effect to it will not arrive until the advance of Russia is further developed, and its forces have occupied Merv. In this opinion it is impossible for Her Majesty's Government to concur.”—[Afghanistan, No. 1, p. 148.]

This showed that the dominant idea in Lord Salisbury's mind was that the altered circumstances on the Frontier required a different treatment; and the burden of subsequent despatches was that we could do nothing with the Ameer until we could use our own eyes and ears within his dominions, Cabul being always excepted, and rightly, because our presence there would have been unfavourable to the authority of the Ameer with his own people, though it was far different at Herat and other places. But the Ameer would not consent, not because he could not protect them, which was a fair pretence to put forward in negotiations, but because he was afraid that if Resident Political Agents came into his country his dignity would suffer, and that in course of time he would lose his authority and his independent position. [“Hear, hear!”] Hon. Members said “Hear, hear!” but did they mean to say that because of this we ought not to send Representatives there? The Ameer's ambition was to be placed on the same footing as the Shah of Persia, and the Shah had never objected to the British Consuls residing in his country. Was this an objection that we, having Treaty rights and material interests at stake, were bound to hold in regard? Was that a reasonable objection for the Ameer to make to the British Government after receiving at various times their subsidies of money and arms? He believed if Shere Ali had yielded that point we should have been at this moment on friendly terms—we should have had a British Resident at Herat, and would have had at the earliest moment information which would have enabled us to arrange by diplomacy matters which could now only be rectified by the sword. Then there was the Russian point of view. The Russians were making preparations for a state of warfare with this country. They were more on the alert than we were, and they took their measures in time. He read an extract from The Vedomosti, a St. Petersburg paper, published after the Treaty of Berlin, which said—

“General Stolieteff's Mission was a diversion intended to withdraw England's attention from the East to the far East. But we certainly did not mean to rouse the somnolency of Great Britain to the extent we have. Great Britain is actually preparing to destroy Afghanistan, and thereby deprive Russia of all the fruits of her numerous Asiatic campaigns—campaigns carried on for so many years with such enduring patience and at such an enormous cost. Are we now to shrink from our duty and deliver our ally to the enemy? If we postpone succouring Shere Ali till the English have established themselves in Afghanistan millions of money and numerous armies will be required to turn the invader out of those Passes now thrown open to us for nothing. To render English attacks upon Afghanistan altogether impossible, it is sufficient to send some money, some artillery, and some officers to Shere Ali. This will defend the Passes, on the maintenance of which depends the 'to be or not to be' of our position in Asia."

It would have been impossible for any Cabinet to ignore that altered state of circumstances in Afghanistan. The question, of course, remained whether what had been done with Shere Ali might not have been accomplished by other means—whether by prolonged negotiations during the winter they might not have brought the Ameer to a better sense of his position, risking the effect of all the arms and men and money that might be poured into Afghanistan. But, under all the circumstances of the case, we had no alternative, after the failure of Sir Neville Chamberlain's Mission, but to show that we were in earnest, and would not permit the Ameer to say "nay" to us while he said "yea" to Russia. The alternative presented by hon. Members opposite was that we should have declared war against Russia—that it would have been more magnanimous and more to the purpose; but that argument had been commented upon in "another place" and completely answered. After a diplomatic intercourse, renewed during the autumn, on the subject, we had no casus belli with Russia as regarded the Stolieteff Mission. Some hon. Members had asked whether the Russian Mission was still at Cabul? He did not know whether it was there or not; but if some members of it should still be there, from his point of view, pressure ought to be put upon Russia for their withdrawal, because it had been admitted in writing that the old understanding retained all its validity—that England had her exclusive rights in Afghanistan, and that Russia would maintain nothing but amicable relations. There need be no quarrel with Russia if she assented to that understanding. The case of the Ameer was far different; we had our own dignity and honour to defend in the face of India; and, in spite of the imputation of unworthy motives, he did not hesitate to express his opinion that Her Majesty's Government could not, under the circumstances, have acted otherwise than as they did. Indeed, had Gentlemen opposite been in their place they must have adopted the same course. Had they failed so to act, and continued to follow a policy of masterly inactivity, allowing Afghanistan to become subject to the dominion of Russia, they would have been arraigned before public opinion and condemned for two of the most damning crimes statesmen could be guilty of—the exhibition of moral cowardice and dereliction of public duty. With regard to the argument of hon. Gentlemen opposite, that the present time, when the industry of the country was depressed, was inopportune for going to war, he asked them to consider what the consequences would be if such an argument were logically acted upon. If we were never to make war except when the trade of the country was prospering, nations desirous of attacking us would wait until trade was depressed, and then say—"Now that they have not the courage of their opinions we will make war upon them." He hoped that the Government would not be betrayed into the trap of prematurely saying what they did or did not intend to do under given circumstances, but that they would judge for themselves when the events arose. As this war had been entered upon to defend the Indian Frontier, it would be unjust to throw the whole expense upon the people of this country; but it would be worthy of a great nation if it shared with India a large proportion of the cost in a spirit of chivalry and generosity.

MR. RYLANDS: Sir, I am glad to agree with one remark of the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. C. Beckett-Denison). The hon. Gentleman expressed his regret that this case which we are now discussing has assumed a Party complexion; and I am quite of opinion that it is a deplorable circumstance that when this House is sitting in judgment on the policy of the Government—a policy which involves most serious and most solemn issues—we cannot approach the consideration of that policy without being divided into sharp Party lines. I am quite aware that hon. Gentlemen on that side of the House are disposed to believe that we, in attacking the policy of the Government, are actuated by Party motives, and possibly from a desire to disturb the Government out of the seats that they now occupy. We, on our side of the House, look across at our opponents, and our belief is that hon. Gentlemen, the supporters of the Ministry, with that conspicuous loyalty to their Party which they continually manifest, are prepared at the present moment to shut their eyes to the most distinct evidence in regard to this question; and I believe they are prepared to sacrifice their judgment, and that hon. Gentlemen, rather than vote in favour of a Vote of Want of Confidence, would swallow a great deal for the sake of Party. Well, Sir, these are circumstances which we deplore. We have also heard a statement that the discussion of this Indian policy on Party grounds is a serious danger to our Empire in India. The noble Lord the Secretary of State for India in "another place," referring to this subject, used very strong language, and said if we make India a Party question the days of our Indian Empire are numbered. I quite believe that it is a danger to India if these matters of Indian policy are to be discussed as a Party question. I quite admit that it is very much to the interest of the Government of this country, in dealing with that Empire, that they should be supported, as far as possible, by the united voice of the Parliament of England. I can quite understand that in carrying out great operations, and when we are engaged in matters of very great delicacy, it is important that we should have a powerful Government. I can quite understand that the Government are embarrassed by the fact that there is a large and influential minority arrayed against them in this House, and that in the country there is a very great party against them. Sir, I admit that. But who are to blame for this feeling of Party on the question of our Indian Empire? I charge upon the Government the blame of making this a Party question. I say that the Government have taken an irretrievable step. They have declared a war without having consulted, in the slightest degree, the Representatives of the British people. They have ignored Parliament. And it is no answer to that charge to say that they have now called Parliament together. You called Parliament together. What for? To consult Parliament? Nothing of the kind. Parliament is called together; and in the Speech from the Throne certain accomplished facts are stated, about which it is impossible that Parliament can take any sufficient action. Now, Sir, what would have been the course if the Government had come down to this House some few months ago and had taken Parliament into its confidence? If full information had been laid on that Table—not with reference to accomplished facts, but in order to give the House an opportunity of expressing a judgment upon the policy and the circumstances brought to their knowledge—I know perfectly well that there would have been a certain amount of independent criticism from those Benches with hon. Gentlemen opposite, if this matter had not been absolutely determined beforehand. And there would have been a careful reading of the Papers; and with the feelings of that sense of responsibility which, I am sure, hon. Gentlemen opposite feel as well as ourselves, they would have taken up the solemn issues, and exercised their judgment upon them. The Government did not want the independent criticism of their own supporters. It would have had fair criticism from this side of the House, and also had the benefit of knowing what the public opinion of the country was with reference to these matters. If the Government had taken that course, there would have been no war. I have a very strong opinion that if the country had been in possession of information, and had been able to discuss the matter, I believe firmly that no war would have been declared. But if, on the other hand, the war had not been prevented, and the judgment of the House had supported the policy of the Government, I can only say that, under those circumstances, you would not have that strong antagonism that you are meeting with at the present moment. I believe that we should have approached the matter in a different spirit, and that a large amount of Party animosity would have been avoided. But the Government not only refused to consult Parliament, but they misled and hoodwinked Parliament. They did this, I am bound to say, by statements of such a character that it requires the greatest charity to believe that they were not made with a view to mislead. In taking this course the Government, as far as they are able, have made this House lose its hold on the Executive Administration of the country, and what will be the consequence if this course is persevered in? It so happened that on the 28th February, 1859, a very distinguished Member of this House—a gentleman of the highest authority—made some remarks upon this subject. He said—

"If this House loses its hold over the Executive of the country, what happens? We fall back on a bureaucratic system, and we should find ourselves, after all our struggles, in the very same position which in 1640 we had to extricate ourselves from. Your Administration would be carried on by a Court Minister, perhaps a Court minion."—[3 Hansard, clii. 981.]

These were wise words, and they were uttered by the right hon. Benjamin Disraeli; and now the Earl of Beaconsfield, as Prime Minister of England, is adding to the marvellous inconsistency of his career by endeavouring to lose the hold of the House of Commons on the Executive Government. The Government in their proceedings have treated with contempt the Parliament of the people, and they have magnified the Prerogative of the Crown. Now, Sir, I venture to say that that course is not calculated to promote the interests of the Crown. I believe that it is a dangerous and a revolutionary course, because it tends to disturb the settled relationship which exists between the Crown and the people. It has been said that the British Constitution is a compromise. There are the Three Estates of the Realm, and each of these Estates have certain abstract rights; and it is understood that if one of these Estates presses its abstract rights, and pushes them to the utmost, you must inevitably have a dead-lock and have danger. We charge upon the Government that they are doing this. They are pushing to an extreme and dangerous extent the abstract right of one of the Three Estates of the Realm, and I think that that is a danger. Now, Sir, I think that, in view of these circumstances, we ought to remember that in this country we have called into existence, by recent legislation, a great democratic power. We have enabled the people of this country to take part, by their Representatives in this House, in the Government of the country; and so jealous have we been of the liberties of the Representatives of the people in Parliament, that we will not allow the Queen to impose a single farthing of taxation, unless with the consent of the Representatives of the people; and yet, although we are so jealous of the right of the Crown to tax the people in the slightest degree, we are prepared to give to the Crown a Prerogative which in its operation may, by involving this country in war, involve us in very serious burdens. Does the Government think that the people will allow this Prerogative to continue to be exercised, without some control? Hitherto, the Prerogative to declare war has been concealed and tempered by the understanding that it would not be exercised, except in cases of unexpected and immediate emergency. I very much question whether any case of such extreme emergency could arise sufficient to justify the exercise of the Prerogative without Parliamentary sanction. But there has been no such emergency in this case that could be pretended for a moment. This Prerogative has been paraded before the country in its most repulsive feature; and the challenge clearly given to the country is—whether this Prerogative should continue or not? We may estimate very accurately what the result of the challenge will be. I have no doubt that the present House of Commons will be willing, by supporting the Government in the action they have taken, to sacrifice the rights of Parliament and maintain the Prerogative of the Crown. This struggle will not end in this House. The people who elect the House of Commons will take up this challenge, and I believe firmly—that the people will not consent that this House—to use the words of Mr. Disraeli—

"should lose its hold over the Executive of the country, or that the Administration should be carried on by a Court Minister or a Court minion."

["Hear, hear!"] Hon. Gentlemen opposite evidently cheer under the impression that the people of the country would consent to no alteration in the rights of the Prerogative. ["No, no!"] Well, I can tell hon. Gentlemen that this is not the first time that there has been a struggle in relation to the Royal Prerogative. Our forefathers had struggles in regard to the Royal Prerogative. ["Question!"] It is very close to the question. We are dealing, at the present moment, with the exercise of the Prerogative; and I say that our forefathers hated the very word, because they saw that the exercise of the Prerogative on many occasions had involved this country in serious difficulty. The result of the struggles in former days was the curtailment of the Prerogatives of the Crown; and I believe firmly that the result of the struggle we are now entering upon will be that there will be such a declaration on the part of the constituencies as will require that in future some restrictions should be placed on the right of the Crown to declare war. It is said that we have no right to complain in this matter. We are told that Parliament even now—although war has been declared under the Prerogative of the Crown—that Parliament has its remedy by passing a Vote of Censure upon the Government. We know perfectly well that that is futile—we know perfectly well that when war has been declared the House of Commons is powerless to deal with it, and the passing of a Vote of Censure on the Government would do little to alleviate or remove the injury which has been done. There has been a good deal said, in the course of this debate, as to the origin of the war; and no doubt the House of Commons, now that war has been commenced, are called upon to consider whether it is justified by facts laid before the House. I have carefully studied the voluminous documents laid on the Table; and I am bound to say that the conclusion I have come to is, that while Government have unnecessarily kept back information the House is entitled to receive, there has been an attempt, by means of Lord Cranbrook's despatch, to confuse the public mind as to the origin of the war; and that by disingenuous representations the Government seek to disguise the origin of the war, or to mislead the public as to why the war has been commenced. I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman the Member for Canterbury (Mr. A. Gathorne Hardy), who represented Lord Cranbrook in this House to-night, has left his seat: for I meant to tell him that certainly no one wishes to impute improper motives to Lord Cranbrook; we respect Lord Cranbrook, personally, most highly. But what we do say is, that this despatch to which his name is attached is, in our judgment, one which is not consistent with the actual facts of the case; we say that Lord Cranbrook has not fairly put the case before the public. Lord Salisbury, in "another place," has spoken of the "utter wretchedness" of this personal dispute between Lord Northbrook and other noble Lords connected with the Government of India. But it is by no means a mere personal matter—the question we have to deal with is this—Did or did not this despatch of Lord Cranbrook attempt to conceal an entire change of policy on the part of the Government, under cover of mis-statements which had the effect of throwing blame on the policy of the previous Government? On what ground can it be contended that the policy of Lord Northbrook and his Predecessors has had the effect of compelling the policy of the present Government? There can be no doubt that there has been a very decided change of policy. In 1877 the Chancellor of the Exchequer described in this House the two schools of policy in connection with the Government of India—

"The school which advocates what may be called a forward policy, and the opposite school, which is rather for keeping back, and not committing us to advancing beyond our Frontiers." —[3 Hansard, ccxxxvi. 718.]

And on that occasion the right hon. Gentleman said decidedly that he was of the latter school, and that he was opposed to our advancing beyond our Frontier. But at that very time the Government were reversing the policy of their Predecessors and were adopting the "forward school," which the right hon. Gentleman condemned. My complaint against Lord Cranbrook's despatch is, that it gives an entirely inadequate and a misleading account of the origin of the war. It appears to be an indictment against the Ameer of Afghanistan, prepared with all the ingenuity of an advocate, and with a very unscrupulous disregard of the actual circumstances of the case. I am not prepared to accept in any way the statement of the Government as put forward in the official documents as a justification of the war. The Chancellor of the Exchequer the other night resented the idea, thrown out by the noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition, that the Government had been picking a quarrel with the Ameer, and declared that if the Government had been attempting to pick a quarrel it would have been guilty of a great crime. I do not mean to say that they intended to force a quarrel; but we are entitled to say, if their measures were such as necessarily to create war, that whatever their intentions were, they actually provoked a quarrel. Every step they had taken for four months could only have one result, and that was to bring about a war with the Ameer of Afghanistan. I will not trouble the House by referring to the Blue Book, for I have no wish to trespass beyond the half-hour I have given myself. But I repeat that, step by step, the Government rendered war inevitable. Amongst other things, there has been an allusion made to the message which our Representative sent to the Ameer of Afghanistan, in which he threatens that if the Ameer did not come to our terms we would arrange with Russia, and wipe Afghanistan from the map. I think the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for India denied that there had been any arrangement whatever between the Russian Government and Lord Lytton. Do I understand that the hon. Gentleman is prepared to deny that Lord Lytton had any understanding with the Russian Ambassador before he left England for India? I can tell the Under Secretary that it is notorious that Lord Lytton had several interviews with Count Schouvaloff before leaving England; and what we are entitled to know is this—Had Lord Lytton any authority for saying, in the most explicit terms, that Russia was quite willing to join us in pulling to pieces the Ameer's territory, and that we by such an arrangement with Russia might be prepared to wipe Afghanistan out of existence? I think the Under Secretary ought to tell us which alternative he accepts. Did Lord Lytton make this statement without any foundation, and simply with the view of alarming the Ameer of Afghanistan, or did he base it on truth? If it were based on truth, then I think we should know what that basis of truth is. I am bound to say that I feel that the Government, in declaring this war upon such insufficient grounds, have incurred a very grave responsibility. I cannot imagine a more solemn position for the Government to be placed in. When a doubt existed in a case against a prisoner he was given the benefit of it; but in this matter, although the question was full of doubt, the Government did not hesitate for a moment, but launched our armies upon Afghanistan, causing not only the loss of many of our brave soldiers, but great loss of life and destruction of property in the country we are invading. Not only did a doubt exist in the case, but the Government could not justify the war. If we wish to find out what the objects and justification of the war are, and we look to the Proclamation of the Viceroy, or to the despatch of Lord Cranbrook, or to the speech of the Premier at the Mansion House, we find very distinct and separate explanations given of the objects which the war is intended to promote. I think, under these circumstances, we are entitled to say that the Government have entirely failed in laying before the House and the country sufficient reason for taking this precipitate step. ["Divide, divide!"] No doubt the hon. Gentleman who cries "Divide, divide!" calculates upon a large Parliamentary majority; and I have no doubt that he thinks that Parliamentary majorities, like charity, cover a multitude of sins. But Parliamentary majorities cannot free you from the requirements of justice, and cannot blot out the obligations of morality and religion. I believe this war, so commenced by the Government, is contrary to the obligations of morality and religion; I believe it is altogether repugnant to the Christian feeling of the country. We have been told that we ought to look upon this question with Asiatic, and not with European, eyes; but I prefer our standard to the standard of uncivilized and barbarous countries. Surely we are not going to ignore morality and Christianity in the policy of our Government—principles which have been laid aside and forgotten by the present Government. I am obliged to the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Whitbread) for affording me the opportunity of voting against this war; because I am convinced that however small our minority may be, yet in entering our protest against the war we shall be justified in the eyes of the country, and when history records present events, the calm judgment of posterity will condemn the reckless and hasty policy of the Government.

SIR JOHN HAY regretted that the hon. Member for the Elgin Burghs (Mr. Grant Duff) should have made an attack on the Marquess of Salisbury; but he hoped the hon. Gentleman would, on reflection, withdraw it. The charge was one of such a kind that it ought not to have been brought in an Assembly of Gentlemen against one whose conduct as a public servant, and as a former Member of that House, should have spared him from such an attack. Since the hon. Member for Elgin had made his speech, he had referred to the report, given in extenso in Hansard, of the Question put in June, 1877, by the Duke of Argyll, and the answer made to it by the Marquess of Salisbury, then Secretary of State for India, with regard to our relations with Afghanistan. In that House their rules required Questions to be put categorically, and as categorically answered by Members; but the practice in the other House was different; and unless hon. Gentlemen consulted Hansard, they might be under the impression that a distinct Question had been asked in "another place," and that an evasive answer had been given to it. That, indeed, was the charge made by the hon. Member for Elgin. The fact, however, was that the so-called Question occupied five columns of Hansard, and the reply to it three columns. In the course of his remarks the Marquess of Salisbury spoke as follows:—

"The noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) alluded to the fact that the Ameer of Afghanistan does not allow a British Envoy to reside at his Court. The noble Duke evidently regards this refusal as an act of semi-barbarism, and said that the Ameer of Cabul was the only Potentate with whom we had relations over the globe who would not receive our Envoy. I am not prepared to dispute the liberty of action belonging to the Ameer; but the result is, that we are obliged to communicate with him in a more formal and open method than would be otherwise necessary, and that suggestions, explanations, and requests which, if we had ordinary diplomatic relations with the Ameer would be sent through a British officer residing at his Court, have, as matters stand, to be sent through some other diplomatic channel."—

The Marquess of Salisbury then epitomized the series of Questions, four in number, which had been put to him, and answered them all categorically, accompanied by the explanation that, for reasons of State policy, a more complete and positive answer could not then be furnished. The noble Marquess continued—

"With respect to the information asked for by the noble Duke, I can hardly give him much positive knowledge; but I think I can give him some negative information. He has derived from the sources open to him the following statement, as I understood him—that we had tried to force an Envoy upon the Ameer at Cabul—that we had selected for that purpose Sir Lewis Pelly, whose vigour of mind and action might possibly inspire apprehension in the Councils of a Native Prince—that we had supported this demand by a large assemblage of troops on the North-Western Frontier, and that we were preparing boats upon the Indus. Now, we have not tried to force an Envoy upon the Ameer at Cabul—we have not suggested Sir Lewis Pelly as an Envoy to Cabul—the troops were assembled on the North-Western Frontier without the slightest reference to any such demand; and with regard to the boats on the Indus, I never heard of them until to-day. Our relations with the Ameer of Cabul have undergone no material change since last year. I do not believe that he is worse disposed towards us than hitherto, or that his feelings are in any way more embittered towards the British Government."—[Ibid.]

All who remembered the Marquess of Salisbury's bearing as a Minister while in that House would admit that his answers to Questions were uniformly as clear, distinct, and accurate as any statements which could possibly be conceived; and he was sure that the noble Marquess' vindication of his own character "elsewhere" had been quite sufficient in the eyes of the country to put a stop to these charges on his personal honour. Passing from that subject, he had heard with great interest and satisfaction the statement made by many hon. Gentlemen opposite, who had formerly held office, that they would be prepared, if now in power, in these circumstances, not to go to war with the Ameer of Afghanistan, but to declare war against Russia. In 1873, however, when hon. Gentlemen opposite had an opportunity of arresting the advance of Russia, they were afraid to make known to the Russian Government what Lord Northbrook, their own Governor-General of India, wished to be communicated to that Power. In the Central Asia Papers, page 206, No. 12, appeared the following letter from the Foreign Office, dated August 25th, 1873, and addressed by Mr. Hammond to Sir John Kaye:—

"I am to request that you will state to the Duke of Argyll that Lord Granville would not think it desirable to communicate to the Russian Government, as suggested by the Indian Government, a copy of the former despatch, and so convey to it indirectly an intimation that any aggression by it on Afghanistan would be resisted by Great Britain with force of arms."

Hon. Gentlemen opposite thought it right now, when a different feeling existed in the country as to Russia, to swim with the tide, and to suggest that they were bold enough to make an attack on Russia, if necessary, for the interests of our Indian Empire. If the communication which Lord Northbrook recommended Lord Granville to make to Russia had been made, it would have given notice to Russia to withdraw Generals Kaufmann and Tchernayeff, who were working upon the Tartar tribes north of the Oxus, and the present complications would not have arisen. It had been said, on what he thought questionable information, that the action of the Ameer was not of a kind to justify a declaration of war. If any hon. Member would take the trouble to consult Vattel's Law of Nations he would find that the Ameer had, in resisting the Mission of Sir Neville Chamberlain, committed an act which, between thoroughly civilized States, was understood to necessarily involve a declaration of war. Vattel thus laid down the law on the point—

“Every sovereign State, then, has a right to send and receive public Ministers; for they are the necessary instruments in the management of those affairs which Sovereigns have to transact with each other, and the channels of that correspondence which they have a right to carry on. . . . Such being the rights of nations, a Sovereign who attempts to hinder another from sending or receiving public Ministers does him an injury, and offends against the Law of Nations. It is attacking a nation in one of her most valuable rights, and disputing her title to that which Nature herself gives to every independent society; it is offering an insult to nations in general, and tearing asunder the ties by which they are united. . . . . A Sovereign cannot, without very particular reasons, refuse admitting and hearing the Minister of a friendly Power, or of one with whom he is at peace. But in case there be reasons for not admitting him into the heart of the country, he may notify to him that he will send proper persons to meet him at an appointed place on the Frontier, there to hear his proposals. It then becomes the foreign Minister's duty to stop at the place assigned. It is sufficient that he obtains a hearing, that being the utmost he has a right to expect.”

It was clear that if the Ameer of Afghanistan claimed to be a civilized Power and not a protected State, he had clearly infringed the law which he had quoted, and had justified the war against him; for he had opposed Sir Neville Chamberlain's Embassy at Ali Musjid, a fort, not in Afghan territory, but in Afridi territory, and if under the protection of any one, under ours. He supposed, however, we were not justified on that ground alone; but on the bold ground that Russia, having undertaken not to cross the Oxus or to interfere with Afghanistan, had sent a Mission to Cabul, and stimulated Afghanistan and its tribes to break off friendly relations with our Indian Government. He looked upon our necessity for entering Afghanistan with no fear; for he thought it would be advantageous that the time should come when the Sepoy and the Cossack should act as outposts on the Oxus, and when two civilized Powers could be placed in communication with each other without the intervention of savage tribes whom neither could control. He should give his cordial support to Her Majesty's Government.

MR. GOSCHEN: I think that in this discussion Her Majesty's Government, and those who have been the champions of the course which they have pursued, have almost forgotten two important facts—the one, that they have been five years in Office; and the other, that the Military Expedition to Afghanistan is, after all, but an episode in the great drama of Berlin. I state, that hon. Members opposite have forgotten the former circumstance, because they seem on no occasion to be able to meet the arguments of the Opposition, except by a tu quoque. Even the right hon. and gallant Member who has just sat down (Sir John Hay) had no better answer to give to the argument, that if war was necessary at all just now it should have been undertaken against Russia instead of Afghanistan, than by referring to an incident which occurred in 1873. The Opposition have been charged, both in and out of the House, with having been mainly occupied in examining into the mind and feelings of the Ameer, instead of discussing the policy of the future, and the great questions which are at present before the House. I myself do not propose to continue the psychological analysis of the motives which actuated that Oriental Potentate; but it must be remembered that the Opposition did not start that discussion—they consider that they are bound to deal with the present—but they were informed suddenly one morning that, although right hon. Gentlemen opposite had been five years in Office, the irritation of the Ameer of five years ago had prevented their carrying out the policy of their hearts, and had embarked them on a war with Afghanistan. Is it not a preposterous case to set up, that a Government with a large majority, containing strong men who manage to have their own way, even against their own supporters, and possessing distinct principles, should, after five years in office, have been baffled entirely by the irritation produced five years ago upon the mind of the Ameer? All this is entirely beside the mark—the complications had been produced by the events of the last year; and therefore we need not look so far back as the year 1873 to be able to find the precise and definite causes which have produced those results. I maintain that Her Majesty's Government, with all the advantages derived from their public officers, and with all the documentary evidence which they themselves have supplied, have not been successful in proving the case they thus got up; and I maintain that the Cabinet had not proved that at the time when the Government acceded to Office the mind of the Ameer was in the state which they allege. But, with the permission of the House, I will remove the sphere of the discussion from Cabul to St. Petersburg and Central Asia. The Afghan Blue Book is a most interesting document; but the documents relating to Central Asia are more interesting still. Hon. Members opposite will admit that fact; and if Parliament has been summoned on this occasion to consider large questions — questions which we are told vitally affect the future interests of the country—it is not because we have to deal only with Afghanistan, but because our relations with a great Power are really in debate. I do not propose for a moment to shun the difficulties of that position; but I think that hon. Gentlemen opposite will find, when they have carefully studied these Central Asia Papers, that the study will not afford them satisfaction as to the course which has been pursued by Her Majesty's Government. The Military Expedition to Afghanistan is the direct result of the turn which the Eastern Question has taken. In fact, if I may use the simile, they were more concerned to discuss the history of the iron pots than of the pipkin which was to be crushed. Let me at once indicate one or two salient points. In April, 1878, the Indian troops were brought to Malta; in May an Emissary went from Tashkend to the Ameer at Bokhara, and the first steps were taken in regard to the Russian Embassy. Those were significant dates. Then came the further tension between England and Russia, and the starting of the Embassy for Cabul. If dates are matter of curiosity, I think it will be found that those I have referred to form a remarkable coincidence; for in the same week in July, when the Prime Minister and Lord Salisbury entered London in triumph, and proclaimed "Peace with honour" from the windows of Whitehall, the Russian Envoy was entering Cabul in triumph, with salvoes of artillery, not carrying peace and honour, but the embers of a war, and that not against Russia, but with Afghanistan. That was as distinct a breach of an honourable engagement as, I believe, was ever committed on the part of one great nation towards another. ["Question!"] We have been summoned to discuss these matters in a serious light, and asked not to confine ourselves simply to the consideration of points in the mind of the Ameer of Afghanistan; and I trust that hon. Members opposite will not prevent me from discharging my duty, in discussing the entry into Cabul of the Russian Envoy — a circumstance which every Englishman must deplore, and which is deplored as much on this side of the House as on the other. I wish to make my point good by showing the connection that exists between the Eastern Question and the Afghan troubles. Following the example of an hon. Member who addressed the House a few moments ago — and who seemed to assume that the greatest possible importance ought to be attached to everything that issues from the Russian Press—I will quote an extract from a Russian newspaper, which is contained in the Blue Book, and was sent over from St. Petersburg to the Government, as an illustration of the state of public opinion there—

"The concentration of our influence on the Frontiers of the territory of the Empress of India would be only a natural answer to the English seizure of Cyprus"—the seizure of Cyprus—"and all the approaches to Asia. Such may be the unobtrusive, even peaceable, object of the military operations undertaken by the troops of the Turkestan military circuit." (It would be something like the Cyprus business.) "As our correspondent at Berlin truly remarked the other day—'In Asia there are two political Powers confronting each other, and they must inevitably come into collision.' England wishes to be Russia's nearest neighbour in Asia Minor, and it is only natural, therefore, that Russia, in her turn, should desire to approach somewhat nearer to the English Frontiers in India."—[Central Asia, No. 1 (1878), p. 141.]

Well, we have acquired Cyprus, and

[Third Night.]

Russia might think it would be advantageous to her to acquire Bokhara and advance her territories to the Oxus. Possibly in that interview between Lord Lytton and the Russian Ambassador, before the former went to India, the mode of acquiring territory in this manner was made the subject of discussion between those distinguished statesmen. But in any case, this extract shows the connection existing in Russian minds between the Eastern and the Afghan Questions. The present Government acceded to Office in 1874; Khiva had been partly acquired by Russia at that time; and early in that year, as was pointed out by the right hon. and gallant Member (Sir John Hay), certain communications were made by the Indian Government to the India Office at home; and it had been made the subject of complaint that Lord Granville did not think it necessary to advise Russia of the attitude taken up towards that country by the Indian Government. The point is this—it is alleged that while the Opposition now said that the Government ought to deal with Russia, Lord Granville had preferred not to communicate to Russia the feeling entertained by the Indian Government at the period referred to. But we reply that the reason for this is perfectly plain—as would have appeared had the despatch of Lord Granville been published, instead of being only alluded to in a note—because at that moment an arrangement had been come to with Russia with regard to Afghanistan. This arrangement, made in the latter part of the year 1873, established the relations between Russia and Afghanistan on what was considered at that time, and what for some little time afterwards seemed, to be a satisfactory basis, and a basis which the present Government endeavoured to continue. About this same time the marriage was solemnized between the Duke of Edinburgh and a Russian Princess, and a thoroughly friendly feeling seemed to prevail. That was at the beginning of 1874; and Prince Gortchakoff, in an interview at that time with our Ambassador, took occasion to state that “Russia considered Afghanistan as beyond the sphere of her action, and that they would strictly adhere to this policy,” and the same declaration was made almost immediately afterwards by the Emperor himself to Lord Augustus

Loftus. Lord Augustus Loftus remarked to His Highness Prince Gortchakoff that

“Her Majesty's Government had no doubts of the pacific desires of the Imperial Government, but that, unfortunately, those desires had been frequently counteracted by the military commanders, who acted on their own responsibility in contravention of the instructions of the Central Civil Government.”

His Highness immediately replied with great decision that—

“Although there was a party anxious for military activity and decorations, he felt that his influence was sufficiently strong to counteract such endeavours, and so long as he held power these efforts would be restrained.”—[Ibid. p. 7.]

That was the position of affairs in 1874, when the Government acceded to Office. But there was at that time a little symptom of a significant character, in the shape of a scientific expedition, which was going towards the Attrek. Before very long this became a scientific and military expedition, and attention was drawn to that portion of Central Asia situated on the Attrek. Notwithstanding these orders had been issued to the distant military commanders, a new General proceeded to issue a Proclamation, in which it was assumed that he claimed authority over a large number of tribes who were not under the Russian power. This will be found in page 19 of the Blue Book, where attention is drawn to the phrase contained in a letter of General Llamakin, stating that—“Prince Michael has appointed me to be the supreme authority on the Attrek.” I will not say that this led to a lively exchange of opinions between the Russian and the English Governments, because nothing is lively so far as St. Petersburg is concerned. Indeed, in reading over these Central Asia Papers I find the phrase “frank and friendly” is repeated throughout this volume in such innumerable instances, that I have been obliged to give up the endeavour to count them. But while the Foreign Office was constantly communicating with the Russian Government on friendly terms, despatches in a totally different spirit were issuing from the India Office, and being sent out to India; and this tendency becomes distinctly more marked when we reach the year 1875. I now proceed to that year, and beg the House to remember that in the beginning of that year the first great opening of the new policy was inaugurated by Lord

Mr. Goschen

Salisbury. Lord Salisbury wrote to Lord Northbrook, and, as has been confessed, and claimed by right hon. Gentlemen opposite and by their friends, in view of the Russian advance in Central Asia, a new departure was to be taken. I now come to a very remarkable despatch, with which I ask to be allowed to trouble the House. It is on page 24, where Lord Derby writes to Lord Loftus, as follows:—

“The Russian Ambassador called upon me on the 12th instant, being on the point of leaving England for a month, and expressed his wish to ascertain more clearly than he had as yet done the views of Her Majesty's Government on the Central Asian question.”

This question had been settled only the year before, but Count Schouvaloff appeared to think there was a change of policy, and he wished to ascertain more clearly the views of Her Majesty's Government. He had noticed a certain reluctance to discuss that question, and considering it of extreme importance to the mutual good relationship of the two countries, he was anxious that there should be a frank understanding. “I told him,” wrote Lord Derby, “that I had of late abstained from conversation on the subject because nothing new had occurred.” I think that new things were occurring in Asia, but in 1875 Lord Derby knows nothing about them. He says he

“abstained from conversation on the subject, partly because nothing new had occurred, or was occurring, in that quarter to which it seemed necessary to direct the attention of his Government, partly because I was reluctant to seem to indicate distrust or apprehension as to the course which the Russian Government might think fit to pursue, by unnecessarily requesting explanations as to their proceedings.”—[Ibid. p. 24.]

Count Schouvaloff proceeded to explain his views, of which it is sufficient to say that they were unfavourable to annexation; and he asked Lord Derby whether he was right in supposing that there was no intention, on the part of England, to advance further in the direction of the Russian Possessions, unless such advance were considered necessary for defensive purposes? Lord Derby replied that

“This view was undoubtedly correct, and that, so far from desiring to annex any part of Afghanistan, we should deprecate such a result as bringing only increased cost and trouble without advantage.”—[Ibid.]

Now, why did Count Schouvaloff go to Lord Derby and assure him that he was personally opposed to annexation? But the Russian Government were exceedingly anxious; and evidently there was something brewing, because only a month afterwards Prince Gortchakoff sends Count Schouvaloff an historical notice of the whole of the transactions which had taken place with regard to England and Afghanistan. In that despatch there is a very important point to which I especially call the notice of the House, and though it is rather an intricate one, I hope Her Majesty's Government will follow me. It appears to me that the despatch of Russia endeavours to shift from the position settled under the previous arrangement, that if there was any neutral territory at all it was beyond Afghanistan. The present despatch of the Russian Government speaks, as it were, of Afghanistan itself as the independent zone, and that they might approach its borders on one side, while we approached them on the other. The inference is clear—that if we advanced on the one side they would be entitled to advance on the other, and that acquires great importance at the present day; because if that was in the Russian mind at that time, a similar line of argument might be held now—namely, that if we trenched on Afghanistan, she would be set free in a different direction. I think this is a matter which assumes considerable importance when we look at the action which we are taking at present in invading Afghanistan. There were two further Conferences which took place between the Russian and the English authorities, and they were practically to this effect—that Russia expressed a desire to put the question, why should not the boundaries of England and Russia in Central Asia meet and touch? Russia said—“As we are on good terms with Austria and Germany, why can we not join with England and live on friendly terms with her in Central Asia.” The meaning of these despatches was that England should annex Afghanistan, and that Russia should annex Bokhara and the rest of the Khanates; that we should join; and, in effect, that Lord Lytton's simile of the iron pots should be carried out—the pipkin should be crushed between two great Powers. It seems to me a most remarkable coincidence that, in 1875, Russia should have voluntarily sounded Great Britain as to why our boundaries should not meet, and then that, in 1876, Lord Lytton should go out after that interview with the Russian Ambassador, and that one of the first things committed to writing on the Indian side should be the suggestion that such a plan might, in certain eventualities, take place—namely, that there should be a ring of iron drawn round Afghanistan, and that Afghanistan should vanish. We see the threats of Lord Lytton assuming a more definite character than if they were but a kind of imagination on his part, to which no further importance should be attached. It appears to me, from a careful study of the Papers, that the policy of Russia is to be able to continue its annexations, England annexing at the same time in proportion. And I am not sure but that we must charge Her Majesty's Government with committing, at this present moment, an act which is, in some degree, intended to be directed against Russia, but which may be carrying out the very policy which Russia is anxious we should pursue, and that she is laughing in her sleeve at having outwitted the astute diplomatists of England, and that nothing is more desired than that we should endeavour to annex Afghanistan. I do not know how far such a view would be accepted by the Government. But I am bound to say that these sounding interviews were not wholly confined to suggestions. There was something more. Three or four months afterwards Khokand was annexed. Count Schouvaloff had called to say that he was personally averse to annexation; and a few months afterwards Russia finds herself under the deplorable necessity of annexing Khokand. But what motive had the Russians for proclaiming that they were obliged to annex it? Will it be believed that the reason alleged for its annexation was that "some individuals had been raising a religious war?" The parallel between their conduct, in the face of a Jihad, and our own went a little further. Later on General Kaufmann reports to his Government that at last there is an entire rupture with Khokand. He says—"The situation is cleared up"—that is to say, that they were free from "entangling alliances"—the very words Lord Lytton used when the negotiations with Shere Ali were broken off. It is clear that Lord Lytton had studied in the school of the Russian General; and the same operations under which the Russians have been annexing in Tashkend are now being applied by Lord Lytton in Afghanistan. During the rest of the year 1875 Her Majesty's Government, whether alarmed by the further progress of Russia or not, were still holding comparatively mild language in St. Petersburg; but early in 1876 a despatch was written, and they sent out fresh instructions by Lord Lytton on Lord Northbrook being recalled. ["No!"] No, he was not recalled; but it would only have been natural if such had been the case, considering the unfavourable view taken of his character and policy. The Under Secretary of State for India said, with a certain amount of animation, that Lord Northbrook had disobeyed his instructions. It struck me as a remarkable statement to make with regard to the noble Lord, who had rendered such good services in India, and who, as was well stated by my hon. Friend the Member for the Elgin Burghs (Mr. Grant Duff), was rewarded with an Earldom by Her Majesty. Lord Lytton succeeded Lord Northbrook, and went out with the celebrated despatch in his pocket. There was to be a new régime, and matters had assumed so important an aspect in the eyes of Her Majesty's Government that an entirely new policy was to be opened, and the Ameer was to be coerced into an offensive and defensive alliance. Still, the same course of negotiations was going on between England and Russia at St. Petersburg in, to my mind, a most unsatisfactory manner, though the statements are continually made that everything was open and above-board on both sides. This culminated in 1876, when Lord Beaconsfield stated, much to the delight of the Russian public, that

[Third Night.]

At the same time, the Ameer was to be threatened, and that in consequence of the aggressions of Russia in Central Asia. It is impossible to reconcile these two policies, which appear to have been going on at the same time, of which a still more conspicuous instance is to be found later on. The House will remember the speech of the Prime Minister in May. Then the Ameer was to be coerced, and the Under Secretary, who spoke second this evening, stated that there was no intention that these views, which had been stated in such graphic language—these menaces, as he preferred to call them—should be communicated to the Ameer. It seems rather curious that Lord Lytton should make such a very elaborate statement to his own confidential Agent; but it was said to be like a man instructing his own counsel. I am not aware that it is usual to put down such instructions in writing, and then communicate them to Parliament in a Blue Book—indeed, anyone will see that it was intended to convey these threats to the Ameer. During this time the letters from General Kaufmann were increasing in frequency, and it is perfectly incorrect to say that the Ameer no longer communicated these matters to the English Government. That is not so. They were given to the English Government as late as 1876, and, what is more, they are all comprehended in the Blue Book. It seems strange that it should be argued that these matters were not communicated, while the very letters appear in the Blue Book.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: It is perfectly true that the letters appear in the Blue Book; but they were forwarded by the Cabul Agent. After 1874, the Ameer never once asked the British Government what answers he was to send to General Kaufmann. That is the point.

MR. GOSCHEN: Whether they were forwarded by the Ameer, or whether they were not, the Cabul Agent could only get them from the Ameer; and I fail to see the distinction. But it is stated here in the Blue Book that—

“The paper that came from the Russian Officers was opened, and the wax and seal removed in the presence of this very Agent of the British Government, who is now present here, and who was summoned for the purpose.”—[Afghanistan, No. 2, pp. 12-13.]

These letters from General Kaufmann were communicated seriatim to the English Government, and excited some natural apprehension; because Lord Lytton says in these Papers that now the time has come when these matters are to be taken into serious consideration. And here he would like to call attention to another point. We have had very elaborate arguments as to what was the intention of Her Majesty's Government in forcing Agents upon the Ameer. What was the chief motive? what was the natural motive? Was it not in order to get information? It was desired that English travellers should be allowed to move about in Afghanistan. I think hon. Members opposite will remember that one of the grievances alleged against the Ameer was that he would not allow Englishmen to travel in his dominions. Now, that was an unfriendly regulation; but will it be believed that at the same time when Englishmen were not allowed to travel in Afghanistan they were also, notwithstanding the statements of the Prime Minister as to the friendly relations of the two Governments, not allowed to travel in the Dominions of the Russian Czar; and that when we were forcing an Agent on the Ameer, we were recalling an English traveller who was in Khiva, and who might have supplied most valuable information? I am sure there is not an hon. Member in this House who does not remember the circumstance. The fact is, that in this case, as in so many others, we bullied at Cabul, but we flinched at St. Petersburg; and at the demand or wish of the Russian Government we recalled Captain Burnaby. [An hon. MEMBER: By the Commander-in-Chief.] Was he recalled by the Commander-in-Chief? Then who set the Commander-in-Chief in motion? Ask the noble Lord who questioned the Government in this House. I should like to know how many hon. Members opposite do not think that Her Majesty's Government made a considerable mistake in this affair by yielding to the Russian Government. Captain Burnaby has returned, and has been led about the Black Country by the Chancellor of the Exchequer as a fit representative of the pugnacious policy of Her Majesty's Government; while in his own person he has experienced the effect of what I must call as pusillanimous an act on the part of a great Power as has ever been committed. This is a fitting illustration of the whole of these negotiations, and it is in harmony with the position in which we find ourselves at present—

[Third Night.]

namely, the position of making war upon Afghanistan because Russia has pushed too near the Oxus. But I am warned by the hour that I must be brief, and that, although I should have wished it, I must forego the task of following these proceedings through the year 1877. But I will only quote this interesting fact—that the Turkoman expeditions again commenced in 1877; during the war they were stopped; but in 1878, as soon as the war was over, again these restless movements of troops on the Attrek re-commenced; and we shall be very glad to know what General Llamakin is doing at the present moment. I will only make one more observation, and that is to express my astonishment that the Russian Government, in the person of Prince Gortchakoff himself, should be able to send such a despatch, as I find it is stated he has sent, denying categorically that General Kaufmann is acting at Cabul by means of Agents or any other means, when, as a matter of fact, these extremely important letters had passed. It seems to me that nothing can be more striking than the answer of General Kaufmann, when he informed the Russian Government that he was rather surprised at the question put to him, considering that copies of these letters were deposited in their Asiatic Bureau. Why do I make these remarks, but to show that opposition to Russian encroachment and Russian trickery is not a duty to be monopolized by hon. or right hon. Gentlemen opposite, but that it is a duty in which we are all concerned; and I am sure that both sides of the House will be anxious that, while we are debating on the state of the Ameer's mind, we should not lose sight of this far more important question. The Postmaster General has been rebuked by an hon. Member on his own side for having drawn such a fine distinction between method and policy. But while I and those around me differ from the method pursued at this moment by Her Majesty's Government, as an unjust as well as necessary method, I know I am speaking the sentiments of every one in this House when I say that, on one point of policy, we are all unanimous in desiring to maintain intact our Possessions in India. I do not forget that it has been said that these debates may do damage by forcing discussion which may weaken the hands of Her Majesty's Government.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER wished it to be understood that the Government did not object to these debates.

MR. GOSCHEN: I am aware that you do not object to them; but it has been said that the attitude of bringing on a continuous debate at the time when Eastern matters are in their present position is unpatriotic. I am prepared to say that this debate will strengthen the Government when it is seen that with regard to Russia it is not a question of pro-Russian or anti-Russian, but a question as to the means of getting out of a difficulty created by themselves. But I must make this good—that the natural result of the Eastern policy of Her Majesty's Government was to bring the Russians to Cabul. I have alluded already to the fact that immediately you brought the Indian troops from India to threaten Europe the Russians began to threaten; but still more important are the questions of Cyprus and Asia Minor; and it was at the same time when you were negotiating the secret Treaty with Count Schouvaloff that orders were sent for this Embassy to Cabul. It is because the Government pursued a policy which was certain to lead to this kind of retaliation—departing from the old ways of English diplomacy—that these negotiations are no longer carried on in the light of day, as formerly they were, and the consequence is that these surprises are sprung upon Her Majesty's Government. We have to thank Her Majesty's Government that, while they were negotiating at Berlin, the Russians stole a march upon us and peacefully invaded Afghanistan. You ask us what is our policy? I have seen it stated that those who support this Motion are those by whom India is considered a burden. Sir, I think this is a statement that ought never to have been made; and it ought not to go forth, in language proceeding from a responsible person, that there is a Party in this House who consider India as a burden. The right hon. Gentleman does not think that if to-morrow, by some extraordinary result, we should assume Office, we should consider India as a burden. I believe that there are not five men on that side of the House who would endorse that view; but it has been stated by Lord Salisbury, in winding up a debate on this important subject in the House of Lords, and I cannot find words sufficient to express my indignation at such a charge having been made.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER wished to observe that reference to language used in debate in "another place" was irregular.

MR. GOSCHEN: I confess that it is irregular, and apologize for referring thereto. In this House we are continually treated with the courtesy which the right hon. Gentleman who led it so well knew how to show, and these reckless accusations against a great Party are less often heard here than "elsewhere." At the same time, we feel desirous of repudiating them on behalf of all who sit on this side of the House. At all events, we do not propose to be so shabby as to expect India to pay for the burdens to be imposed by this war. It might be supposed that if we thought India a burden we should be the first to reject such sacrifices as may be necessary to bear in its relief; but I have seen no symptoms of objection. It ill becomes those who have, at all events in the first instance, given the country and Europe to understand that they are not going to bear the first cost of their Imperial acts, to say that we consider that India is a burden. I cannot sit down without alluding to the most eloquent and convincing speech of my hon. Friend the Member for the Elgin Burghs (Mr. Grant Duff), which brought out the question and the important problem to which we have had no answer whatever — namely, what are the advantages to be gained by the present war? The Under Secretary, who followed him, was silent as to this. Her Majesty's Government refuse to tell us their policy; we are to approve the war, but we are not to be told what the result of that war is to be. With regard to the scientific Frontier, there is no single point which has so far outraged the sense of justice of hon. Members on this side of the House as the idea that the war was waged against the Ameer for one purpose while its object is for another. This is a matter to which I hope those who continue this debate will address themselves; and I trust they will enforce and strengthen the arguments of my hon. Friend, showing that we cannot see how this scientific Frontier will effect all that is desired. Besides this, I should especially like to know whether this is the whole that Her Majesty's Government propose to do with regard to this great question which we are summoned to discuss with so much solemnity. Is it to be the answer to the Russian advance that we are to have a scientific Frontier; and, if so, are we going to give up the remainder of Afghanistan? We want to know how, after a successful war, you intend to stop the Russians? Do you intend to take any further steps? It should not be forgotten that the Government entered into a very extraordinary resolution with regard to the Frontiers of Asia Minor, when they said that if the Russians should pass those Frontiers they would defend Turkey with arms. They might have contented themselves with a similar policy in Afghanistan. But when it comes to Afghanistan they make war upon the Ameer, after having pledged the country to an enormous liability in Asia Minor, which appears to be so much further from India than Herat and Merv. There is no consistency in the policy of the Government. They are prepared to go to any length with regard to the Balkans, and yet to put up with the most evasive Russian reply with regard to the Mission to Cabul. You see that you have accepted as satisfactory the declaration that in consequence of the disturbed state of political affairs this Mission was sent; you would not have accepted the explanation that it was a mere Mission of courtesy; but you are prepared to accept that it was done under exceptional circumstances. This is not, to my mind, a sufficient explanation or apology. You may move up troops to the Frontiers of another Power without committing an act of hostility or a breach of engagement. But to break a promise under exceptional circumstances is no excuse. And it seems to me that there was on the part of Russia a distinct breach of understanding; and therefore I consider that Russia has not given a satisfactory answer with regard to her Mission to Cabul. I trust that we shall hear more from Her Majesty's Government on this subject. I have felt painfully — what I am sure many hon. Members have also felt — that this subject is so large and complicated as to render it almost impossible to do justice to it within the limits of debate. But I trust that in the imperfect observations I have made several points are clear. I hope it will be understood that we are unanimous in our desire that this war, whatever may be the circumstances under which it is undertaken, will be brought to a safe and honourable conclusion. We are unanimous in sympathizing with the troops which are engaged. We trust that the war will be conducted with vigour, which, as the noble Lord (the Marquess of Hartington) had stated, was the most merciful way of conducting it. We are also unanimous on another point—namely, that of satisfaction at the loyal behaviour of the Princes of India, and the loyal attitude of all our subjects in those regions. If any of them had been present during this debate they would have seen that if we differed as to the justice and necessity of this war we did not differ as to the desire that our Indian Empire should remain intact, and that the beneficial results of English government are to be preserved to their millions of population. I trust also they would have seen that in many parts of the House there was an intense feeling that the Princes and Natives of India ought to be treated with justice, and that much of the opposition which has been shown on this occasion is due to the feeling that this is an unjust war. But, whether just or unjust, let credit be done to the feeling that we English think perfect justice should always prevail. I think we are also unanimous on the point that in Afghanistan there is no room for Russia and England together. But we, on our side, have contended that the Government have not gone the right way to work to bring about the result which both desire. We charge you with having brought the Russian Agent to Cabul; but we are unanimous in the desire that this Mission should be withdrawn, and that English influence should be supreme, as it must be, in Afghanistan. We differ as to the means by which this is to be secured, and think that an immense responsibility rests upon those who brought on the war; but I trust it may be known, both in India and in Russia, that Afghanistan must not be allowed to fall under Russian influence.

MAJOR NOLAN said, as there were many hon. Members most anxious to address the House, and as his hon.

and learned Friend the Member for Limerick (Mr. O'Shaughnessy) had fully dealt with that aspect of the subject, he should not go into the complicated and entangled question of the justice of the war with Afghanistan. He should simply deal with the expediency of our action on the North-West Frontier, which he thought might be divided into two branches; and before he spoke of the expediency of the war itself, he was inclined to separate from it the question of the advance upon Quetta. He looked upon this latter as a good movement on the part of the Government, because it was made without the risk of war. He thought all the writers on the subject of the advance of Russia on our territory agreed that if she attacked us she must come by way of Persia or the South Caspian. If she advanced from Persia, as the Prime Minister said she might, or by the South Caspian, as was his own opinion, she must probably pass by Quetta, and certainly by Herat, which could be menaced from Quetta. He therefore in no way blamed the Government for the advance on Quetta, over which place the Ameer had very small, if any, rights or control, while the object in view was of the very greatest importance. But he regarded the war with Afghanistan in a different light, and could not approve its object. He did not think we should go to war because the Envoys were not received by the Ameer. It was not Envoys that the Ameer objected to, but British Residents. But the public view at present was, that our object was a scientific Frontier; and it had been proclaimed by hon. Gentlemen on that side of the House, that we would never have demanded a scientific Frontier if our Envoys had been received by the Ameer, but as soon as we saw that he would not admit our officers, we wished to rectify our Frontiers. It would have been a very good thing to know what that change of Frontier meant. There was one, and only one, natural Frontier, and anyone who looked on the map would see that it was the Hindoo Kush, which was 150 or 200 miles from our territory; but to obtain that we should have to annex a country very much larger than England. The rectification of our Frontier by the occupation of the other Passes would no doubt improve it as against Afghanistan, because we should then completely command Cabul; and if we advanced a little beyond Quetta we should completely command Candahar. There would then be nothing left to the Ameer but to become our slave, or to shift his dominion and go to Balkh, where he would then be completely under Russian control. The greatest writers on the subject said that all wars in a mountainous country were long and tedious, as much from the character of the inhabitants as from the features of the district. A war with Afghanistan was very different from a war against a people living in the plains. If we attempted to take a portion of Afghanistan by occupying the Passes at the head of the Khyber, and the Pass a little in advance of it, we should be engaging in a very long and expensive war. As there had never been a war of this kind in which breech-loaders had been in the hands of both the contending parties, no one knew whether improved weapons would, on the whole, benefit the civilized and regular, or the half-civilized and irregular combatant. He thought it possible that the Afghans might find that they could purchase breech-loaders of the Russians if the war lasted two or three years. Hon. Members seemed to think that if they had the Passes of Afghanistan we should be quite safe; but this was entirely fallacious. We should never be able to keep out an army by holding the Passes; although he admitted that holding the Passes would give us time to concentrate for a pitched battle. The time selected for this war was not a favourable one, and it could hardly be said that it had been forced upon us by the Ameer. We should have waited for a year or two. Afghanistan was not our main object; we ought to consider the political state of India, Persia, Afghanistan, and Turkey. It was of enormous importance to us that Russia should execute the Berlin Treaty, and to watch this was our main object at the present moment. As far as we could judge from the Papers, she was moving away some troops and bringing a larger number back again. She was raising Balkan levies, which would every day of the Russian occupation become more efficient and formidable. Russia, at the present time, was not on a peace footing; and it appeared to him that our great object was the execution of the Berlin Treaty, and not the raising of fresh complications elsewhere. He (Major Nolan) had advised the Government, before the Russians crossed the Danube, not merely to be neutral, but to observe an armed neutrality, and he would not have been then adverse to war—when Turkey was strong, and when the Russians were in a bad position—but he did not think we could now force the execution of the Treaty of Berlin with a crushed Turkey for our only Ally, although we should have some chance of this had we a great Power for an Ally. Every country in Europe had its reasons for not wishing to have a conflict with Russia, and would make their various excuses for not insisting, by war, upon Russia's going out of European Turkey. It would now be said that this was a private quarrel, and must be fought out between England and Russia. He thought that by our present move in Afghanistan we had imperilled the Berlin Treaty, and furnished a pretext to Russia. He believed we might be involved in a very serious war.

NOTICE OF RESOLUTION.

TURKEY—THE RHODOPE DISTRICT—GRANT IN AID.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I beg to give Notice that it is my intention, on the earliest possible day, to make a Motion in this House for a grant in aid of the sufferers in the Rhodope district. I believe that the proper course to take would be to give Notice that I will on Monday next move that on the following day the House will resolve itself into Committee to consider the Resolution which I shall place on the Paper, if possible, to-night, or, if not, on Monday.

Afterwards—

MR. ANDERSON: As the extraordinary announcement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer has been received with silence by the front Opposition Bench, I beg to give Notice that, when the right hon. Gentleman brings forward that proposal I shall move the following Amendment:—

"That in the face of the wide-spread distress prevailing in our own country, and likely greatly to increase during this winter, it is not expedient to take the money of British taxpayers for relieving the distress in the Rhodope districts; and that such extraneous benevolence should be left to voluntary effort."

QUESTIONS.

THE LUNACY LAWS—LEGISLATION.
QUESTION.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If it is his intention to introduce this Session a measure for the reform of the Lunacy Laws?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, the Report of the Committee which had sat on this subject was at the present moment engaging the earnest attention of the Lord Chancellor; and as soon as the House re-assembled after the Christmas Recess the course it was intended to pursue would be stated, and probably legislation would follow.

41 &amp; 42 VICT. c. 49—WEIGHTS AND MEASURES ACT—LEGISLATION.

QUESTION.

MR. J. COWEN asked the President of the Board of Trade, If the Government propose to introduce an amending Act to mitigate the penalties permitted to be imposed by the Weights and Measures Act of last Session upon persons who, with no fraudulent intent, give publicity to market returns and price lists containing accounts of sales effected by local, customary, or heaped measures?

VISCOUNT SANDON: The matter is one which excites so much anxiety in many quarters, that I believe I had better inform the hon. Gentleman exactly what we have been advised respecting it. Section 23 of the Weights and Measures Act, 1878, is identical in every respect with section 31 of 5 & 6 Will. IV. c. 63. The offence is expressed in identically the same words. The penalties are the same, and are to be recovered in the same way—before two Justices. Section 32 of 5 & 6 Will. IV. c. 63, required some portion of the penalty, not exceeding a moiety, to be paid to the informer; whereas the present Act (section 57) (4) allows the Court a discretion as to whether they will or not assign any portion of the penalty to the informer. It is to be observed that, though the possible fine is a large one, it is a maximum only. It is not quite accurate to say that the penalties are imposed upon persons who give publicity to market returns and price-lists containing accounts of sales effected by local, customary, or heaped measures. What the section imposes a penalty for is, a person publishing a return in which the denomination of measure quoted implies a greater or less measure than that of the same denomination of imperial measure; that is to say, it prohibits a newspaper from quoting a return which may mislead by naming an imperial measure, when, in fact, it means a measure which is not imperial. This clearly ought to be prohibited, as it is misleading. The name of an imperial measure should, in any formal or public document, be used for that measure, and that only. The section does not prohibit a paper from quoting market returns of sales effected by local or customary measures, if it states those measures in terms which will not mislead. For instance, a newspaper publishing a quotation of a sale at Smithfield of meat at so much per 8 lb. would not be liable to any penalty under the section. Even if it quoted the sale, as is commonly done, at so much per stone of 8 lb., it is very doubtful, however undesirable such a mode of quotation may be, whether the paper would be liable to a penalty under the section, because the denomination quoted—namely, a stone of 8 lb., does not imply a less weight than is implied by the same denomination of imperial weight. After this explanation, I think the hon. Gentleman will agree that there is no need for us to introduce an amending Act.

THE "PRINCESS ALICE" CALAMITY. QUESTION.

CAPTAIN PIM asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether, in consequence of the national importance of the "Princess Alice" calamity, the length of time necessarily occupied by the Coroner and Jury on the inquest (from the 4th of September to the 27th of November), and the trying character of their duties, he will recommend to the proper authorities some official recognition of their arduous services?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Sir, I wish to bear my testimony to the great amount of time and attention which the persons who were engaged on this inquest gave to the investigation of this terrible calamity, and I think that the thanks of the country are specially due to them. But I am sorry to say that is all I can offer to my hon. Friend. This question was very carefully considered at the time of what was called "the Bravo trial." And it was found that there was no precedent for making a grant to a jury for serving in such matters, and I do not think it would be wise to create one now.

AFGHANISTAN—STATEMENT OF THE VICEROY (LORD LYTTON) 10th OCTOBER.—QUESTION.

MR. ERNEST NOEL asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he can inform the House what was Lord Lytton's authority for saying to the Nawab Atta Mahomed Khan, the British Agent at Cabul, on the 10th October 1876, that if His Highness the Ameer did not desire to come to an understanding with England, Russia did so, and desired it at Shere Ali's expense; whether, seeing that Lord Derby's published communications with Russia of the same date point to no such negotiation, Lord Lytton was authorized to state that there was nothing to prevent us from providing for the security of our Frontier by entering into an understanding with Russia which might have the effect of wiping Afghanistan out of the map altogether; and, whether the Viceroy's intention that all that was in his mind should be faithfully communicated without reserve to the Ameer was carried out by the Vakil?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I must point out to the House that the Viceroy of India is not in the position of an Under Secretary of State, and that it is really impossible to expect that we should answer Questions upon matters of this kind, which really rest within the Viceroy's own discretion and competence. Therefore, I can only say, with reference to the first and second Questions, that it was not in consequence of any official communications from the Secretary of State that these things occurred; that Lord Lytton was perfectly authorized, from his position, in giving his opinion as Viceroy from such information as he had received; and that with regard to the last Question—

"Whether the Viceroy's intention that all that was in his mind should be faithfully communicated without reserve to the Ameer was carried out by the Vakil"—

I am utterly unable to answer as to what was in the Viceroy's mind.

RUSSIA AND PERSIA.—QUESTION.

SIR JOHN HAY asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government has information of the recent arrival of Russian Officers in Persia for the purpose of disciplining the Persian Army; and, if he can say whether the Shah has accepted their services?

MR. BOURKE: No, Sir; Her Majesty's Government have no information of the arrival of Russian officers in Persia for the purpose indicated in the Question.

LAW AND JUSTICE (SCOTLAND)—JUDICIAL ARRANGEMENTS.—QUESTION.

COLONEL MURE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to fill up the vacancy on the Scotch Bench; and, what arrangements are in contemplation in regard to the office of Lord Clerk Register of Scotland?

MR. ASHETON CROSS: Sir, with regard to the first Question, the learned Lord Advocate and myself have been in consultation upon this matter, and I think it most probable that some legislation will be brought forward after the Recess, which will make it unnecessary to fill up the post. With regard to the latter Question, I undertook to visit Edinburgh myself, in order to inquire into the condition of the Register Office. I have made arrangements that one of its officers should meet me there in the course of next week, and when Parliament assembles again I shall be prepared to state my view of the matter.

THE MERCANTILE MARINE—ARMED MERCHANT VESSELS.—QUESTION.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, If efficient measures are in preparation whereby the Mercantile Marine may become, at short notice, available for the armed protection of our commerce on the sea, in the event of war and aggression; and, whether any legislation is proposed on the subject?

MR. W. H. SMITH: Sir, steps have already been taken by which the Mercantile Marine may become at short notice available for the armed protection of our commerce on the sea in the event of war. I do not apprehend that legislation will be necessary for the purpose; but if, at any future time, it may appear desirable that further powers should be obtained, I shall not hesitate to ask Parliament for any authority that may be necessary to make the Steam Mercantile Marine a valuable addition to the offensive and defensive strength of the country in time of emergency.

INDIA.—FRONTIER MAPS.

QUESTION.

CAPTAIN PIM asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether it is true that during Lord Northbrook's Viceroyalty a non-commissioned officer of the "Guides" set out, with the approval of his chief, and after many months' absence returned, bringing with him a map of the whole route traversed by him from the Afghan Frontier to the nearest Russian post, and that his chief at once forwarded this map to head quarters; whether the acknowledgment for such service was not a reprimand to all concerned; whether, although rewarded by the colonel of his regiment in the first instance, the non-commissioned officer was not dismissed the service by order of the Viceroy; whether such non-commissioned officer was afterwards reinstated, and by whom, and when; and, whether it is not the especial duty of the "Guides" to obtain all the geographical and topographical knowledge possible of our Indian Frontier?

MR. E. STANHOPE: Sir, I have made all inquiries possible since I saw the Question of the hon. and gallant Member on the Paper; but I cannot hear anything whatever of the statement to which it refers.

THE CHARITY COMMISSION.

QUESTION.

MR. W. H. JAMES asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether Her Majesty's Government have had under their consideration in the Recess the present charge of the expenses of the Charity Commission upon the Consolidated Fund; and, whether they entertain submitting any scheme to Parliament by which either the whole or part of the expenses of the Commission may be raised by a small sum raised upon the Charities within its jurisdiction?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON, in reply, said, he was now in communication with the Charity Commissioners with regard to the present charge of the expenses of the Commission and the quarter from which it should be defrayed, and when Parliament met after the Recess he should be able, he hoped, to suggest some alteration in the present system.

LAW AND JUSTICE (SCOTLAND) — JUDICIAL BUSINESS OF NAIRNSHIRE.
QUESTION.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH asked the Lord Advocate, What steps Government intend to take with the view of remedying the inconveniences occasioned to the judicial business of Nairnshire from the want of a resident sheriff?

THE LORD ADVOCATE: Sir, there has not been a vacancy in the judicial office in Nairn for upwards of 50 years, and I think it is to that circumstance, rather than to the difficulty in getting their judicial work done there, that the inconvenience alleged by the hon. Member must be attributed. Her Majesty's Government propose to remedy that inconvenience by appointing a gentleman to discharge the duties of the vacant office; but it is right to say, looking to the terms of the hon. Gentleman's Question, that it is not intended to appoint a resident sheriff to perform the duties of the office. The Law Commissioners of 1860 recommended that the office should be united to that of a neighbouring sheriff substitute; and I think there has been no such change in the amount or in the character of the duties as would justify the Government in departing from that recommendation.

QUESTION.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK asked the Secretary of State for War, with reference to his previous answers upon this subject and to the Warrant of 12th July last under which a number of Officers of the Commissariat Department have been retired, When the promised Warrant re-organizing that Department will be likely to be issued?

COLONEL STANLEY, in reply, said, the Warrant referred to by the hon. and gallant Gentleman had been under consideration a long time, and he hoped it would be issued very shortly.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—COURT OF BANKRUPTCY.—QUESTION.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether there has as yet been any appointment made to the judicial position of Judge of the Irish Court of Bankruptcy; and, if not, when an appointment is likely to be made?

MR. J. LOWTHER: Sir, no appointment has been made in the Irish Court of Bankruptcy; but an appointment will very shortly be made.

AFGHANISTAN — THE CONFERENCES AT UMBALLA.—QUESTION.

MR. RYLANDS asked the Under Secretary of State for India, If he will lay upon the Table of the House the full Minutes of the four secret Conferences which took place at Umballa after the Durbar of 27th March 1869?

MR. E. STANHOPE: Sir, the Minutes of the four secret Conferences, which the hon. Member states to have been held in 1869, were not sent home by the Government of Lord Mayo.

TURKEY—PROTECTORATE OF CONSTANTINOPLE.—QUESTION.

MR. H. SAMUELSON (for Mr. DILLWYN) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether his attention has been called to a Reuter's Telegram, which appeared in the morning papers of the 12th of Decr. and dated from St. Petersburg on the 11th, to the effect that Count Münster had proposed to Lord Salisbury that in consideration of the unification of Eastern Roumelia with Bulgaria being permitted England should be allowed to assume the protectorate of Constantinople, and should occupy certain neighbouring positions, that negotiations on this subject still continue; and whether there is any foundation for this statement?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: No, Sir; it has no foundation. There is no truth in the report at all. The German communications were confidential, and they referred merely to questions connected with the carrying out of the Treaty of Berlin.

POOR LAW—LIVERPOOL—ALLEGED MISCONDUCT.—QUESTION.

MR. STANSFELD asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether his attention has been drawn to an article in the "Freeman's Journal" of December 3rd, in which it is stated that a Poor Law officer charged with the convoy of one male and two female paupers from Liverpool to their native unions in Ireland, having reached Castleblayney and lodged one of the female paupers in the workhouse at that place, procured for the night admittance for the other female pauper, an orphan girl, to a cheap lodging house with himself as his wife; to inquire if this statement is true; and, if so, what steps are being taken against the officer in question, and by what measures it is proposed to prevent the possible recurrence of such misconduct; and, further to inquire, with reference to the Resolution of the House of Commons of the 2nd of July last, that the Laws concerning the removal of paupers in England and Scotland inflicted hardship and required consideration and amendment, whether he proposes to bring in a Bill to amend these Laws?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH: Sir, the statements made in the article quoted by the right hon. Member are, I believe, correct. The officer who was responsible for the conduct of the convoy was in the employment of the Select Vestry of Liverpool and a married man of good character, and believed to be thoroughly trustworthy. I am informed that he has been discharged since this account appeared in the newspapers. As to the amendment of the laws concerning the removal of paupers, I can only repeat what I said last night in reply to a Question from the hon. Member for Cork, that the subject was under the consideration of the Government, and I hope to be able, after Christmas, to make a proposal on the subject.

THAMES TRAFFIC REGULATION.

QUESTION.

MR. GOURLEY asked the President of the Board of Trade, What measures he has in contemplation for the better security of life and property in the navigation of the Thames and other large rivers; and, whether it is his intention to give effect to any and which of the changes suggested by the Commissioners' Court of Inquiry respecting the collision between the steamers "Princess Alice" and "Bywell Castle?"

VISCOUNT SANDON: Sir, we are giving our most careful attention to the whole question of the traffic regulations as to the navigation of the Thames, which is in a totally different position from any other river as to the authorities which are responsible for its management and as to the conditions of its traffic. I have referred the Report of the Wreck Commissioner's Court to the very able Committee which I appointed during the autumn to consider the Thames traffic regulations. Until the final Report of that Committee is received, and we have had the opportunity of considering it, together with other information which throws light upon the subject, it is not possible for me to say what course the Government will propose to take next year. We have laid upon the Table of the House the evidence which this Committee has already taken, with the view of bringing before Parliament the points which have been already raised, and of thus enabling other evidence to be offered to the Committee, if in any quarter there should be a desire to do so. I shall present to Parliament all additional evidence, as well as the Committee's Report, on this important subject.

CYPRUS—AFGHANISTAN—THE LATE DEBATES.—EXPLANATIONS.

MR. BOURKE: Sir, I wish, with the permission of the House, to correct an Answer which I gave to the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke). It will be in the recollection of the House that two or three days ago the hon. Baronet asked me a Question as to jurisdiction in Cyprus, and I told him there had been no Correspondence with foreign Powers on that subject. He repeated that Question yesterday; and I think it fair to the hon. Baronet to say that if he had asked me that Question to-day, my answer would have been different. It would have been to the effect that questions have been put to us quite recently with respect to judicial arrangements in Cyprus.

MR. E. STANHOPE: Sir, I also have to ask the kind indulgence of the House while I offer a few words of personal explanation. In the course of the debate on Monday last I described a letter of Sir Henry Norman's as "misleading." That description still appears to me an accurate one. But I am sorry to learn from the gallant officer that it has caused him some annoyance; because he thinks that the inference might be drawn from it that I imputed to him a desire to deceive the public. With the permission of the House I wish, therefore, to state publicly what I have already said privately, that such was far from being my meaning. I did not say, or think of saying, or suggesting, that Sir Henry Norman wrote the letter in question with the intention of misleading the public, nor did I think of implying anything derogatory to his personal honour.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

THE ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.

(MR. WHITBREAD).

ADJOURNED DEBATE. [FOURTH NIGHT.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [9th December], "That the said Address be now read a second time."

And which Amendment was,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House disapproves the conduct of Her Majesty's Government which has resulted in the War with Afghanistan,"—(Mr. Whitbread,)—instead thereof.

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

Debate resumed.

EARL PERCY said, that it appeared to him the remarks which fell from the Opposition side of the House, and especially from the front Opposition Bench, were distinguished by a degree of acrimony very unusual, and such as had not characterized previous debates. Charges had been made of the gravest character and hurled at the heads of Her Majesty's Government. And the greatest master of the English language in the House had tortured his mother tongue to find words to frame his charges, which almost amounted to an accusation of forgery and fraud on the part of Her Majesty's Government. The right hon. Gentleman had managed to make those charges without violating the Rules of the House; but he doubted very much whether such a course of proceeding did not greatly tend to lower the dignity of Parliament. The climax, however, was reached last night, when the hon. Member for the Elgin Burghs (Mr. Grant Duff) thought it consistent with his duty to read an extract from a private letter written long ago by one who, alas! was no longer present among them to explain what he had written, and had read that letter for the express purpose of impugning the veracity of a Government of which Lord Mayo, if he were still alive, would have been a distinguished ornament, and of which his brother was at this moment a valued Member. But as an attempt to impeach the bona fides of the Government, the feat of the hon. Member was eminently futile, for the action of Ministers must be criticized by the light of public documents officially presented to Parliament, and not of unexplained statements and private letters which were never intended for the public eye. He hoped, however, the example set by the hon. Gentleman, of quoting from private and unauthenticated letters, was one which would never be copied in that House. He would not dwell further upon these matters, because he believed the public was very little interested in the disputes which had been going on between Ministers. Turning to the question then under discussion, the real point at issue seemed to him to have been very clearly stated by the hon. Member for Bedford, when he said the conscience of the country required to be assured that the present war was just and necessary. He might omit the word "just," because he did not believe that a war could be necessary unless it could be shown to be just. But how were they to find that out? Those who had spoken from the Ministerial side of the House had given their reasons for believing it to be just and necessary; and the only way, it seemed to him, in which hon. Members opposite could prove that the present war was unnecessary, was by showing that the difficulties which we had to meet could be overcome by some other means than those which had been adopted by the Government. That question was dealt with very fully by the Postmaster General, who put to the House a number of dilemmas which would have to be confronted, and from which he asked the House to extricate him. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, indeed, in replying to the speech of the Postmaster

[Fourth Night.]

General, contended that it was not fair to ask the Opposition to state what course they would pursue in a position of affairs which he said had been brought about by the errors of others; but, admitting the force of that argument, he thought if it could be shown that the Opposition before the present Government was in power was already in a situation so embarrassing that they had never been able to recover from it—that one step taken after another rather increased than diminished their difficulties—the Government might at least demand that some hon. Member of the Opposition should state what they could have done to extricate themselves from difficulties which their own errors had created. The right hon. Gentleman had taken the Postmaster General to task for not quoting from the Blue Book; and he would therefore trouble the House with a few quotations for the purpose of showing that the right hon. Gentleman and his friends were not free from blame in connection with the present question. Now, he regarded what had occurred in 1873 as being the turning-point of the whole question. Russia had at the time made great advances in Central Asia. Shere Ali was alarmed at those advances, and applied for encouragement and assistance to the British Government, who had always professed to be his ally. The answer sent out by telegraph from this country, on the 26th of July, 1873, by the Duke of Argyll, was as follows:—"Cabinet"—that word included the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich and his Colleagues—

"thinks you should inform Ameer that we do not at all share his alarm, and consider there is no cause for it: but you may assure him we shall maintain our settled policy in favour of Afghanistan, if he abides by our advice in external affairs."—[Afghanistan, No. 1, p. 108.]

The settled policy referred to was set forth in the despatch, dated the 1st of July, 1869—than which he knew nothing in the whole of the Papers or in Parliamentary literature which contained a more grim piece of irony—in which it was stated that while no British soldiers should ever be permitted to cross the Frontier to coerce the rebellious subjects of the Ameer; that no European officers should be placed as Residents in his cities; that no fixed subsidy or money allowance would be given him for any named period; that no promise of assistance in other ways would be made; and that no Treaty would be entered into obliging us under every circumstance to recognize him or his descendants Rulers of Afghanistan; yet that we were prepared to give him all the moral support in our power, and that, in addition, we were willing to assist him with money, arms, and ammunition whenever we deemed it possible or desirable to do so. Now, the policy which was thus announced, and which was called an intermediate one, reminded him very much of the game of "Heads I win, tails you lose;" and it was his settled conviction that from that time Shere Ali gave up all hope of real protection from us, and determined to throw himself into the arms of Russia, for in the following November they found him writing in friendly terms to General Kaufmann. The Ameer knew that he was a weak Power between two strong ones; and unless England were prepared to give him the assistance at once that he had a fair right to expect, he (Earl Percy) could not see what he was to do but to look for assistance from the other Power. He did not mean to say that the Ameer had not other causes of complaint. It was, however, curious to see how often a statement that had been over and over again refuted was repeated in the debates of the House. He had supposed that it had been proved to demonstration that the sending an Envoy was not the cause of the Ameer's disaffection, and that he had at one time even been anxious to receive one. ["No!"] If the fact was still doubted, he would quote from a letter written by the Agent at Cabul to the Commissioner at Peshawur on April 14, 1872, in which the Ameer had said that "if the British Government preferred to depute an English officer to him he should have no objection to that course." That, then, was not the real cause of Shere Ali's discontent. There was another reason, equally weighty and more probable—namely, our interference on behalf of Yakoob Khan. To his astonishment the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread) the other evening had said that he highly approved that course. Certainly he had not imagined that that act would ever have been endorsed by the other side of the House; and, as that was one of the more or less immediate causes of Shere Ali's alienation, it was all the more necessary for the Opposition to say what steps they would have taken and what remedies they would have proposed—to quote the words of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich—to retrieve the errors of the past. But though he cordially approved the policy of the present Government, he could not fail to see that it had one defect—a defect, however, for which they were not responsible: that it had come too late. They were only shutting the stable door after the steed had been stolen. The policy of masterly inactivity towards Russia which had been pursued for the last 40 years had borne its fruit. Before every advance of Russia in Central Asia she had taken care to assure us that she had come to the very limits of her Empire; that accidental circumstances made the advance in question necessary; but that she had no desire for any increase of territory. But we had been deceived on each occasion. Once, indeed, we had fought Russia, and had stopped her advance in Europe; but no sooner had the Crimean War ended than we allowed her to destroy the Circassians, who in some measure barred her advance in Asia. Then, again, we had had assurances from her in 1864, followed by her advance to Tashkend; and at last, in 1871, she announced her intention of tearing up the Treaty of Paris, so far as it related to the Black Sea. The policy of masterly inactivity was then in vogue, and the Government of the day “saw no cause for alarm whatever.” Finally, that same policy had permitted the Russian advance to Khiva; and, less than two years ago, had deluged with blood the whole of the East of Europe. Even at that time the policy of hon. Gentlemen opposite, which still fettered the country, was far from being prepared to stem the tide of Russian conquest; indeed, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich was perfectly ready to help Russia to drive the Turks out of Europe. He hoped he had not spoken of Russia with bitterness. He quite agreed with the hon. Member for South Northumberland (Mr. Ridley) in his remark that aggression was very often unavoidable; and that we, remembering our own conquests in India, could hardly complain of Russia succeeding in a similar exploit in another part of the world. So far from any intentional acerbity of speech towards Russia, he had only wished to show the danger of the policy of masterly inactivity. It was by no means a new policy, seeing that it had its parallel in the animal kingdom, in the conduct of those birds who, when pursued, buried their heads in the sand, and owed their destruction to their imagined security. Before many years hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House would be in Office. [“No, no!”] Well, he hoped he was wrong; but suppose such an event to take place, they would have again the same spectacle which they had had for the last 40 years. The consequence of the constant change of Governments in this country was that they would never be able to compete in foreign policy with Russia. She could always outwit them; and a change of Government in this country was, so far as foreign policy was concerned, tantamount to a revolution. With this constant shifting and changing policy we could not expect to be able to meet a Power which had extended her conquests without cessation on a uniform plan for the last 200 years to an extent which had never been equalled since the creation of the Roman Empire. Our policy of masterly inactivity meant, as Lord Napier of Magdala had said, “receding from difficulties till they became serious dangers,” and had been allowed to continue far too long. They had a serious duty to perform as Members of that House; and he hoped that the House and the country would show by their voice that they appreciated the change which had been made in the counsels of Her Majesty; and that they preferred the policy of the present Government to that of a Ministry which had neither skill, knowledge, nor courage to face the difficulties and dangers which confronted them.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he was prepared to forgive the noble Lord who had last spoken for the hard words he had applied to Her Majesty's Opposition in consideration of the consolatory prophecy they had just listened to with respect to the change that was likely to take place in their position. He thought one sophism had been employed in that debate by which they were not likely to be deceived in that House. Certain journals were very fond of declaring that they had nothing to do with the past and had only to consider the present. That was a doctrine very pleasant and natural to journals, which, like the ephemeral insect, had a term of life of 24 hours. It was often expedient to them to forget the past. But the House of Commons had a very different function. They had to judge of a policy and to determine the justice of a war; and in so doing they must consider the past circumstances on which that policy was founded, and the causes by which that war had been occasioned. The noble Lord himself, and others on his side of the House, showed that they themselves admitted this; and therefore he brushed away this nonsensical rubbish, which he was sure would not occupy or command the attention of the House for a single moment. The questions they had to decide in that debate were these—had the policy of Her Majesty's Government been wise, and was the war a just one? The noble Lord the Postmaster General had heaped a great deal of abuse upon the old policy, and had used strong epithets about it, and the noble Earl who had just sat down seemed to share in his opinions. He was not himself a pedantic adherent of the old policy; but he thought it was a very good one in its time, for it was agreed to by eminent statesmen, both in India and England. To talk of it contemptuously as "an old, exploded policy" might suit the noble Lord the Postmaster General; but he did not think the noble Lord was a very great authority on Indian affairs. He admitted it was impossible to have a fixed policy, for when circumstances changed, the policy must be modified to suit the new situation of things; and if Her Majesty's Government justified the new policy on the ground that the old one required to be modified, he would not quarrel with that position. Now, in argument, he held it to be the best thing to grapple with the good points made by his adversaries, and not to waste powder and shot upon the bad ones. Therefore, he should very briefly dismiss what he called the bad points on the other side. He regretted, however, that a great deal of recrimination had been used which was quite beside the question; and he could not absolve hon.

Sir William Harcourt

Gentlemen opposite from a share of the responsibility of introducing it. For instance, the Government contended that the policy of Lord Northbrook was the cause of the estrangement of the Ameer, and led to what followed. They said Lord Northbrook was too cold and cautious and repellent, and that when they came to deal with the Ameer they came too late, for they found him angry. But he did not think this view was just; and, at any rate, Her Majesty's Government were not entitled to advance it. If they thought, just before they took Office in 1873, that Lord Northbrook was too cold, too cautious, too repellent to the Ameer, and that he had been held back from going further, not by his own judgment, but by the influence of the Government, why did not they give him further and different instructions in 1874? But the remarkable fact was that though in 1874 Her Majesty's Government were in Office, they never thought for one moment of sending instructions to Lord Northbrook to offer better terms to the Ameer—to go further and secure his loyal and cordial support. If they thought Lord Northbrook did not go far enough, they were guilty of the most culpable negligence if they did not give him fresh instructions. In 1875, it was true, they did give fresh instructions to Lord Northbrook. But what were they? Not to offer better terms; but Lord Salisbury, in his despatches to Lord Northbrook, urged him to demand conditions which were of a most odious and obnoxious character. Therefore, the Government were not entitled to say that what had happened had happened because Lord Northbrook did not offer sufficiently good terms to the Ameer, because they themselves did not on the two subsequent occasions make any other offers. Why, then, did the Government say that Lord Northbrook was too cold, too cautious, too repellent—he might almost say, too costive in his offers to the Ameer? What were these instructions given in 1873? Lord Salisbury wrote that the Viceroy ought, by superior intellect and force of character, to triumph over the stubborn prejudices of the Ameer. Well, they had tried that superior intellect and that force of character, and they had not triumphed over the stubborn prejudices of the Ameer. During all that time they were not disposed to be the least degree more liberal than Lord Northbrook and the Duke of Argyll had been. He would now pass on to another point that had been brought forward, and, as he thought, had been much misunderstood. They said that the course they had taken had been made necessary because the Ameer had entered into objectionable communications with Russia. But the Papers proved that this was utterly untrue. Before the Government began their operations with the Ameer in the beginning of 1876, there had been no communications between the Ameer and Russia of a character of which they could, in the least degree, complain. It was true there were communications, as there always had been since the time of Lord Mayo; but the English Government had not disapproved them. In 1870 Shere Ali received a communication from General Kaufmann on the 15th of May, and he wrote to inform Lord Mayo of it, and, in reply, Lord Mayo wrote back to the Ameer—

In fact, Lord Mayo congratulated the Ameer on having received these letters, and suggested to him, and advised him, to send a most cordial and friendly answer. It had been said that these communications originated in the time of Lord Northbrook. They did not. They originated with Lord Mayo, and were continued by subsequent Viceroys. In 1875, the present Government conducted an amicable negotiation with Russia on the subject of Afghanistan; and throughout the whole of the Correspondence which then took place there was not a word of complaint by the English Government that the Russian Government was holding improper communications with Shere Ali, and why was there not? If it had existed, that surely would be the first thing complained of. Was not the explanation that at that time there was no complaint to be made? Even in the instructions of Lord Salisbury to Lord Lytton there was not a word of complaint of these communications, although in those instructions the policy to be pursued was very fully set out. Why? because even then there was no reason to complain.

The first complaint, indeed, was contained in Lord Lytton's telegram of September 16 and in his letter of September 18, in which he says—"the Ameer no longer communicates with us, and asks us what answer he shall give." Just so. That complaint was in September. It was in July that you had done the mischief, and it was in consequence of what you then said that he acted in this way. The Government were really responsible for the attitude of the Ameer, and their policy could not be defended on any such ground as that. Having thus swept away what he called the false points raised, he would next grapple with the real and true points at issue. The rupture of the communications to the Ameer was not the cause of the Government's policy, but the effect of their conduct. They said they were obliged to alter, or modify, the old policy for two reasons—because the Ameer was sore and alienated, and because Russia was advancing. Those were two very good reasons, because they acted and re-acted on each other. It did not signify much if the Ameer was sore if Russia were not advancing; or if Russia were advancing, provided the Ameer were staunch. But if Russia were advancing and the Ameer were alienated, things might turn out very awkwardly indeed. Had Her Majesty's Government taken the line of regarding that as a good reason for making a better offer to the Ameer, with the view of conciliating him, he should have said that they were perfectly right. He should have supported them in making any offer and in paying any bribe that would have secured to us the friendship of the Ameer, which he was aware was of vital importance to our Indian Empire. He made these admissions, because he wished to get at the actual fact that the Ameer was sore and irritable and suspicious, and that we wished to gain his friendship and to secure his alliance. But the question he had to ask Her Majesty's Government was, how did they proceed in these circumstances? Had they adopted methods best calculated to gain their end, and had the result of the course they had taken been to secure for us the friendship and the cordial alliance of the Ameer? If it were desired to mount a plunging, restless horse, it would not do to approach him flourishing a whip, and, when mounted, it was not desirable to begin jogging at the curb and sticking the spurs into his ribs; otherwise the rider would meet with a fall, just as we had met with a fall in Afghanistan in 1842. How did the Government begin to approach the Ameer? Instead of conciliating him, and so securing his friendship, they began by announcing that they were going to send Sir Lewis Pelly to Cabul. Did they think that that was the most agreeable way to approach the Ameer? Was that the way Lord Mayo dealt with him in 1869, or Lord Northbrook dealt with him in 1873? They knew his objection to receiving an Envoy, and the one met him at Umballa and the other received his Prime Minister at Simla. Why did not the Government follow this example? Her Majesty's Government must have known that if anything would make the Ameer irritable and discontented, it was to send an Envoy to him at Cabul. Then, whom had they selected as their Envoy? They had chosen Sir Lewis Pelly. He was a man of great ability; but, most unfortunately, with his name there were ominous associations, for he was the man who had just before been employed to depose the Gaekwar of Baroda. That he considered very bad diplomacy. He did not care to cast much blame upon Lord Lytton in this matter. He had had the good fortune to enjoy the friendship of that noble Lord for some time; and he did not desire, in the discharge of a public duty, to say a word that would imperil a continuance of that friendship. He believed that Lord Lytton had merely performed his duty in carrying into effect the instructions he had received from the Home Government. Therefore, he was surprised to hear the Chancellor of the Exchequer that evening speak as if he declined to accept the responsibility of a phrase used by Lord Lytton. He should hold the Government responsible for everything Lord Lytton did, and for every word he spoke; and he should no more think of blaming him for what had happened than he should of blaming the gallant General Roberts or Sir Samuel Browne in the Khyber. Above all, he did not blame him for the instructions sent out by Lord Salisbury, "to create opportunities of approaching" the sore and suspicious Ameer. That was language, he was happy to say, which was new in the instructions of English statesmen, and he was glad that Lord Northbrook made a worthy answer to so unworthy a suggestion. When it was made to him he told Lord Salisbury what his Lordship ought to have known. He told his Lordship not only that that was a course which ought not to be pursued, but that it was a course which was sure to fail, and that the only chance of success lay in honestly and frankly approaching the Ameer and telling him what we meant. But when Lord Lytton received those instructions to "create an opportunity," what occurred? In his despatch in reply he rightly interpreted the meaning of the Secretary of State, for he said—"I found a pretext." A pretext! That was not a nice word. They were going to approach a man whom they desired to conciliate, and whose confidence they wished to secure, and they used a pretext! And what was the "pretext" made use of? It was that of announcing to the Ameer the assumption by Her Majesty of the title of Empress of India. When the Secretary of State for India instructed the Viceroy of India to employ that grand new title of Empress of India to delude an Indian Prince, it was not a fortunate way of inaugurating the new title. Lord Salisbury had congratulated Lord Lytton upon his having the qualities of a Scotchman. He did not know whether the Scotch Members of that House would regard that left-handed compliment as very flattering. Lord Lytton, at all events, understood it to mean what was called "smartness" in America, although it had other names in other countries. He should say that a man who created opportunities and found pretexts was guilty of what was termed "sharp practice" in England. And it was the fundamental fault that he found with our policy in dealing with the Ameer that we had preferred "sharp practice" to being frank and open. His first great charge against the Government was that they had endeavoured to "bamboozle" the Ameer. They went to him with a pretext, and thought he would not find them out. But Lord Northbrook told them that he would, and he did. Yet they were told in proof of his hostility that at this interview he was suspicious. He had heard of these men as barbarians and savages; but, for his part, he thought the Prime Minister of the Ameer conducted himself at Peshawur with the greatest ability. To go to this man with the pretexts and opportunities that they had found, and yet think he would not be suspicious, showed an amount of pettiness and blundering diplomacy which it was impossible sufficiently to condemn. Our Native Agent told us the Ameer would be glad to come to terms, if he was convinced of our meaning real business; but that we must be clear and open in our communications, as the Afghans had come to suspect a secret meaning in all we said. And was the Ameer far wrong in that supposition? By sending Sir Lewis Pelly upon one pretext, in order that he might do another thing, they raised a suspicion of our conduct at the very outset. To this request for the reception of Sir Lewis Pelly the Ameer was said to have sent a hostile answer. The Ameer wrote that before he received Sir Lewis Pelly he would rather know what we meant; and then the Government said—"Here is this stupid, hostile, obstinate fellow who won't be satisfied by our pretexts." A more unfair, a more unjust, and a more ungrounded cause of war, in his opinion, had never been put forward. What was the consequence? On July 5 they wrote an angry letter, which was calculated to destroy all chance of a satisfactory arrangement with the Ameer. The Indian Government said they would not receive his Envoy because he would not receive theirs. Was that the conduct of Lord Northbrook's Government? They received the Ameer's Envoy, though he would not receive theirs. They adopted the course which was most likely to succeed. On July 8 the Indian Government wrote a letter to the Ameer, threatening that if he would not do what they liked they would have done with him. From that moment his communications with Russia began. In the telegram of September 16, and the despatch of September 18, Lord Lytton said that now the Ameer had ceased to ask advice from them; now he was dangerously communicating with Russia. They had refused, at first, to receive his Agent at all; but at last they consented—and it seemed to him one of the few sensible things they had done—that the Native Envoy should come to Peshawur, for the purpose of ascertaining the views of the British Government, and those views were frankly communicated to him. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had been challenged that night on the important preliminary statement which was made before the Conference.

"What is there," said the Viceroy, "to prevent us from providing for the security of our Frontier by an understanding with Russia, which might have the effect of wiping Afghanistan out of the map altogether? If the Ameer does not desire to come to a speedy understanding with us, Russia does; and she desires it at his expense."—[Afghanistan, No. 1, p. 183.]

The Chancellor of the Exchequer did not like that passage. Anybody who heard his answer that night must have seen that the Government felt the pinch of that part of the case. And that extraordinary statement admitted of being viewed in two aspects. It was true, or it was not true. If it was true, what did it mean? It was what might be called, in the language of the auction-room, a sort of international "knock-out"—that was to say, if they could not buy the man whom they wanted to conciliate at their own price, they were to settle the matter elsewhere. If it was not true, what was to be thought of that style of negotiation? He knew that in the Court of Chancery, if a man was found to have made such a proposal to a creditor, it would set aside the contract for fraud. He asked again, was it true or not true? Was it to go forth to India that this was the way in which the Government dealt with Eastern Princes—that they went to them and made statements of a particular character, for the purpose of influencing and compelling them to take a certain course, but that they afterwards came forward in the House of Commons and said—"Oh! it was not correct?" That was a transaction materially affecting the reputation of the British Government, and also affecting the maintenance of its authority in India, and a clear and distinct account should be given of it. Well, at Peshawur, they professed to offer the Ameer certain terms, and they imposed on him a certain condition. It was said that Lord Northbrook had offered him terms too narrow, too cautious, too reserved. They offered him no better terms. It was true they offered him a Treaty. He would not weary the House by going into the details of that Treaty; but anybody who compared them with the assurances offered by Lord Northbrook would admit that, in the main, the terms offered in that Treaty did not exceed the assurances offered either by Lord Mayo or by Lord Northbrook. The Ameer's Prime Minister, in answer to the proposals made at Peshawur, said he had got those things already under the Treaties of 1855 and 1857, and that he also had the assurances of Lord Mayo in writing, and likewise those of Lord Northbrook. The Indian Government declared the Treaty of 1857 to have expired; and, as to what had passed between Lord Mayo and Lord Northbrook, they said they were only verbal assurances. When he looked at those transactions he condemned them as regarded their bearing on the Ameer, but far more because they would ruin our moral authority and influence in India. What was meant by drawing that distinction between Treaties and verbal assurances? Of course, there was a difference between the two. There was a difference between a promise and a deed; but what would be thought of the man who, when another came to claim from him the fulfilment of a promise, turned round and said—"You might have got a deed, and you only got a promise?" That was the exact parallel to this case. He referred to pages 218 and 219 in the Afghanistan Correspondence; and he maintained that, explain it away how they might, the language held by the Viceroy on the distinction between verbal assurances and Treaties was most dangerous language, and likely to be most mischievous to our authority in India. It was, in practice, found very useful for the Government to give assurances on which the Indian Princes might rely where Treaties might not be convenient; but when the transactions contained in that Correspondence went forth to India, the confidence of the Native Princes would be shaken in assurances such as those given by Lord Mayo and Lord Northbrook to the Ameer. That was one of the gravest items in the indictment against the Government. Such was the character of the offers made at Peshawur; and he was not surprised that the Ameer was not at all inclined to accept them, because he had got quite as good before. But then what was the sine quâ non—the condition precedent—which they imposed on him? They said they would not discuss or enter into the negotiation with him unless he ab initio, and before all things, swallowed the condition, which they knew was the most obnoxious thing they could impose on him. All the Indian authorities had told them so—they knew he had always resisted it—and yet wanting to be conciliatory towards the Ameer and anxious to secure their influence in Afghanistan, was it fair to tell him that if he did not agree to accept a resident British Minister in his country they would renounce all their former arrangements with him? They might be wise in desiring to have a resident Minister in Afghanistan—he thought they were wise in desiring that; but all their former arrangements and assurances had been based on the principle that he was not to have a resident Agent; and they had no right to repudiate all previous understandings unless he would accept that condition. If they wanted that condition, they ought to have conciliated him by offering him handsome terms, and then at the end of the thing have said—"Dear Sir, we have done all that you wish, and now will you not waive the objection you had before?" To that there might not have been the smallest objection, and they might have achieved legitimately that which they desired. But that was not at all their course. They put it in the forefront of their battle; they said—"You shall give us the thing which you always have disliked giving us, and if you do not we will not discuss or negotiate, but we will repudiate everything that has gone before." It had been sought to show, by quoting Captain Grey's testimony, that the Ameer was once ready to accept a British Agent, and that having afterwards objected to receive one was evidence of his hostility. But the evidence as to that entirely broke down. A letter had been addressed by Lord Mayo to the Duke of Argyll—an authority which the noble Lord who had spoken last would respect—explaining exactly what was done in 1869. It had been supposed that Lord Mayo had gone too far in his pledges to the Ameer. Now, in that letter Lord Mayo said—

"The only pledges given were that we would not interfere with his affairs; that we would support his independence; and that we would not force European officers or residents on him against his will."

The very thing that Lord Mayo promised should not be done against the will of

the Ameer was forced upon him as a condition which if he did not swallow the negotiations would be broken off. That was unfair; it was impolitic; it rendered successful negotiations from the first impossible. In diplomacy you do not begin with an Ultimatum; but here the Ameer received an Ultimatum at the outset. That was a preposterous proceeding on the part of the Government. And there was this curious fact, which should be borne in mind. The Ameer said before the Envoy was sent—"I dislike this very much; but rather than quarrel with the English I will ultimately accept it. Only allow me to send my Envoy to Peshawur." In other words—"Only let me state my arguments against your proposed conditions, and if you still insist I will yield." What could be fairer than that? It was a proceeding to which, at all events, Her Majesty's Government could not object, because it was made the basis of the Salisbury-Schouvaloff agreement. He had always thought it was an effort of original genius to protest at the outset, but to state you were willing to yield; but now it appeared to be an Asiatic patent which Her Majesty's Government borrowed from the Ameer of Afghanistan. It was an ingenious method of settling matters, and Her Majesty's Government made use of it in settling matters in Berlin; they protested, but, as it was known they would, they ultimately gave way. Well, the negotiation was broken off, and Lord Salisbury, in his despatch, approved what had taken place, and he used language which was new to the Foreign Office, for he said—"You were quite right to take advantage of the death of the Envoy." Lord Salisbury was always taking advantage; he was always creating opportunities; he was always finding pretexts—and such was the new spirit of our foreign policy. What did they think would be its effect upon the Princes of India? The Government summoned the Envoy of the Ameer to Peshawur; they created opportunities; they invented pretexts; they knew that in the end he was prepared to concede that which was demanded; and then they took advantage of the death of the Envoy to close the negotiations. And that was the foundation of this just and necessary war; and in their telegram to the Viceroy the Government congratulated him that his proceedings would get rid of all entanglements. What were these entanglements? As he understood, they were the verbal assurances given by Lord Mayo and Lord Northbrook. They wished to repudiate all liability to the Ameer, and that was the way they terminated the sublime negotiations which were intended to conciliate the Ameer, and secure the cordial support of Afghanistan. Well, it did not belong to any man to dive into the motives of another; but all he could say was this—that if the object of Her Majesty's Government was exactly the opposite of that which they professed; if they desired to break with the Ameer; if they desired to lay the foundation of a war with him; if they desired to annex his territory and rectify their Indian Frontier, they could not have found a more successful method of doing so than that. This he did say—that the method they pursued, and the manner in which they pursued it, were indefensibly wrong from first to last. What could they expect to occur? In March, 1877, they had shaken the dust of the Ameer off their feet, and he turned to the Gentiles. What else could he do? As he stated in his letter, he saw the Russians approaching his Frontier; he saw himself deserted by the English, who denied all liability on their part to defend him; he was plied by his powerful neighbour, and he received a Russian Mission. How could he be expected to do anything else? Then Her Majesty's Government came to Parliament, having made this terrible and deplorable mess—"Oh!"—yes, mess—by want of straightforwardness, temper, and common sense, and they asked—"In the name of Heaven, what are we to do now?" It was just like a ruined gamester, who had lost all his fortune, asking what he was to do; or like a man who had attempted suicide and half cut his throat asking what he was to do. When men got into such scrapes, how could they be aided? What did the Government do? The next stage was to find an opportunity to take in Parliament. These transactions were no sooner finished—no sooner had they forfeited the friendship of the Ameer and alienated Afghanistan, which was the bulwark of our Indian Frontier—than they were interrogated on the subject in Parliament. They were asked, was it true that they were forcing an Envoy on the Ameer, whether the Ameer was alienated, whether their policy was changed? That was a very grave matter. It went a great deal further than India; it struck at the very root of Constitutional government and Parliamentary control. The negotiations had broken down; the Ameer had been driven into the arms of Russia. There was only one way in which they could repair the disaster, and that was by a free and full discussion in Parliament. If Parliament condemned the proceeding, the policy would have been changed. On the other hand, if Parliament approved it, the war would have been justified. The Government adopted neither of these national and Constitutional courses. They were prevented by a statement. He would not condescend to criticize the words of people who spoke by the card; but he said, without fear of contradiction, that the answer given to the question asked was calculated to produce, and did produce, an impression that nothing serious had happened; that no change had taken place in policy; and that things stood as they had before in Afghanistan. He was not one of those who believed that negotiations ought to be conducted on the Table of Parliament. If Lord Salisbury had stated that affairs were in a critical and delicate state; that the matter, as he thought, ought not to be proceeded with; and that he should reserve any statement in Parliament, he would have been supported. He was sure the right hon. Gentleman opposite was always supported when he made such an appeal. Or Lord Salisbury might have said that he could not enter into details, as circumstances had arisen which made it necessary to change the former policy; he would then, too, have been supported; but he did neither of these things. What he did was to give to the English Parliament and nation an absolutely incorrect impression as to the state of affairs. Therefore he said with great regret, but he said it deliberately, that a course like that, taken not upon that occasion merely, would have this mischievous effect—that the assurances of Ministers henceforth could not, and would not, be regarded with that implicit credit with which they had hitherto been received. There was another feature of an extremely disagreeable character in these negotiations. The Conference at Peshawur was closed on the 30th of March last year, and it was not till the 10th of May following that a despatch on the subject was written by the Viceroy. Now, the Viceroy, unlike the Secretary of State, could not act alone; he was obliged to act with his Council. Well, as we now know, the policy of the Viceroy was protested against by one-half of the Members of the Council; but no hint of the difference of opinion among them was at that time allowed to transpire. On the 18th of April the last dissenting Member of the Council resigned; and it was not till after that date that the first despatch of the Viceroy in regard to the Conference was written. Thus, but for circumstances which he had seen complained of, the English nation would have been left in total ignorance of the very important fact that one-half of the Indian Council had dissented from the policy pursued by the Viceroy. Now, this secrecy and want of frankness was of most serious import to our Parliamentary system. He did not claim for Parliament a voice in all negotiations—that was impossible; but it often, and indeed generally, happened, that in matters of great public importance past Governments in this country had sought the sympathy and support of Parliament rather than attempt to conceal from it what was going on. The Government now boasted of their new policy. Why did they not boast of it in 1877? Why did they try to persuade us that there was no new policy at all then? If the old policy deserved the epithets which had been applied to it by the Postmaster General, why did we hear nothing of this in 1877? What the Government wanted—nothing else could explain what happened—was that nothing should be known about their new policy, and they took the course of smuggling it through. Well, what happened next? The Russian Mission went to Cabul, and the Government were then placed in an almost impossible situation. They thought they must send a Mission also, and he did not say that they were wrong—he thought, perhaps, they were right. It was the result of the difficulties which the Government had manufactured for themselves. But even then, considering what had passed, they ought to have sought a friendly solution, which, even then, he thought was not impossible. They ought to have made the matter as little humiliating to the Ameer as was possible under the circumstances. What happened? Our Mission was ordered to start on a certain day, and the time of its arrival was postponed somewhat in consequence of the death of the Ameer's son and heir, but still was pressed forward without much consideration for his feelings under the circumstances. Gholam Hussein was told to go on and force the Ameer into consenting to what was an odious and painful thing before the period of mourning was half over. It would be seen from the Papers that the conduct of our Envoy towards the Ameer must have been horrible and heart-rending. [Admiral Sir WILLIAM EDMONSTONE: Oh, oh!] Well, perhaps nothing would rend the heart of the hon. and gallant Admiral. Being made of the old British oak, it would take a good deal to rend his heart; still, he knew the hon. and gallant Admiral to be a most amiable man, and thought he would have respected one who had lost his son and heir. At all events, the conscience of this nation would have been quieter if the Government had had patience and waited until the days of mourning were over before compelling the Ameer to give an answer. The Ameer begged and entreated, and his Vizier swore that if the Government would have a little patience he would consent to receive a Mission at Cabul. But the Ameer was not listened to. The Government treated him differently from what they treated the Turks. They waited for months and years for the fulfilment of Turkish promises of reform, but would not wait for the answer of the Ameer a week. Gholam returned from Cabul on the 6th of October, and, no doubt, made a report to the Viceroy. Why was not that report produced? They had asked for it over and over again, but had never got it. Sir Neville Chamberlain's letter of the 12th of October showed that the Ameer would, if he had been shown a little indulgence, have ultimately received our Mission honourably; and, the Russian Mission being withdrawn, everything might have ended satisfactorily. But, no; such a course would not have suited the purposes of the Government, and so war was brought about. Well, what had been the result of all this? Had the Government secured Afghanistan? What was the present position of Afghanistan? What were the Government going to do with it? They proposed to set up a "scientific Frontier," of which no definition had been given by the Government, but which was understood to mean a line extending somewhere from about Jellalabad down to Candahar, and thence to Quetta. That, however, was but a narrow strip. What was to be done with the rest? If they did not know, he would tell them. We had made the Afghans our enemies, and in taking our scientific Frontier we should be making a present of Afghanistan to Russia. The result of the policy of the Government would be to make Afghanistan an Asiatic Bulgaria. The Afghans would detest us and love the Russians, as the Bulgarians did. That was the result of these negotiations. A more dangerous or more mischievous result than this—the natural and inevitable consequence of the policy of the Government—it was impossible to conceive. Do not let it be supposed that the Opposition disparaged the value of Afghanistan; on the contrary, they thought it more important perhaps than the Government did. But what was the meaning of the Russians having conciliated and secured the affections of the Afghans? It meant that Russia was increasing her influence over these parts and getting to the eastern flank of Persia, and that we were losing the only chance we had of countervailing that influence by making a present to her of Afghanistan. Every acre of Afghanistan which we did not occupy was secured by Russia. What were the Government going to do? Were they going into the course which they themselves had condemned by giving up the whole of Afghanistan to Russia? He charged the policy of the Government in this matter with exactly the same vices and injurious consequences as he charged their Eastern European policy. The Government had been opposing Russia for years, and what had been the result? The Government were to have secured Afghanistan to England exactly as they were to have maintained the integrity of the Turkish Empire, and a pretty job they had made of both. The result was that, during their Administration, the Government had been playing the part to Russia very much that the wind did to the kite, enabling her to soar. What they had done for Bulgaria they were now doing for Afghanistan. In the course of the past three years Russia, thanks to Her Majesty's Ministers, had made more progress than she did under the reigns of Peter the Great and the Empress Catherine put together. The Opposition predicted what would happen if Russia were allowed to make war against Turkey single-handed, and the anticipated consequences had followed from the policy protested against. The Government were told by Lord Northbrook what would happen if this policy were pursued towards Afghanistan; and the result had been that we had lost Afghanistan, just as we had lost half of European Turkey and allowed it to go practically to Russia. If this went on long enough, Russia would overshadow the earth under the influence of the same policy. This was only part of a still greater question. They had been told that they were to take these matters on a broad issue. He took it on the broadest issue of all. The Government said they had got a new policy in Afghanistan. Yes, they had got a new policy in Afghanistan, and the noble Lord who spoke last said they had got a new policy in Europe too. [Earl PERCY remarked that he had not said anything of the kind.] He was sorry that he misunderstood the noble Lord. Well, the keynote of that policy was sounded the other night by the guiding and animating spirit of that policy. And they knew what it was. It was a denunciation of the deleterious doctrines of those upon whom the Divine blessing was once pronounced—those who sought peace and pursued it. It was not here a question of the Afghan Frontier. We were here face to face with the dangerous spirit of this new policy in Europe. No word had been spared, every endeavour had been endorsed, to arouse the suspicions of this nation—to exasperate its animosities—to provoke the pride of a high-spirited people. It seemed to him that they were going to make other wars inevitable, as they had made the Afghan War, to cover the deficiencies of the Government. They had roused a spirit which they could not repress; they had summoned this war spirit as their slave, and it had become their master; they had made this little shabby war to gratify the war spirit at the expense of a people who could afford it less well than ours. How far were we to-day off a great war? That was what he wanted to know. The policy of the Government was an Imperial policy! Yes, it was an Imperial policy—it was a servile imitation of the Imperialism of the Second Empire. That Empire began after a little war. It had a Mexican expedition. It was to exalt the Latin races. It was to gratify the pride of the French people. But the popularity of that little war flickered out, as the popularity of this war would flicker out. But then the Second Empire was obliged to have a great war—a war to rectify the Frontier of France, and they were to march to Berlin. Yes; the policy of the Government was not a policy of peace. Some of them might go farther and some might go less far in that direction. The Attorney General was one of the advanced guard, and he remembered the hon. and learned Gentleman's speech at Preston. The hon. and learned Gentleman was a most frank and independent man; when he differed from the Government to which he belonged he never was afraid to say so. He had told his constituents that the policy of the Government was wrong, and that if he had been at the head of affairs he would have made war with Russia long ago. And, therefore, they would have in him the best and truest exponent of this new blood-and-thunder policy. Yes; he knew it well. The Government had hoisted the old red flag of the Tory Party—the bloody red flag of the Tory Party—and he knew what the Tory Party was, and the crew that sailed beneath it; it was a gaunt and grisly company. [Laughter.] That was no personal observation. The company of which he spoke, which sailed under that flag, was war, taxation, poverty, distress. The Liberal Party had its flag too. It was the old flag. It bore very different words—the old words of peace, retrenchment, and reform. The time was not far distant when these two flags were going to meet in a General Election. To his mind, the sooner the better. There had been some single skirmishes since the last General Election; and in this Session some private Members had taken their seats who bore the latest voice of the country, and three-fourths or four-fifths of them would record their vote in condemnation of the Government policy.

Sir William Harcourt

Well, they knew the flag of the Government, and what the flag of the Liberal Party was too. For his part, he was not for this new, bastard, Imperial policy. He was for the old policy. The noble Lord would not contradict him now. The noble Lord described it as an interlude in the policy of the last 40 years. Yes; he was for the old policy of the last 40 years. During that period it had been the happy fortune of the Sovereign of these Realms to preside over the advance of this nation in a period of unmixed, almost unbroken, prosperity and peace. He feared that Her Majesty's present Advisers were preparing a very different future for her reign if this interlude continued. It seemed to him that during the last 40 years which the noble Lord condemned the prayer which was daily offered for the Throne had been answered, that peace and happiness had been established on the foundation of truth and justice. Every man in this House knew that in this English land to-day there was neither peace nor happiness; and he would vote in condemnation of the Government to-night because he believed that that unhappy result was mainly due to the cause that the Advisers of the Crown had departed from the paths of truth and justice.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir JOHN HOLKER) said, the attack of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Oxford was altogether so terrible that it almost seemed like temerity on his part to rise for the purpose of combating some of his statements, which, however, he hoped he should do calmly and dispassionately, and with a little less thunder than his hon. and learned Friend had used, and with arguments more relevant to the matter in hand. It was certainly very gratifying that the hon. and learned Gentleman contemplated the consummation of the prophecy of the noble Lord who spoke first with such great satisfaction. The possibility of its confirmation was not accepted with so much satisfaction by some hon. Friends behind him, and one hon. and gallant Member exclaimed against it in a very loud tone; and if there were the slightest probability of the prophecy being realized, he was sure the hon. and gallant Gentleman would accept an office of profit under the Crown. The hon. and learned Gentleman commenced by saying that we ought in this matter to have regard to the past as well as the future, and he alluded to some ephemeral journals which contended that the past ought not to be taken into consideration, remarking that he brushed away all that rubbish; but it was unnecessary that he should have had to brush it away, for it was introduced by himself. No one in this House had contended that it was not perfectly right and just to regard the past as well as the future; therefore he might have spared himself the trouble of sweeping this rubbish away. He agreed with the hon. and learned Gentleman that it was a wise and judicious plan to grapple with the sound and good arguments of your adversaries; and he should be willing and anxious to act on that maxim if there were any sound arguments to meet. Now, let the House consider what had been the burden of the speech just delivered. In the first place, the hon. and learned Gentleman said that the policy of 1873 was the right policy, and that the Ameer was not estranged by what had happened in 1873; but that he was estranged by the ridiculous policy of the Government in attempting to force Agents on him to reside in his territory. Now, was the Ameer not estranged by what took place in 1873? Let them forget all this declamation and bring their minds to bear upon the Blue Book; and could anyone, he would ask, read its contents with care and attention so as to understand and grasp them without being convinced that the Ameer was, at all events, seriously displeased before 1873? On the 5th of May, 1873, the Ameer wrote a letter to the Commissioner of the Viceroy, setting forth his alarm at the progress of Russia in Central Asia, describing in most graphic language how tribe after tribe had been conquered by her arms; how they were likely to take refuge in Afghanistan; how Russia would come down upon him demanding their surrender; how the Russians would pick a quarrel with him. He implored the Government of India to come to his rescue and send him succour in the shape of arms and money. The letter was full of earnest entreaty to the Government of India. He said—Don't let there be any hesitation in this matter, but yield to my entreaty, and yield at once. He did not say that the Government of India were bound to yield; but he did say that their action was very likely to cause disappointment and anger in the mind of the Ameer. He had set before them the danger of Russian progress; he had warned them of the helpless condition in which he would be placed if they did not come to his aid; but the Indian Government replied that they did not recognize the danger which stared him in the face. They could not conceive it possible that Russia would invade his territories; that if his territories were invaded they might perhaps at some future time come to his succour, and send him money and troops; but they would not promise—that must be left entirely to their own discretion. The Ameer asked for bread, and they gave him a stone; he implored their succour, and they met him with a hollow diplomatic mockery. It was, therefore, very likely the Ameer would be angry. The Ameer's view of the situation in 1873, barbarian though he might be, was more accurate with regard to his position than that of the Indian Government. He was seriously offended with their refusal, for it amounted to a refusal of aid. He wrote a letter, dated the 13th of November, 1873—a sarcastic letter, as full of disappointment and bitterness as any ever written by an Eastern Potentate. He told the Indian Government in terms of irony, almost of insult, the effect which their refusal to give him any definite promise of assistance had produced on his mind. But, said the hon. and learned Gentleman, the Ameer did not enter into any communication with Russia; but that was not so. He had communication with Russia over and over again. He had communication with Russia on the 16th of November, 1873, the 4th of September, 1875, and on the 3rd of February, 1876, he had a long letter from General Kaufmann, not one of which communications was sent to the Indian Government.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I beg my hon. and learned Friend's pardon. The letter of General Kaufmann was communicated by the Ameer to the Indian Government.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir JOHN HOLKER): Yes; it was communicated, but no advice was asked, as was usual when the Ameer made known his communications from Russia. All these communications took place before there was the slightest intimation on the part of the Indian Government that the Ameer was desired to allow a British Envoy to reside in his territory. What conclusion could be come to but that the Ameer was irritated and annoyed at the treatment he had been subject to at the hands of the Indian Government, and was preparing, to some extent, to throw himself into the arms of the Russian Government? It was most important to consider what was the position of the Ameer with regard to his engagements. He considered himself much wronged in the course of conduct pursued by the Indian Government; and he was under a misapprehension with regard to the engagements that had been entered into with him by the Indian Government. The Ameer was under the idea that engagements had been entered into by the Indian Government with him that the former did not acknowledge. If the Government of Lord Northbrook had been perfectly desirous of being frank, open, candid, and straightforward with the Ameer, they would have told him that the engagements were not binding, and that he did not put a proper construction upon them. It was said, by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Oxford and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, that there were other engagements apart from Treaty obligations; but the only Treaty, so far as he could learn, and the only one that could be said to be in force and binding, was the Treaty of 1855. The Treaty made in 1857 was made for a temporary purpose, which had been served long ago. But then it was said these were promises which had the binding effect and force of Treaties. He had no doubt but that the Ameer was under the impression that these were unfulfilled promises of the binding effect of Treaties; but he (the Attorney General) submitted, with the greatest confidence, that the Ameer's mind should have been disabused of that idea earlier than it was. The declaration of Lord Mayo had not, nor did his Lordship ever intend that it should have, the force of a Treaty. He declined to enter into a Treaty in reference to one particular subject; and then he gave the declaration which was not intended to have the effect of a Treaty in any way whatever. The House would find in the Blue Book, page 107—

"The Earl of Mayo informed the Ameer at Umballa, in the spring of 1869, that although the British Government did not desire to interfere in the internal affairs of Afghanistan, yet, considering that the bonds of friendship between the Government of India and His Highness had lately been more closely drawn than heretofore, we should endeavour, from time to time, by such means as circumstances might require to strengthen the Government of His Highness; and that we were willing to assist him with money, arms, ammunition, and in other ways, whenever we deemed it desirable to do so. The hands of the Government of India were left absolutely free as to the occasions on which and the circumstances under which such assistance was to be given to or withheld from the Ameer."

In a letter, dated the 15th of September, 1873, from Lord Northbrook's Government, there was the following passage:—

"From conversations with the Envoy we were led to believe that the Cabul Durbar had interpreted the friendly assurances of Lord Lawrence and Lord Mayo to mean that the British Government had bound themselves to comply with any request preferred by the Ameer. It was necessary, therefore, in the first place to remove any incorrect impressions on this score, and in repeating to the Ameer the assurances given to him at the Umballa Durbar, we have given the Envoy distinctly to understand that, while the policy adopted towards Afghanistan by Lord Lawrence and Lord Mayo will be maintained, the British Government reserve to themselves the right of judging as to the propriety of any request preferred by the Ameer."—[Ibid. p. 109.]

What did that passage convey? Why, that the assurances of Lord Lawrence and Lord Mayo had no binding effect; that they were mere assurances, and nothing more; and that the Ameer was not entitled to rely implicitly upon them. Surely, if Lord Northbrook's Government had been really desirous to deal with the Ameer openly and fairly, and to tell him exactly the position in which matters stood, they would have taken more care than they had manifested to inform him that he ought not to rely upon the assurances being carried into effect? Things went on; the Ameer was sullen and reserved. He had sought the assistance of the Indian Government; that assistance was refused; he retired into his territories; and no communications passed between the Ameer and the Government of India during 1874, 1875, and some portions of 1876. Well, the present Government had come into power, and when Lord Salisbury became Secretary of State for India, it was felt that this state of things was very much to be deplored. It was felt by Lord Salisbury and the Government that it was most important for this country to have a proper understanding with the Ameer—to have a thorough, honest alliance with him; and it was also felt that the Ameer had not been treated altogether with that frankness with which he might have expected to be treated. Then a determination was come to that an interview with him should be sought, and that a real Treaty—a real alliance—should be suggested to him upon certain conditions. A great deal had been said about the harsh usage to which the Ameer had been subjected, and every epithet which ingenuity could devise had been hurled against the Government for what they did. But if hon. Gentlemen would consider the matter dispassionately, they would ask themselves whether the conduct of the Indian Government towards the Ameer was not perfectly fair and prudent. What they said to themselves, in effect, was this—as was shown in the Parliamentary Papers—"The Ameer has been under a misunderstanding. He has an idea that this Government is under obligations to him which it is not. It is very desirable that his mind should be instructed on this point, and that an alliance with the Ameer—a permanent and solid alliance—should, if possible, be established." There was some difference of opinion about the matter. He did not blame Lord Northbrook for having had a difference of opinion with Lord Salisbury; but it was finally arranged that an opportunity should be sought for opening up negotiations with the Ameer; and that in the course of the negotiations his true position should be pointed out, and he should be told that the Government of India, on certain conditions, were perfectly prepared to give him, not vague, uncertain, and delusive promises, but an absolute offensive and defensive Treaty, under which they would recognize the heir he had appointed. The hon. and learned Gentleman, in the midst of his thunder, had thundered out something about a pretext which was to delude an Indian Prince, and about some sharp practice on the part of Lord Salisbury. But when all Lord Salisbury did was to wish to open diplomatic communications with the Ameer, and to propose a perfectly fair, just, and equitable arrangement—a binding Treaty, offensive and defensive, with a recognition of the succession on the one side, and, on the other, what was necessary for our protection—namely, permission to our Agents to reside, not in Cabul, but in certain parts of Afghanistan—was it fair in his hon. and learned Friend to describe that as “a pretext to delude an Indian Prince?” Nothing in the world could have been more straightforward. Possibly hon. Gentlemen opposite might think that frankness and candour when applied to an Eastern Potentate were misapplied; but he ventured to think that if there had been more frankness and candour before 1876 we should have been better off. Hon. Gentlemen might say that when the occasion would have arisen, and at the proper time, we might have given him such a Treaty. That was the language of Lord Northbrook. But Lord Salisbury and his Government wished the language to the Ameer to be this—“You have with us no Treaty of any kind except the Treaty of 1855. The assurances given are mere assurances. You have no right to rely upon their performance. If you will only yield to this condition; if you will only allow our Envoys and Agents to be stationed on the Frontiers of Afghanistan at convenient points, so that we may be able to get information of what is going on and see if there is any danger of your Frontier being attacked; we will enter with you into a binding Treaty, offensive and defensive, and we will recognize the successor to the Throne whom you may desire.” Communications were opened; the Ameer said he did not wish to have a Mission at Cabul, and the Government at once acquiesced. Then he suggested that a British Agent should be sent to Peshawur to meet an Envoy from him, and that was agreed to. The British Agent did come; the Viceroy explained his views in frank, clear, and unmistakable language. The Envoy of the Ameer, however, apparently was not armed with the powers to consent to what were to be conditions precedent, and he made long explanations of the Ameer's grievances. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) had complained of the conduct of the British Agent; but he could point out, if he had time, how entirely unjustifiable those complaints were. However, he would not now detain the House. The Ameer's Envoy, no doubt, exhibited great reluctance to acquiesce in the suggestion that British Agents should be sent to Afghanistan; but if hon. Gentlemen would reflect upon what had passed from May, 1873, to the beginning or middle of 1876, when these negotiations were going on, they would come to the conclusion that it was no wonder the Envoy should have shown this reluctance. For what had been done? The Ameer had been disappointed; he felt that when he had appealed to the Indian Government he was cruelly repulsed; therefore, he lost all confidence in the Indian Government, and he sought for solace, support, and protection elsewhere. But the Ameer's was a weak power, and he did not like to have a quarrel with the Indian Government, if he could avoid it. Let hon. Gentlemen read the accounts of what took place between Sir Lewis Pelly and the Ameer's Envoy, and they would come to the conclusion that the Envoy was determined not to yield, or certainly not unless he were absolutely forced to do so. [“Hear, hear!”] Well; was it desirable that we should force our Treaties down the throats of any Power? The object of the Indian Government was to make a Treaty with a friendly Power—a Treaty which would be acceptable to the Ameer and of advantage to ourselves. When, therefore, Sir Lewis Pelly and the authorities at Peshawur found that the proposal was distasteful to the Ameer, and that he would do almost anything rather than accept it, surely the Government of India ought not to be upbraided because they thought it would be fair to insist no further, and to allow things to remain as they were. Some hon. Gentlemen apparently attempted to make out that the negotiations at Peshawur were improperly broken off; that the Ameer was deprived, by the action of the Indian Government, of some rights he had before enjoyed; that some Treaty obligations which we had undertaken were repudiated; and that the Ameer was discarded, so to speak, from our friendship. That was not the case. In proof of this assertion, he must trouble the House with one passage from the letter of Sir Lewis Pelly which put an end to the Conference. Sir Lewis Pelly says—

The Attorney General

"The British Government has no sort or kind of quarrel with the people of Afghanistan. It sincerely desires their permanent independence, prosperity, and peace. It has no conceivable object, and certainly no desire, to interfere in their domestic affairs. It will unreservedly respect their independence, and should they at any time be united in a national appeal to its assistance it will doubtless be disposed, and prepared, to aid them in defending that independence from aggression. Meanwhile, the Afghan people may rest fully assured that so long as they are not excited by their Ruler, or others, to acts of aggression upon the territories or friends of the British Government no British soldier will ever be permitted to enter Afghanistan uninvited.

"But the British Government repudiates all liabilities on behalf of the Ameer and his dynasty. The British Government does not, indeed, withdraw from any obligations previously contracted by it; but it absolutely and emphatically denies that it has ever incurred any such obligations as those imputed to it by your Excellency; and it further affirms that it will never, in any circumstances, undertake such obligations without adequate guarantees for the satisfactory conduct of the Ameer.

"At the same time, the British Government will scrupulously continue, as hitherto, to respect the Ameer's independence and authority throughout those territories which, up to the present moment, it has recognized as being in the lawful possession of the Ameer, and will duly abstain from interference so long as the Ameer, on his part, no less scrupulously abstains from every kind of interference with tribes or territories not his own.

"The Ameer, therefore, so long as he remains faithful to those Treaty stipulations which your Excellency has involved on behalf of His Highness, and which the British Government fully recognizes as still valid, and therefore binding upon the two contracting parties, need be under no apprehension whatever of any hostile action on the part of the British Government."—[Ibid. p. 220.]

Here, then, was an express declaration of Treaty obligations. We said, in substance, to the Ameer—"If you do not like to enter into a Treaty you may decline to do so, and your position will then be exactly the same as it was before." If hon. Gentlemen doubted the accuracy of what he was stating, he would ask them to read the speech delivered by the Duke of Argyll in the House of Lords in 1877, in which the construction he had placed upon the letter of Sir Lewis Pelly was fully admitted. He submitted, therefore, with perfect confidence, that the Indian Government were unfairly treated when it was alleged that they improperly broke off the Conferences at Peshawur, and that by so doing they prejudicially affected the position of the Ameer. It appeared to him, that this great issue had not been debated in altogether a worthy spirit. He did not see why hon. Members should be saying the responsibility for the change in the Ameer's conduct lay with this or that Government. In his opinion, the action of the Government of India in 1873 estranged the Ameer; but the policy then pursued might, for aught he knew, have been quite right. Still, the circumstances of 1873 were not those of 1877 and 1878. The Government of 1873 were under no obligations to exhibit any other policy. If they estranged the Ameer, that was a result to be deplored; although they ought not to be censured for it. On the other hand, he did not think it fair or reasonable to accuse the present Government of having taken strong action against the Ameer, and of having incurred his enmity in consequence of making a reasonable request to have British Agents in his territory. Perhaps that request might have annoyed the Ameer; but they were now discussing the question whether this deplorable war—for all wars were deplorable—in which we had been compelled to engage was a just one or not. The Ameer's position was this—For years he had been on friendly terms with the Government of India—For years he had been acquainted with the understanding, to put it no higher, which the Government of India had come to with Russia—that Afghanistan should be outside the sphere of Russian operations altogether. Over and over again, in early days, the Ameer had acted on the faith of that understanding. On the faith of the understanding that he was on friendly terms with, and, in a certain sense, under the protection of, this country, he had received from us large presents of money and of arms, and had obtained advantages which he would not have otherwise enjoyed. In addition to all this, the Ameer was bound by positive Treaty obligations. By the Treaty of 1855 the Ameer—or, rather, his Predecessor—solemnly engaged that the friends of this country should be his friends, and the enemies of this country should be his enemies. This, then, was a distinct and positive agreement; and if the Ameer was guilty of any unfriendly act towards us, he was guilty of the breach of a Treaty, which, according to all International Law, this country was entitled, if it chose, to regard as a casus belli. There had been no denial of this proposition. The House had listened to a long speech from a distinguished international lawyer—a speech filled with all sorts of topics, good, bad, and indifferent; but containing no word of denial of the principle which he had just laid down as to the rights and powers of the Government. Russia advanced through Asia, and the Ameer received at Cabul a Russian Mission. Was this country to do nothing, or to sit still and not utter a word, when the Government found the Ameer acting openly in this manner? The Ameer was bound to be friendly towards us; and we had a right to test his obligation to show friendship at a time when he was found to be contracting relations with another Power. If England had not done this, she could not have hoped to retain her self-respect, and certainly not the respect of the peoples of India. This being admitted, what other action could Her Majesty's Government take, except to require that the Ameer should receive an Envoy from us, as he had from Russia, and then to send a Mission of dignity, which should command the respect of the Ameer and his people? This requirement was addressed to the Ameer, who declined to answer. He was then asked again, and after much delay, no answer being returned, the Government determined to act. The Government sent a Mission, which was met at a fort outside the territories of the Ameer by his emissaries, and compelled to turn back, the process being accompanied by both force and insult. Nothing was then open to the Government but to take the proceedings which had been entered upon; and to those who said the war was not a just one, he would put this question—What right could be more clear as justifying a war than the deliberate breach of a Treaty obligation? The objectors next said, that in order for the Government to be held blameless, it must be shown that the war was not only “just,” but “necessary.” This last was rather a military question than any other, and he knew nothing of military science; but he thought the question of necessity was answered in the affirmative by the testimony of a General so eminent as Lord Napier of Magdala, who expressed his belief that our North-West Frontier of India was weak; that its weakness subjected our Indian Empire to great danger; and that, in fact, the continued existence of that Empire depended upon the Frontier being maintained. That line would be safe, and India would be safe, if the Ameer chose to be our friend and firm Ally. If he did not so choose, there was nothing for it but to take steps to induce him to come to our way of thinking; and, that failing, to adopt some other measures for our own protection. It had been said that we threatened the Ameer by going to Quetta; a statement and argument as futile as that used by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, who went the length of asserting that we had insulted the Ruler of Afghanistan by making a bridge across the Indus, without first having obtained his consent. He, for one, was glad the Government had taken the other measures which he indicated a few moments back. He would not detain the House further than to say that he hoped the war would be a short and decisive one, and that it would be so conducted as to cause the least possible suffering upon the people of either India or Afghanistan. If it was thoroughly successful—as he hoped and believed it would be—the peoples of India would bless the Government for the course which they had taken—aye, he thought the people of Afghanistan would also bless them, because this war would probably save them from the fate of Khiva and of Khokand.

MR. E. JENKINS said, that had he not obtained the opportunity of explaining his vote he could not have voted against the Government. It would be seen, from what he was about to say, that upon one or two points he happened to be unable to agree with the course taken by the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread). He did not agree with the whole of the right hon. Gentleman's (Mr. Gladstone's) vehement indictment against the Government. There were, nevertheless, grounds on which it was impossible for him to support the Motion. He thought no patriot could view our divided councils at this crisis without mortification and alarm. The spectacle was due in no small degree to the Government. When one considered the policy pursued by the Government during the last two and a-half years; when one saw the Chancellor of the Exchequer carried away by the extreme policy inaugurated by other and more dangerous men, and contrasted his mild speech at the outset of the Eastern Question with his present support of a Jingo policy, one could not fail to perceive that an education had been going on upon that side of the House opposed to the best interests of the country. The conduct of the Government had been at once cowardly and audacious. It had been audacious in this—that, trusting to the immovable and inconsiderate votes of a vast majority, the Government had used the Prerogatives of the Crown in a manner in which no Government had dared to use these Prerogatives since the time of Queen Anne. They had been cowardly in endeavouring, by secret manoeuvres, to shield themselves from the operation of public opinion, and to commit the country to responsibilities of the very gravest possible character. With the general indictment against the Government upon the circumstances under which this war had arisen he cordially agreed. The only doubt in his mind was, whether this was a proper and convenient or a safe time in which to hold such a discussion as was now being taken. The effect of it upon foreign nations could only be depreciatory of the power, influence, and prestige of this country. The Government, whatever faults they had committed, were entitled to generous treatment from their opponents. The day might come when the Liberal Party in power might require the exercise of similar generosity at the hands of their opponents; and the precedent now created might afford an excuse for the factious division of the country in the face of a foreign enemy. We were at war, and he believed we were at war with the approbation of the majority of the people. ["No, no!"] His hon. Friends behind him had, perhaps, superior opportunities for information. But he did not hold the opinion without taking pains to ascertain its accuracy. He felt that, strongly as he suspected and condemned the character of the Government, it was hardly fair—if, indeed, it were wholly Constitutional in practice—to convey to foreign nations, and especially to Russia, the impression that there was any division in the determination of this country to resist, to the utmost of its resources, an attempted menace on the part of others. The combination in the Liberal Party of peace-at-any-price men and extreme humanitarians had undoubtedly conveyed to the country a false impression as to the general opinion of Liberals with regard to the continuation and permanence of the Empire, and to the maintenance of British interests; and were he asked to try to gauge the state of the public mind at the present moment, he would be inclined to say that its feeling was this—that confidence in the Government was much decreasing, and that, on the other hand, confidence in the Opposition was not increasing. But the Government, at all events, were professing to carry out what the people of the country believed to be a definite purpose—the ensuring of the safety of the Imperial interests of the country; and whatever wild or unwarrantable definitions of the term Imperial might be given by flashy Ministers when they were making flashy speeches at the Guildhall, the word Imperial had a real meaning, and might indicate a true policy. The people of the country did believe in the British Empire; and, regarding it as worth preserving, looked with just suspicion on those who talked lightly and contemptuously of an Imperial policy. The great edifice of our Empire, and the edifice of trade and commerce built upon it, depended in no small degree on the manner in which we insisted to all the world that we should maintain them. Had the Ministers come down with a policy intended to meet this feeling, and properly carried it out, it might have been adopted with unanimity on that side. No doubt when the nation, fearing danger to the interests of the Empire—which at all hazards must be preserved—turned to the other Party and found—as he feared they did, though it was not unnatural—that the Opposition not only criticised, but hampered the actions of the Government—as they often did properly, though they failed to give voice to that which the country desired—they were thrown into a state of difficulty, disunion, and discontent. The wider and more important issues should not be lost sight of amidst the invectives of partizans. What the country desired at this moment was a truly patriotic policy Constitutionally carried out. It wanted straightforward dealing and fair play.

[Fourth Night.]

It would neither be dragged at the chariot wheels of personal government, nor would it be embarked in the unseaworthy craft of faction. The charge which he brought against the policy of Her Majesty's Government was, that it appeared to be more the policy of a Party—a policy carried out for power—than for the good of the nation; and that the present Administration had most effectually and thoroughly played into the hands of Russia. With regard to this Afghanistan trouble, Lord Lytton's action might have been ill-advised and premature—he believed it was; the Viceroy might have been tricky—he would not say so; but the impression produced upon him by the Afghan Papers was, that we ought not, and we need not have been, at war with the Ameer. But it was the Central Asia Papers that called for the principal attention of the House; and one felt on reading these Papers that the Government was bound, in some way or other, to put a stop to the advance of Russian influence in Afghanistan. In saying that, was he separating himself from the general opinion of his Party? It was the undivided opinion of all the Governments and all the Viceroys. It would be, in his opinion, most unsafe to allow Russia to obtain such influence as would enable her at some future time to use the disaffection of Afghanistan for the purpose of paralyzing the influence of England in India. It was a highly desirable thing to check the advance of Russia; but the time and action for doing so were badly chosen. When the Treaty of Berlin was signed, Her Majesty's Government should have called upon the Russian Government to withdraw their Envoy, and then proceed to establish our influence in Afghanistan. The manner of their action was indiscreet; but then he felt bound to admit that, at the bottom, there lay an unquestionable disposition to resist any encroachment of Russia on Afghanistan. He thought the action against the Ameer was too severe, and he entered his protest against these proceedings. While feeling that, on the one hand, something might be said against the manner in which the Opposition had acted, he could not say too much against the manner in which the Government, while professing to carry out the policy which the people of the country had deeply and sincerely at heart, had taken advantage of the situation in order to establish the footing of their Party in the country, and in order to maintain themselves in power at the expense of other than the free principles of a great nation.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, that he would not have thought it necessary to address the House, on the present occasion, if he had not called attention to the Central Asian Question in the years 1875 and 1876. At that time he had pointed out—and many hon. Members agreed with him—that the progress of Russia in the East might, in all probability, be attended with danger to our Indian Empire; but no one, though almost all had anticipated a crisis sooner or later, had expected its immediate arrival. Indeed, the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell) had said that it would not occur in the time either of our children or of our grandchildren; but it had come already. With regard to the present debate, he must remark that it had been marred by personalities. The question was one of great moment. The question was not what this or that Viceroy or Government had said or done, but was one of simple facts. What were these facts? In 1869, when Shere Ali met Lord Mayo at Umballa, there was perfect good feeling between him and the Government. That was undeniable, and was largely due to the great qualities of Lord Mayo, which the Duke of Argyll justly complimented in a letter to the papers. Those qualities were of the highest order; but, independently of them, there was no doubt that for some period after 1869 there was a cordial alliance with the Ameer. Why had that alliance now ceased? That was the plain question that the House had set itself to answer. The hon. and learned Attorney General had put this case well when he asked whether the war was forced upon us, and whether it was a just and politic war? while the noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition had pronounced it an unjust war; but, to his amazement, he had followed that remark by a most warlike speech, than which no Jingoism could have been more earnest. He admired the patriotism of the noble Lord, but it was strangely inconsistent; for if the war was unjust, he could not see how hon. Gentlemen on that side of the House could go heart and soul into the military operations. There was also another inconsistency about the noble Lord. If he desired the success of our Army, why did he come down to the House and, not only there but out-of-doors as well, excite the feelings of the people against the Government at such a critical time? Was it right, by way of wishing success to the British arms, to make speeches which, when telegraphed to India, would infallibly convey the idea that the counsels of the country were divided, and that the people were not united in carrying on a war which, he maintained, was for the honour of the British Empire? He had the greatest feeling for the position of the Ameer. There never was any country so unfortunately situated as his, placed as it was between two colossal Powers, on the North and the South, both of whom were gradually encroaching on his dominions, narrowing the circle around him, and threatening to crush him. It reminded one of the striking story which appeared some time ago in Blackwood—"The Man in the Iron Shroud"—where the prisoner saw the iron walls of his cell gradually closing on him, and about to crush him to death. That was, at the present moment, the situation of the Ameer. The question for the Ameer was not what Power he should like to ally himself with, but what Power he had to fear the most. After the Crimean War the prestige of England was very great, not only in Europe, but in the East. It might be only a coincidence; but it was an undoubted fact, that during the long period of Liberal Government which had since elapsed that prestige diminished, and especially when the Treaty of Paris, for which Englishmen had fought and bled, was torn up by Lord Granville. That diminution of prestige must have naturally had the effect on a country like Afghanistan, which, on the other hand, saw Russia advancing like an ever-advancing tide upon her. Russia had, in fact, been advancing rapidly from the year 1740, since which period, after the absorption of about 1,500 or 2,000 miles of territory, she found herself with the Oxus as her boundary, and so in direct water communication with the Frontiers of India. That Shere Ali was alarmed at this progress would appear from a letter by him in 1873—

"My anxiety which I feel on account of the Russians will never be removed unless the British Government adorns the Afghan Government with great assistance in money and ammunitions of war for the troops, and unless great aid is given for the construction of strong forts throughout the northern Afghan border."

"set apart some property, either in India or in Europe, for my support, in order that if, which God forbid, a serious difficulty constrains me to quit Afghanistan, I may retire there with my family and children."—[Afghanistan, No. 1, pp. 110-11.]

He knew that when he mentioned the progress of Russia it would be objected that we had the assurances of the Emperor that he did not wish to extend his territories; and that was true; only they were not the safeguards generally supposed, and had not the validity often claimed for them. But those assurances had been given over and over again, and on each occasion Russia had made a considerable advance in Asia within a few months afterwards. In 1869 Sir Douglas Forsyth was told there was no intention of advancing in Central Asia; yet a few months afterwards the territory was pushed forward 500 miles. In 1872 Count Schouvaloff had been sent specially to this country to give the Emperor's word that Khiva should not be annexed; and within a few months of that time Russian troops were on the banks of the Oxus, and Khiva had fallen practically into the hands of Russia. After those occurrences, he would ask, what confidence could be placed in the assurances of Russia? Did not the Russian Mission to Cabul indicate danger to us in Central Asia? That was really the question they had to decide. And on this point he would quote the opinion of Lord Palmerston, who, in a letter addressed to Lord Russell, had said that a Russian force in occupation of Afghanistan might convert it into the advanced post of Russia, and would lead to great expense, require great efforts, and might create considerable damage. The hon. Member for the Elgin Burghs (Mr. Grant Duff) had declared that "any aggression on the dominions recognized as those of Shere Ali means war with England." Lord Derby, in a speech in the House of Lords, in 1874, had assured the House that to maintain the integrity and the territorial independence of Afghanistan was, and ought to be, a most important object of English policy; and a similar opinion had been expressed by M. Terentyeff, by M. Ferrier, by Fuad Pasha, and many others; while M. Frederick von Heilward had declared, with regard to the increasing influence of Russia in Central Asia, that "the British statesman ought to have foreseen it and nipped it in the bud." Opinions such as these showed that it was no light matter. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) had asserted that we had made war upon the Ameer in consequence of the Russian Mission; but, as he understood the matter, they had done nothing of the kind. The Russian Mission had opened our eyes to the fact that, in case of a war with England, Russia would have pushed her Forces towards India. We were thus forewarned, and were now taking precautions to be forearmed. The Government were perfectly justified in endeavouring to secure our safety in Afghanistan. If the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich had been in power during the last two years, and had acted in accordance with the views he had so loudly expressed, the Russians must have occupied Constantinople and Gallipoli and held the Dardanelles. They had heard a good deal of the policy of "masterly inactivity;" but, in his opinion, it might be better named the policy of "masterly imbecility;" and it was perfectly providential that they had a Government in power who were anxious and ready to maintain the honour and dignity of the country.

MR. BURT said, after reading over carefully the official Correspondence and listening attentively to the defences of the Ministers, he felt that the country had been engaged in an uncalled for, an unjust, and an indefensible war. The war, if it had not had its origin in deceit and misrepresentation, had only been made possible by a suppression of the facts. At the very outset the public mind was inflamed by false reports with regard to insults that had been received, by the Ameer's Representative having threatened to shoot Major Cavagnari, and the alleged insolent answer of the Ameer to the English Government; but he thought that, for conciliation and kindness of tone, the Ameer's letter would compare most favourably with the letters he had received. These "lies"—these "Eastern fables"—came from their countrymen in India; but he did not, of course, blame the Government for that. What he did blame them for was that while these tales were going about they did not give out to the public the authentic information which must have been in their hands, and they afforded misleading assurances to Parliament and the country. It had been asserted that there had been no change of policy on the part of the Government with regard to the Ameer; but one result of this debate had been to show not only that there had been such a change of policy, but that the Government actually took credit to themselves for having changed their policy to suit what they termed the altered circumstances of the case. But, assuming that there had been a necessity for altering their policy, the question arose whether that change of policy had been carried out in a friendly and in a conciliatory manner? Was it probable that the policy of sending a British Agent to Cabul would prove acceptable to the Ameer? Lord Salisbury, in giving his instructions for this new policy to be carried out in a despatch of the 19th of November, 1875, had said—

"The first step, therefore, in establishing our relations with the Ameer upon a more satisfactory footing, will be to induce him to receive a temporary Embassy in his capital. It need not be publicly connected with the establishment of a permanent Mission within his dominions. There would be many advantages in ostensibly directing it to some object of smaller political interest, which it will not be difficult for your Excellency to find, or, if need be, to create."—[Afghanistan, No. 1, p. 149.]

He had heard a good deal respecting Russian diplomacy—its tricks and its unreliability; but he did not think that it could bear off the palm in this matter. He should like to hear a better defence than had yet been offered for breaking off the Peshawur Conference at the very time when the Ameer seemed most disposed to concede all our demands. The termination of that Conference no doubt showed that we were in earnest, but not for peace; and had we been outspoken and frank to the Ameer there would have been something to recommend the course we had taken. It was alleged that we required a new scientific Frontier for the purpose of preventing an invasion that was hardly practicable, and which we had satisfied ourselves we had no cause to dread from Russia, which had been almost as faithless, almost as unscrupulous, and almost as aggressive in Central Asia as we had been in Southern Asia. The logical course would have been to grapple with our great enemy in those parts of the world; but we had preferred to attack a weak Power in order, for political considerations, to obtain a cheap and easy triumph. He did not wonder that a war commenced in such circumstances was unpopular with the great mass of the people of this country. With regard to the feelings of working people, whose opinions he had exceptional opportunities of knowing, as they had always been his dearest associates and companions, he had received several letters from them in connection with meetings they had held upon the subject, one of them representing nearly 40,000 miners in the county of Durham, all these latter denouncing the war which had lately been entered into. During the last few weeks he had met some thousands of working men and interchanged opinions with them, and had not come across one single man who believed that we were in the right in this affair. He had not met one who did not believe that we were engaged in an unjust and a cowardly war. A good deal had been said about the depression of trade. He believed that such depression had never been more severe than now; it was universal; all trades were affected. Capitalists were losing money; many were failing in business; the wages of working men were being reduced in all directions. He knew hundreds of honest, intelligent, industrious men—men who were the very backbone of our wealth and independence—who at the present time could scarcely get bread to eat. He did not say that we should never go to war except during times of prosperity—that would be a very foolish doctrine—but he did say that there never was a time when, before entering on war, there should be more thoughtful deliberation. That deliberation had not been given. He did not blame the Government for the depression of trade, for that was, he knew, a matter over which Governments had very little control. At the same time, while the evil had not been originated by the action of the Government, it had been very greatly intensified and prolonged by their fussy and meddling policy. They had been told lately that the Government was not carried on by newspaper paragraph writers, but by Sovereigns and statesmen. Well, the business of the world was carried on by thinkers, workers, and merchants, and not by soldiers, adventurers, and buccaneers, who, sword in hand, went into other people's territories to carve out for themselves a "scientific Frontier." He should like to have heard more consideration given to the Constitutional question—Whether the Government had the right, irrespective of Parliament and of public opinion, to declare war? He was not going on that question to give an opinion which he knew would have no weight with the House. But he did say that if the Government had acted Constitutionally—if it were in the power of a few men, however eminent, to declare what thousands of people believed to be an unjust war, and what was admittedly an unpopular war—then it was a mockery to talk of our being a free and self-governing people, and the sooner the Constitution was changed the better. There was scarcely a redeeming feature in connection with the war. It was true our soldiers were fighting gallantly, and he admired their valour; but he was sorry they were not engaged in a just cause. For that not they, but others, were responsible. The right hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth (Sir Robert Peel) had spoken as if it were wrong to imitate the good deeds of Russia. But why should England not imitate Russia's good deeds? What we were about to do was to imitate one of the worst deeds of Russia, and to appropriate the territory of the friendly mountain tribes, by whose good-will we had been enabled to get so easily into Afghanistan. The war only required one thing to complete its infamy, and there were signs that the Government were about to give it that finishing touch. To do this let them, while exempting from increased taxation the highly-paid Indian officials, many of whom had clamoured for that war, throw the greater part, if not the whole, of its burdens on the patient, dumb, and famine-stricken millions of India, who had no articulate voice, and who were now groaning under the military despotism of our Empire.

Mr. GORST said, he was sure they all lamented the existence of that war, but the question was, Who was to blame for it? When the present Ameer succeeded, without external aid, in establishing himself on the Throne of Afghanistan against all rival claimants, it was generally felt that some special precaution in regard to that country was necessary beyond the previous policy of masterly inaction, in order to preserve the interests of our Indian Empire. Lord Lawrence's Government had proposed, as an alternative policy to that of stationing English officers in Afghanistan, that we should come to a clear understanding with the Court of St. Petersburg as to its projects and designs on Central Asia, and that that Court should be given to understand that it could not be permitted to interfere with the affairs of Afghanistan and the States contiguous to our Frontier. That policy was accepted by the Home Government, who lost no time in carrying it out. Lord Lawrence's despatch came in January, 1869; and in March of the same year they had the celebrated declaration of the Russian Government that the Imperial Government regarded Afghanistan as being entirely outside the sphere in which it was called upon to exercise its influence. There was not very much in that declaration when they came to analyze it; but it satisfied Lord Clarendon; and in the following November both Governments agreed to abstain from all ambitious views and unfriendly feelings towards each other, and that the more frankly Central Asian Questions were discussed between them the less likely were they to come into collision. They all knew how the promises of Russia as to her interference with Afghan affairs had been kept; and it should be remembered it was upon a reliance that Russia would fulfil her engagements in that regard that the policy of Lord Northbrook depended for its success. The Papers in the hands of hon. Members showed the series of letters addressed between 1870 and 1872 by General Kaufmann to the Ameer, and the reply of that Potentate. In one of them, the fourth, the General—whose Government had undertaken to exercise no influence in Afghanistan—informed the Ameer that a former subject of his, who had been a General in the Russian Army, was about to settle down in his native country, and he requested that he might be re-instated in his ancestral estate, and—more important and more suggestive still—that he might be allowed to enter the service of the Ameer. At length, in the year 1872, the letters of the Russian General aroused the apprehensions of the Ameer's Government, and it was reported to the Indian Government that they entertained fears as to what the designs of Russia really were. All these facts were known to the Government of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, although they were directly opposed to the policy of Lord Clarendon. The right hon. Gentleman declared that it was impossible to draw a distinction between a Mission of courtesy and a Mission of business. He (Mr. Gorst) should like to know if the right hon. Gentleman could make any distinction between a letter of courtesy and a letter of business? and letters had been going from Tashkend to Cabul for some years, while the right hon. Gentleman was in office, without any protest or remonstrance on his part. The hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) asked why the present Government did not object to this Correspondence. He (Mr. Gorst) was surprised that the hon. and learned Member should put such a foolish question. If hon. Gentlemen had complained of the Correspondence, the answer would have been that it had been sanctioned for many years by the Government of the right hon. Member for Greenwich. It appeared that soon after the receipt of the letter which excited the concern of the Ameer's Government, the meeting in December, 1873, at Simla, between the Ameer and Lord Northbrook, took place, at which the assurances which had been given to the Ameer by Lord Mayo were qualified and explained away; and it was a remarkable fact that from that date no letter from the Representative of Russia to the Ameer and no reply of his appeared in the Blue Book. Nevertheless, it appeared from a letter of General Kaufmann's, incidentally quoted at page 64 of the Central Asia Papers, that subsequently to the Simla Conference General Kaufmann, while at St. Petersburg, received at least two letters from the Ameer, one of them announcing the important fact that the Ameer had appointed Sirdar Abdoolla Jan his heir-apparent. During the succeeding years

Her Majesty's present Government were disturbed by movements of the Russians in Central Asia, of which, however, they could get no information, except indirectly through Persia. They had, therefore, he contended, good reason to doubt the sincerity of the Russian promises with regard to Afghanistan and to desire to establish a British Agent at Herat. Before any active step had been taken to inaugurate this policy, they had a further proof of Russian duplicity in the denial of Prince Gortchakoff that General Kaufmann was acting at Cabul, while there were actually two Russian Agents there, and repeated communications with the Ameer were carried on. It was perfectly evident that Russia carried on a process of seduction in Afghanistan from 1870 to 1876, and that before the policy of Lord Lytton had been put into operation, it accomplished its object by making the Ameer our enemy. For the difficulties that had arisen in that quarter, therefore, he blamed neither the present Government nor the late Government, but Russia, who had flagrantly broken her understanding with this country.
